ACTES AND MONVMENTS OF MATTERS

most speciall and memorable, happening in the Church, with an vniuersall historie of the same.

Wherein is set forth at large the whole race and course of the Church, from the primitiue age to these latter times of ours, with the bloody vnes, horrible troubles, and great persecutions against the true Martyrs of Christ, fought and wrought as well by Heathen Emperours, as now lately practised by Romish Prelats, especially in this Realme of England and Scotland.

Now againe, as it was recognised, perused, and recommended to the studious Reader, by the Author, Master John Foxe; the sixth time newly imprinted, with certaine additions thereunto annexed: Anno 1610.

Mense Octobri.

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS, MOST EXCELLENT AND NOBLE PRINCESSE, QVEENE ELIZABETH, OVR DREAD LADIE, BY THE grace of God, Queene of England, France and Ireland, Defender of Christs faith and Gospell, and principall Gouernor both of the Realme, and also ouer the said Church of England and Ireland, vnder Christ the Supreame head of the same, &c John Fox her humble subiect wisheth daily increase of Gods holy Spirit and Grace, with long raigne, perfect health, and ioyfull peace to gouerne his flocke committed to her charge, to the example of all good Princes, the comfort of his Church, and glorie of his blessed name.

CHRIST the Prince of all Princes, who hath placed you in your throne of Maiestie, vnder him to gouerne the Church and Realme of England, giue your roiall Highnes long to sit, and many yeeres to raigne ouer vs, in all flourishing felicitie, to his gracious pleasure, and long lasting ioy of all your subiects: Amen.

When I first presented these ACTS and MONYMENTS vnto your Maiestie (most deare Soueraigne, Queene ELIZABETH, our peaceable SALOME) which your Maiesties rare clemencie receiued in such gentle part: I well hoped that these my trauels in this kind of writing had bin well at an end, whereby I might haue returned my studies againe to other purposes after mine owne desire, more fit then to write histories, especially in the English tongue. But certaine euill disposed persons, of intemperant tongues, aduersaries to good proceedings, would not suffer me so to rest, fuming and fretting, and raising vp such miserable exclamations at the first appearing of the booke, as was wonderfull to heare. A man would haue thought Christ to haue bin new borne againe, and that Herod with all the Citie of Ierusalem had been in an vprore. Such blustring and stirring was then against that poore booke, thorow all quarters of England, euen to the gates of Loraine: so that no English Papist almost in all the Realme thought himselfe a perfect Catholike, vnlesse he had cast out some word or other to giue that booke a blow.

Whereupon, considering with my selfe what should moone them thus to rage, first I began with more circumspect diligence to ouerlooke againe that I had done. In searching whereof, I found the fault both what it was, and where it lay: which was indeed, not so much in the booke it selfe (to say the truth) as in another certain priuie mysterie and working of some: of whom Ioannes Auentinus shall tell vs in his owne words, and shew vs who they bee: Quibus, inquit, audiendi quæ fecerint pudor est: nullus faciendi, quæ audire erubescunt. Illic, vbi opus, nihil verentur: hic, vbi nihil opus est, ibi verentur, &c. Who being ashamed belike to heare their worthie stratagems like to come to light, sought by what meanes they might, the stopping of the same. And because they could not worke it per brachicum seculare, by publike authoritie (the Lord of heauen long preserue your noble Maiestie) they renewed againe an old wonted practise of theirs: doing in like sort herein as they did somtimes with the holy Bible in the daies of your renowmed father of famous memory king Henry the eight; who when they neither by manifest reason could gainestand the matter contained in the booke, nor yet abide the comming out thereof, then sought they by a subtill deuised traine to deprane the translation, notes and prologues thereof, bearing the king in hand and all the people, that there were in it a thousand lies, and I cannot tell how many moe. Not that there were such lies in it in very deed: but because the comming of that booke should not bewray their lying falshood, therefore they thought best to begin first to make exceptions themselues against it: playing in their stage, like as Phormio did in the old Comedie, who being in all the fault himselfe, began first to quarrell with Demipho, when Demipho rather had good right to lay Phormio by the heeles.

With like facing brags these Catholike Phormiones thinke now to dash out all good bookes, and amongst others, also these Monuments of Martyrs. Which godly martyrs, as they could not abide being aliue, so neither can they now suffer their memories to liue after their death, lest the acts of them being knowne, might bring perhaps their wicked acts and cruell murthers to detestation: and therefore spurne they so vehemently against this booke of histories, with all kind of contumelies and vprores, railing and wondering vpon it; much like as I haue heard of a company of theeues, who in robbing a certaine true man by the high waies side, when they had found a piece of gold or two about him more then he would be acknowne of, they cried out of the falsehood of the world, marualling and complaining what little truth was to be found in men.

Euen so these men deale also with me: for when they themselues altogether delight in vntruths, and haue replenished the whole Church of Christ with fained fables, lying miracles, false visions, miserable errors contained in their Missals and Portuses, Breuiars, and Summaries, and almost no true tale in all their Saints liues and Festiuals, as now also no great truths in our Louanian bookes, &c. Yet notwithstanding, as though they were a people of much truth, and that the world did not perceiue them, they pretend a face and zeale of great veritie: And as though there were no histories else in all the world corrupted, but onely this historie of Acts and Monuments, with tragicall voices they exclaime and wonder vpon it, sparing no cost of Hyperbolicall phrases to make it appeare as full of lies as lines: &c. much after the like sort of impudencie as sophisters vse sometimes in their Sophismes to doe (and sometimes is vsed also in Rhetorike) that when an argument commeth against them which they cannot well resolue indeed, they haue a rule to shift off the matter with stout words and tragicall admiration, whereby to dash the opponent out of countenance, bearing the hearers in hand, the same to be the weakest and slendrest argument that euer was heard, not worthy to be answered, but vtterly to be hissed out of the Schooles.

With like sophistication these also fare with me; who when they neither can abide to heare their owne doings declared, nor yet denie the same, which they heare to be true, for three or foure escapes in the booke committed (and yet some of them in the booke amended) they neither reading the whole, nor rightly vnderstanding that they read, inueigh and maligne so peruerslie the setting out thereof, as though neither any word in all that story were true, nor any other storie false in all the world besides. And yet in accusing these my accusers, I doe not so excuse my selfe, nor defend my booke, as though nothing in it were to bee sponged or amended. Therefore I haue taken these paines, and reiterated my labours in trauelling out the storie againe; doing herein as Penelope did with her web, vntwisting that she had done before: Or as builders doe sometimes, which build and take downe again, either to transpose the fashion, or to make the foundation larger. So in recognising this History I haue imploied a little more labour, partly to enlarge the argument which I took in hand: partly also to assay, whether by any paines taking I might pacifie the stomacks, or satisfie the iudgements of these importune quarrellers: which neuertheless I feare I shall not doe, when I haue done all I can. For well I know that all the heads of this hissing Hydra will neuer be cut off, though I were as strong as Hercules. And if Apelles the skilfull Painter, when he had bestowed all his cunning vpon a piece of worke, which no good artificer would or could greatly reprooue, yet was not without some controlling Sutor, which tooke vp-on him Vltra crepidam, much more may I looke for the like in these controlling daies.

Neuertheless committing the successe thereof vnto the Lord, I haue aduentured againe vpon this storie of the Church, and haue spent not onely my paines, but also almost my health therein, to bring it to this. Which now being finished, like as before I did: so againe I exhibit and present the same vnto your Princely Maiestie, blessing my Lord my God with all my heart: first for this libertie of peace and time which through your peaceable gouernment he hath lent vnto vs for the gathering both of this and other like bookes, tractations and monuments requisite to the behoofe of his Church, which hitherto by iniquitie of time could not be contrined in any Kings raigne since the conquest, before these Alcyon daies of yours.

Secondly, as we are all bound with publicke voices to magnifie our God for this happie preseruation of your roiall estate: so priuately for mine owne part, I also acknowledge my selfe bound to my God and to my Sauiour, who so graciously in such weake health, hath lent me time, both to finish this worke, and also to offer the second dedication thereof to your Maestie: desiring the same to accept in worth the donation thereof, if not for the worthines of the thing giuen, yet as a testification of the bounden seruice and good will of one, which by this he here presenteth, declareth what he would, if he had better to giue.

And though the storie being written in the popular tongue, serueth not so greatly for your owne peculiar reading, nor for such as be learned: yet I shall desire both you and them, to consider in it the necessitie of the ignorant flocke of Christ committed to your gouernment in this Realme of England. Who, as they haue bin long led in ignorance, and wrapt in blindnesse for lacke especially of Gods word, and partly also for wanting the light of historie, pity I thought but that such should bee helped, their ignorance relieued, and simplicitie instructed. I considered they were the flocke of Christ, and your subiects, belonging to your account and charge, bought with the same price, and hauing as deare soules to the Lord as other. And though they be but simple and vnlearned, yet not vnapt to be taught if they were applied. Furthermore, what inconuenience groweth of ignorance, where knowledge lacketh, both I considered, and experience daily teacheth.

Profit to be taken by examples of Christian martyrs.

Gods workes to be obserued in histories.

What vse commeth by reading of Histories.

And therefore, bearing of the vertuous inclination of your Maiestie, what a prouident care and zeale full of solicitude you haue, minding (speedily I trust) to furnish all quarters and countries of this your Realme with the voice of Christs Gospel, and faithfull preaching of his word, I thought also not vnprofitable to adioine vnto this your godly proceedings, and to the office of the ministerie, the knowledge also of Ecclesiasticall historie, which in my mind ought not to be separate from the same: that like as by the one the people may learne the rules and precepts of doctrine: so by the other they may haue examples of Gods mightie working in his Church, to the confirmation of their faith, and the edification of Christian life. For as we see what light and profit commeth to the Church by histories in old times set forth of the Iudges, Kings, Machabees, and the Acts of the Apostles after Christs time: so likewise may it redound to no small vse in the Church, to know the Acts of Christs martyrs now since the time of the Apostles.

Besides other manifold examples and experiments of Gods great mercies and iudgements in preseruing his Church, in ouerthrowing tyrants, in confounding pride, in altering states and kingdomes, in conserning Religion against errours and dissensions, in releeuing the godly, in brideling the wicked, loosing and tying vp againe of Satan the disturber of common weales, in punishing transgressions as well against the first Table as the second: wherein is to be seene Idolatrie punished, blasphemie plagued, contempt of Gods holie name and Religion reuenged, murder with murder rewarded, Adulterers and Wedlock breakers destroied, periuries, extortions, couetous oppressions, & fraudulent counsels come to nought, with other excellent works of the Lord: the obseruing and noting whereof in histories, minister to the readers therof wholesome admonitions of life: with experience and wisdome both to know God in his works, and to worke the thing that is godlie: especially to seeke vnto the sonne of God for their saluation, and in his faith onely to find that they seeke for, and in no other meanes. The continuance and constancy of which faith, the Lord of his grace and goodnes grant to your noble Maiesty, and to his whole beloued Church, and al the members of the same, to euerlasting life:

Amen.

AD DOMINVM IESVM CHRISTVM SERVATOREM CLEMENTISSIMVM, EVCHARISTICON

Ioannis Foxi.

COnfecto nunc opere, quod tuis primùm auspicijs ac voluntate aggressus (summe & adorande Iesu, idemque Seruator clementissime) inchoaui, quodque tuo demum beneficio ac fauore exegi atque absolui, præter omnem certam opinionem & vires meas: supereſt itaque pro officio meo, vt animula hæc, ceu pro votiua tabula, gratias, si non quantas debeat (vtinam enim id posset) at quantas queat maximè, munificentissimæ tuæ persoluat maiestati: quæ tam miserum homuncionem, vel syphar potius hominis, in laboribus tot tantisque istis, qui vel asellum quemuis ἀρσενικὸν possent conficere, tumultuantem, benigno successu ac solatio tam clementer suffulserit. Quanquam autem de operis difficultate nihil hic causari attinet, quæ vix æstimari à multis poterit: tua tamen non ignorat omnipotens maiestas, huius, qualecunq; sit, negotij confectio quibus quanque non ferendis curis, vigilijs, molestijs constitit: Quibus nullo modo pares futuri essemus, nisi tauentis gratiæ tuæ numen affulsisset ac sese quodam modo admiscuisset operi. Quid ni enim fatear ac tester ingenuè, quod re ipsa experti sumus? Perspicuum enim, penéque oculis ipsis conspeximus, singularem excelsæ dexteræ tuæ ὑπερβολὴν, non modò in successu negotij prouehendo, sed in vita etiam spirituque inter labores conseruando. Auxilium Christi in concinando hoc opere. Tui igitur muneris est (clementissime Iesu) quòd opus tuis susceptum auspicijs huc vsque prouectum sit. Nos vicissim, quod nostri sit officij, gratias clementiæ tuæ, cum nostro priuatim, tum publico quodammodo ecclesiæ tuæ nomine, agimus. Vel hinc enim cernimus quanti causam Martyrum tuorum æstimes, quando eorum illustrando nomini tanta fauces propensione. Quanquam verò si nulla hic extaret eorum recordatio, non possent non omnibus modis esse illustrissimi, quorum sint nomina vitæ tuæ libro inscripta. Et tamen voluit hoc modo tua declarare maiestas, nobisque innotescere hominibus, quàm honorificum sit pro tui nominis gloria fortiter dimicantes occumbere, quorum tu vitam à cinere ac rogo sic vindicas, sic causam tueris, sic dignitatem illustras, vt eandem multo cum gloriæ fœnore abs te recipiant clariorem, quàm si ipsi nunquam alioqui perdidissent. Habet siquidem peculiare hoc sibi militiæ tuæ ratio, longe à mundo hoc diuersum, quòd in castris tuis militantes siue viuant, tibi viuant, siue moriantur, multò clarescant a funere felicius, quàm si vixissent maximè.

Sic Cranmerum videmus, Ridleum, Latimerum, Iohannem Hooperum, Bradfordum, cæteroſque eiusdem decuriæ pugiles, quanto maiore occubuisse cum gloria in acie tua depugnantes, quam si relicta statione in qua erant collocati, saluti ipsi suæ causam tuam postposuissent. Quæ enim gens, quæ lingua, quæ natio, quæ temporum vetustas, quæ hominum posteritas eorum non cantabit laudes, non virtutem agnoscet, non magnitudinem admirabitur? Quis Wicleuum vnquam, aut Cobhamum natum fuisse existimasset, nisi tua in causa tam egisset strenuè? Quanto honori illud Hussio Bohemensi, nostroque Tindallo fuit, quòd vitam in Euangelij tui causa perditam, magis abs te recipere, quàm ipsi retinere maluerint? Spectemus è diuersa parte aduersarios tuos, quorum tam multas esse constat cædes, iniurias, crudelitates aduersus tuos, multaque item occultè & sceleste ab ijsdem perpetratà, quæ nunquam sperabant fore palam: Et tamen quid vnquam in angulis & tenebris ab illis est defignatum tàm occultè aduersus Ecclesiam, quod non in apricum tua produxit producetq; prouidentia? atque ita produxit, vt vnde ipsi laudis sibi conceperunt animo opinionem, inde summum sibi ipsis dedecus pepererint & contumeliam, quam nec vita effugeré, nec morte vnquam finire poterint. Quis Guisios, Boneros, Storios, Gardineros, tanquam exeeranda hominum nomina nunc non nouit? non exhorret? quis eorum facinora obliterabit dies, aut sepeliet memoria? Et quid hos in tanta multitudine hostium tuorum recenseo? Cui vnquam prospere cessit tuo rebellare numini, aut hostem se ecclesiæ tuæ profiteri? Papæ nomen quàm erat aliquando in his terris celebre & gloriosum? Nunc quid putidius, quid probrosius? Cardinalitium fastigium cœperunt primò admirari homines, multaque prosequi reuerentia: Sic Monachorum & Nonnarum collegia suum quondam habebant plausum apud plebem simplicem & credulam. At postquam spreta veritate tua cœperunt grassari contra te, tuorumque homicidæ fieri, eò tandem sunt prolapsi (exceptis paucis quos tua exemit gratia) vt reliqua sex nihil aliud iam esse præter vocabula quædam ad ignominiam relicta videatur. Felix ac gloriosum pro Christo mortem oppetere. Papæ nomen nunc probrosum. Cardinalium Monachorum, Nonnarum nomina ad ignominiam nunc relicta.

Hæc nimirum (sanctissime domine ac deus noster) iustissimi iudicij tui sunt præludia, ex quo haud difficile æstimare sit, quidnam in altero illo expectaturi sint, quos in hoc ipso seculo, hoc est in suo ipsorum regno, tanta accumules infamia & dedecore. Sed omissis his, ad sanctos tuos redeamus Martyres, quorum nomine, meritò á nobis perenne velut sacrificium laudis & gratiarum tuæ debetur, simul & habetur, bonitati. Primùm, quòd in ecclesiæ tuæ causa dimicantibus tam fortem & alacrem spiritum omnibusque tormentis maiorem aduersus parricidas Papistas subministrasti. Deinde quòd & nobis in illorum desudantibus historia propitius adeò clementiæ tuæ fauor affuerit. Debetur & hoc priuatim meo quoque nomine singulari tuæ pietati, quòd vitam toties alioqui nutantem, in hac tanta, quantam tu solus nouisti, laborum immensitate conseruatam tuo volueris beneficio. Verùm illud imprimis omnes debemus pariter effusissimo tuo in nos amori, quòd beatorum Martyrum tuorum, quos mundi huius ad flammas & cineres adegerit peruersitas, causam & innocentiam velut è cinere recollectam, in lucem denuò notitiamq; ecclesiæ tuæ reuocare ac patefacere dignatus sis. Etsi enim dubium non est, quin in supremo illo iudicio tuo, quum virtutes cœlorum mouebuntur, omnis eorum ad amussim excutietur excutietur causa ante tribunal tuum, est tamen aliquid hîc quoque in ecclesia tua, causam ipsorum, facta, vitæque virtutes cæteras non ignorari. Tunc autem ad illos vberior gloria, ad nos interea maior redundabit fructus, quando ex ipsorum rectè factis, integritate, innocentia, fide ac patientia constare poterit, non quid ipsi solùm fecerint, sed quid & nobis eorum sit exemplo faciendum.

Sed hic rursus (dulcissime Iesu) opus est benigno fauoris tui præsidio. Nos enim qui filij Martyrum tuorum sumus, quosque maximè maiores nostros imitari conueniebat, nunc nihil ferè parentum tenemus, præter vitæ solam hanc, quam suo partam sanguine reliquerunt, libertatem: qua etiam ipsa nimium abutimur intemperanter, vt iam periculum sit, ne non filij modò Martyrum, sed ne fratres quidem ipsorum haberi mereamur. Quantum enim interfit discriminis, quamque prorsus disconuenit ordine toto nostra consuetudo ab illorum vestigijs & disciplina, pudet profectò referre. Sed quid ego tibi referam, cuius nihil non perspicit maiestas ac intuetur? Quanto illis studio ac curæ fuit amore tui, cætera quæq; adeoq; seipsos ad vitæ etiam contemptū abdicare, mundum cum omnibus desiderijs flocci facere, voluptates tanquam nugas spernere? Nec sinebant pericula vndique imminentia opibus cogerendis, multoq; minus honoribus cumulandis vacare. Contrà verò, nostra nunc vita, studium, omnisq; adeò contentio, quid nisi mundum spirat, quid aliud quàm perpetuum quoddam fluxarum rerum, opum, ac honorū aucupium videtur & ambitus? At illi quam præclarè secum actum putassent, si vel viuere modò licuisset. Ideoq; multi fuere eorum, qui Mariæ Reginæ facultates & possessiones omnes adusque extremum assem obtulerunt, dummodo solam ipsis remitteret conscientiam. Et quæ nos tanta hæc habendi intemperies exagitat, quibus nec vnus nec mediocris victus possit esse satis? Sine modo, sine fine, opibus, sacerdotijs, censuiq; dilatādo inhiamus. Quanto ambitu amicos fatigamus & inimicos, non vt viuamus solùm, verùm vt sublimes viuamus & honorati? De fide, de mansuetudine eorum, tolerantia, simplicitate, ac patientia incredibili, quid dici satis potest? Quanta cōstantia, qua animi alacritate perpessi sunt quicquid infligebatur, vindictam omnem deo remittentes, cui & causam commendabant? Nulla vis eos aduersariorum deijcere, nec minæ frangere, non ludibria mouere, non pericula, non tormenta vlla consternere, nec delinire blanditia potuerunt.

Componamus nunc nostram cum his mollitiem. Sed pudor prohibet: Nam quæ tam Iouis nos tentationis aura affiare possit, quæ non illico præcipites ac transuersos rapiat in auaritiam, in fastum, voluptates, turpitudinem, vindictam, & in quid non malorum? Quæ tam leuis obijci poterit iniuriola, pro qua non cœlum terræ miscemus, mariáque turbamus ab imo? Ex quo in promptu est colligere, quantum ab eo absumus, vt mortem simus vnquam, tua causa subituri, si quando res Martyrium flagitet, quum nec affectus quidem istos tuo amputare iussu velimus. Quapropter vt Martyrumquidem illorum causa gratias agimus nomini tuo sancto: ita nostra vicissim causa deprecamur, vt qui largitus sis ipsis vincendi facultatem, nobis itidem pia eorundem exempla imitandi felicitatem aspires: sicque ecclesiæ tuæ affulgeat tua gratia, necubi seducti huius mundi illecebris, socordiores ipsi in retinenda Euangelij tui victoria, quàm illi in comparanda strenui, videamur. Postremò, quoniam historiam hanc tuo nutu ac voluntate aggressi, in ea re operam studiumq; posuimus, quo facta gestaque sanctorum tuorum (sanctissime Iesu) ad nominis tui gloriam, & in commodum ecclesiæ publicum emergerent, adde nunc labori fructum, simulq; historiæ tutelam in te recipias magnopere petimus: cui & opus ipsum, totumque meipsum, quem tot modis tuæ misericordiæ debeo, toto corpore & anima, totisque viribus commendo, dedico, consecroque; cui omne cadat genu, omnisque vox & lingua confessionis gloriam per omnes ecclesias tribuat personétque. Amen.

AD DOCTVM LECTOREM,

IOANNES FOXVS.

COgitanti mihi, versantique mecum in animo, quàm periculosa res aleæ sit, emittere nunc aliquid in publicum, quod in manus oculósq; multorum subeat, his præsertim tam exulceratis moribus temporibúsque, vbi tot hominum dissidijs, tot studijs partium, tot morosis capitibus, tam rigidis censuris, & Criticorum sannis feruent fere omnia, vt difficillimum sit quicquam tam circumspectè scribere, quod non in aliquam calumniandi materiam rapiatur, perbeati profectò (cœlicéque videntur ij, quibus eum vitæ cursum tenere liceat, vt in otio viuentes cum dignitate, sic alienis frui queant laboribus, velut in theatro otiosi sedentes spectatores, vt nullam interim ipsis vel ex actione tædium, vel ex labore periculum metuendum sit. Me verò, nescio quo pacto, longe diuersa quidem hactenus exercuit vitæ ratio, quippe cui nec fortunæ illam fœlicitatem, in cuius complexibus tam multos suauiter foueri video, nec otij amœnitatem experiri, vix etiam per omnem vitam degustare in continuo laborum ac negotiorum feruore ac contentione contigerit. Quanquam de fortunæ parum queror quam semper contempsi, quin neque de laboribus multum dicturus, si modò labores ij, tantum vel prodesse vel placere cæteris possent hominibus, quantū me priuatim afterunt incommodántq;. Nunc ad meæ infœlicitatis cumulum accedit insuper, quòd in eo argumenti genere laborandum fuit, quod præter lugubrem rerum ipsarum materiam, præter linguæ inamœnitatem, præter tractandi difficultatem, quæ vix nitorem recipiat orationis, eò porro autorem ipsum redigit angustiæ, vt neque falsa narrare sine iniuria historiæ, nec verum dicere sine magna sua inuidia odióque multorum liceat. Nam cùm in eo historiæ argumento mihi versandum fuit, quod non ad superiorum modò temporum res gestas altéq; repetitas pertineat, sed hanc ipsam ætatem nostram, nostræq; gentis nunc homines etiamnū præsentes, viuósq; sic attingat, sic perfricet, sic designet, quemadmodum in hoc materiæ genere necessariò faciundū fuit: quæso, quid hic mihi aliud expectandum sit, nisi postquam frustra me defatigando, valetudinem attriuerim, oculos perdiderim, senium acciuerim, corpus exhauserim, demum, vt post hæc omnia multorum me hominum odijs, sibilis, inuidiæ ac calumniæ exponam? In tot istis asperitatibus cùm nihil me tutum præstare poterit, non Cæsar, non Monarchæ, non Rex, non Regina, non vlla huius mundi præsidia, præter solam diuini numinis potentem dexteram: principiò igitur, atque ante omnia huc ceu ad tutissimum asylum me recepi, huic me librúmque commendaui & commendo. Tum vero insuper in eodem domino tuum illum candorem (docte piéq; Lector) eamq; tuam humanitatem appellare volui, quæ ex humanioribus literis studijsque te scio præditum, quo nostris his sudoribus tuæ approbationis accedat calculus; aut si approbationem non mereamur, saltem ne fauoris desit benignitas: cui si approbatum iri hanc historiæ nostræ farraginem senserimus, cæterorum iudicia obtrectatorum leuius feremus.

Nam alioquì non defuturos sat scio qui varijs modis nobis facessent molestiam. Habebit hîc Momus suos morsus, Sycophanta suos sibilos, nec deerit Calumniatori sua lingua & aculeus, quem infigat. Hic fidem detrahet historiæ: Ille artificium in tractando, alter diligentiam, vel in excutiendis rebus iudicium desiderabit. Illi forsan operis displicebit moles, vel minus disposita seruataque temporum ratio. Et si nihil horum fuerit, attamen in tanta religionis pugna, in tanta iudiciorum, capitum, sensuum varietate, vbi suæ quisq; faueat ac blanditur factioni, quid tam affabrè aut circumspectè enarrari potest, quod placeat vniuersis? Quin & iam nunc mussitari etiam audio a nonnullis, qui longa sese teneri dicant expectatione, quoad hæc tandē (Legenda nostra, vt appellant, Aurea) euulganda sit: qui si nostram primùm in eo tarditatem reprehensam velint, næ ego suaues istos homines vicissim rogatos velim, vt ipsi prius in edendis suis se præbeant expeditiores, quā alienā incessant lentitudinem.

Deinde, si tardius exeat ipsorum opinione volumen, meminerint prouerbiali præcepto, lentam esse festinationem oportere: Et bos dicitur lassus fortiùs pedē figere. Egimus in hac quidē re pro virili nostra: egimus spero & pro officio, si non satis pro tēporis modo expeditè, at egimus certè pro valetudine; addā porro, egimus supra valetudinem. Quin & illud ipsorum venia adijcere liceat, egisse nos maturiùs quàm ipsis forsan expediet, qui in hunc nugantur modum: certè maturatiùs egimus, quam tanti momenti & magnitudinis negotio conueniebat, quod accuratiorem in digerendis rebus moram curamque postulabat, cùm a nobis vix integros datos esse menses octodecim præparandæ materiæ, comportandis componendisque rebus, conferendis exemplaribus, lectitandis codicibus, rescribendis his quæ scripto mandata erant, castigandis formulis, concinandæ historiæ, & in ordinem redigendæ, &c. nouerunt ij qui testes adfuerint, & temporis conscij, & laboris socij. Quod si autem Legendæ suæ aureæ titulum huc eò accomodant, quòd illius exemplo hanc similiter fabulosam putent historiam, hinc q; odioso vocabulo eius præiudicent veritati, quid his respondeam aliud quā quòd ingenuè suam ipsi prodant calumniam, quam ne editione quidem libri differre queant, prius de rebus dijudicantes quam nouerint. Atq; interim quidem illud bene habet, quòd ipsis tandem aliquando Aureæ suæ legendæ pudeat tam fabulosæ. Et tamen fabellis illis non puduit mundum tam diu ludificare, periculum etiam intentantes his, si qui Legendæ illi, hoc est, mendacissimis illorum nugis, auderent detrahere. Quare nihil magis esse possit impium, quàm sacrosanctam ecclesiæ fidem fabulamentis huiusmodi conficticisque præter omnem veri fidem delirijs commaculare; tamen ineptissimi isti nugatores ex suo ingenio cæteros quosque scriptores metientes, nec ipsi verum adferre satagunt, nec afferentibus alijs fidem habendam putant, cuncta videlicet suis aureis somnijs similia existimantes. Quin apage cum Aurea tua legenda, nugator impudens; quem ego librum, cum omnes eum scimus, nec ipse ignoras prodigiosis mendaciorum portentis & vanissimis vndique commentis scatere, ne cum Homeri quidem fabulis conferre velim: tantum abest vt cum verè serijs grauibusque ecclesiæ historijs quicquam commune habeat. Quid? an quia Papistis illis tuis & impuris monachis sic libuit in ridiculis miraculorum suorum portentis in eptire, tu protinus nullam grauem historiæ authoritatem putas in ecclesia admittendam? Quin eadem lege & de Eusebij ecclesiastica, & tripartita Sozomeni & Socratis cæterorúmque historijs iudicemus. Sunt præter hæc & alia quædam de Sanctis & Diuis conscripta miracula, quæ propius ad Legendam hanc accedunt, & tamen nequaquam eo loco apud nos habentur, vt Legendæ illi papisticæ annumerentur, etiam quæ suspectissimæ sunt fidei. Quanquam de scriptoribus cæteris mea nihil interest censuram ferre. Quòd ad hanc verò nostram ... attinet, testatum id velim vniuersis, datam esse à nobis operam sedulò, ne quid vsquam inesset operi fabulosum, aut eiusmodi, quod vel a nobis fictum, vel quod Legendæ illi aureæ (magis dicam plumbeæ) non vndique foret dissimilimum. Id quod res ipsa & natiua historiæ facies testari potetit, cuius tota textura ex ipsis Episcoporum Archiuis atque Registris, partimque ex proprijs martyrum ipsorum literis hausta ac conflata videri poterit. In qua historia etsi neque id exigam vt singula hic pro oraculis habeantur, at dedimus tamen pro virili operam, vt si non plenè assequeremur, accederemus tamen quàm proxime ad veterem illam historiæ legem, vt duas res, præcipuas historiæ pestes, vitaremus, timorem videlicet & assentationem: quarum altera sæpe minus dicit, altera semper plus addit quàm par est, narrationi. Sed huius rei fidem ex ipso magis opere, quam ex mea commendatione astrui honestius est. Habet enim veritas ipsa simpliccm suam & natiuam faciem, quam non erit difficile non muccosis naribus lectori, ex ipso vel orationis habitu, aut rerum aspectu, siue alijs circumstantiarum notis deprehendere. Sed vereor ne hîc quoque, quemadmodum cæteris in rebus, locum habeat veteris prouerbij experientia: faciunt quippe mendaces vt ne vera ctiam dicenti fides habeatur. Cum hactenus in Martyrologicis sanctorum legendis vitiisque describendis mendacia, ac impudentissimæ somniorum fictiones pro veris legantur narrationibus, fit vt & cæteræ eiusdem argumenti materiæ eandem pariter suspicionem subeant, vt vix iam quicquam legi dicíue in ecclesia cum fide queat. Verùm huic malo cùm mederi nequeamus, satis erit, quod nostrarum erat virium id nos præstitisse. Quod superest, diuinæ curandum prouidentiæ relinquamus. Atque de certitudine veritatéque historiæ hæc hactenus: quæ vtinam ne tam vera quidem certáque essent, quàm isti videri volunt, at falsa potius, confimilísque huic, quam dicunt, Aureæ ipsorum Legendæ, aut Vitis patrum, aut Festiuali, aut Dormi-secure, cæteríscj Papisticis istis ... foret. Nunc verò martyrum horum non à nobis ficta, sed inflicta à vobis supplicia, atroxque cædes veriorem hanc comprobant historiam, pluréscque suæ veritatis testes habent quam vellemus ipsi qui historiam scripsimus. Venio iam ad alteram criminationis partem, quæ de Calendario fortassis obijcietur. Audio enim & hic mihi obstrepere non tacitas modò sententias, sed apertas papistarum quorundam voces, quibus iniquè a me factum videbitur, quòd antiquatis atque ex Calendario explosis veteris ecclesiæ Diuis, Martyribus, Confessoribus, Virginibúsq, nouos eorum loco Martyres ac Confessores insulciam. Primùm, nulli ego veterum Diuorum hoc facto præiudicatum velim. Neque verò ideo inter Diuos a me referuntur isti, quòd inseruntur in Calendarium. Hanc ego apotheosin mihi nunquam sumpsi, quam sibi tam confidenter sumpsit Gregorius nonus. Porro, neque eò spectat hoc Calendarium, vt nouam alicuius festorum dierum legem præscribam ecclesiæ: Tum multò minus cultum sancti alicuius instituo. Festorum dierum iam plus satis erat in mundo. Vtinam dominicum solum sabbatum dignè, atque vt par est, transigeremus. Habeãt per me suum papistæ Calendarium. Habeat & ecclesia suos sanctos, tum recentes tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim ijdem ne colantur, modò quàm sint vetusti, tàm verè etiam sancti sint.

Verùm enimuero cum non dubitauit sua etiam ætatæ Hieronymus multos existimare eorum gehennæ ignibus cruciari, quos multi passim pro sanctis haberent in ecclesia: quid hîc tum diceret Hieronymus, si modò spectasset perstes papisticam hanc sanctorum colluuiem & Calendaria, tot Papis, tot Episcopis, & Abbatibus oblita cerneret?

Quanquam à me quidem non aliter Calendarium hoc institutum est, nisi vt pro Indice duntaxat, suum cuiusque Martyris mensem & annum designante, ad priuatum Lectoris seruiret vsum. Et tamen si in templis etiam fas sit singulorum mensium dies proprijs sanctorum nomenclaturis consignare; quî minus liceat id mihi in veris istis facere Martyribus, quod ipsi in suis pseudomartyribus, tanta sibi licentia, ne dicam impudentia, permiserunt? Si non pœna, sed causa Martyrem faciat, cur non vnum Cranmerum sexcentis Becketis Canturiensibus non conferam, sed prætulerim? Quid in Nicolao Ridleo videtur cum quouis Diuo Nicolao non conferendum? Qui in re Latimerus, Hoperus, Marsheus, Simpsonus, cæteríque Christiani martyrij Candidati, inferiores summis maximísque illis papistici Calendarij Diuis, imo multis etiam nominibus non præponendi videantur? Interim nullius ego boni sanctíque viri (modò qui verè sanctus sit) causam lædo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et si cui hoc displiceat Calendarium, meminerit, non in templis collocari, sed domesticæ tantum lectioni præparari.

Sed missis hisce aduersariorum calumnijs, ad te, docte candidéque Lector (quoniam hæc ad te instituta est epistola) tempus est vt recurrat oratio, cuius in his rebus iudicium vt pluris æstimo, ita egeo magis hîc quoque patrocinio. Scio enim in vasta hac congerie reperies nonnulla, ad quæ meritò corruges frontem. Neque vero fieri facilè potuit, præsertim in tanta operis præcipitatione, vt cuncta ad amussim atq; ad vnguem perfectè adeo elimarentur, quin alicubi vel ex lassitudine dormitaret scriptor, vel per incuriam excideret authori aliquid, vel ex festinatione eueniret, quod cani solet in prouerbijs nimium præ studio properanti, cæcos nimirum producenti catulos. In quibus quidem excutiendis rebus magis nobis venia tua quam censura imploranda est. Quamobrem paucis hæc apud te, docte simul & humanissime Lector, ante operis ingressum libuit ..., vt si quid inter euoluendum occurrerit, non omnibus perfectum numeris, non ad Cleantis lucernam elucubratum, non ad exquisitum Theologorum acumen expressum, aut minus alioqui acutissimis tuis dignum naribus, cogites hæc non tuis auribus data esse, sed meæ, hoc est, crassioris turbæ hominibus, a quibus facilius legantur libri quam iudicantur. Aut si ne id quidem grauissimæ tuæ sententiæ fecerit satis, liceat illa mihi vti lege, qua semper permissum est, opere in magno scriptori obrepere somnum. Quod si verò tuam hac in re facilitatem impetrauero, minus laborabo quid cæteri obstrepant, Græci memor prouerbij, cuius & ipsos commeminisse velim: ...

... à μυρίοις.

TO THE TRVE AND FAITHFVLL CONGREGATION OF CHRISTS VNIVERSALL CHVRCH, with all and singuler the members thereof, wheresoeuer congregated or dispersed thorow the realme of England; a Protestation or Petition of the Author, wishing to the same abundance of all peace and tranquillity, with the speedie coming of Christ the Spouse, to make an end of all mortall miserie.

SAlomon the peaceable prince of Israel, as we reade in the third of Kings, after he had finished the building of the Lords Temple (which he had vij. yeeres in hand) made his petition to the Lord for all that should pray in the said Temple, or turne their face toward it. And his request was granted, the Lord answering him, as we reade in the said book, cap. 6. I haue heard (saith he) thy prayer, and haue sanctified this place, &c. Albeit, the infinite maiestie of God is not to be compassed in any materiall walles, yet it so pleased his goodnes to respect this prayer of the King, that not onely hee promised to heare them which there prayed, but also replenished the same with his owne glory. For so we reade again in the book aforesaid: Et non poterant ministrare propter nebulam, quia replenit gloria domini, domum domini: 3. Reg. 7.

Vpon the like trust in Gods gracious goodnesse, if I sinnefull wretch, not comparing with the building of that Temple, but following the zeale of the builder, might either be so bold to aske, or so happie to speed, after my vij. yeeres trauell about this Ecclesiasticall History, most humbly would craue of almighty God, to bestow his blessing vpon the same, that as the prayers of them, which prayed in the outward Temple, were heard: so all true disposed minds, which shall resort to the reading of this present historie, containing the Acts of Gods holy Martyrs, and Monuments of his Church, may by example of their life, faith and doctrine, receiue some such spirituall fruit to their soules through the operation of his grace, that it may be to the aduancement of his glory, and profit of his Church, through Christ Iesus our Lord: Amen.

But as it happened in that Temple of Salomon, that al which came thither, came not to pray, but many to prate, some to gaze and see newes, other to talke and walke, some to buy and sell, some to carpe and find fault, and finally, some also at the last to destroy and plucke downe, as they did in deed: For what is in this world so strong, but it will be impugned? what so perfect, but it will be abused? so true, that will not be contraried? or so circumspectly done, wherein wrangling Theon will not set in his tooth? Euen so, neither doe I look for any other in this present history; but that amongst many well disposed Readers, some Waspes nest or other will bee stirred vp to buzze about mine eares. Such a dangerous thing it is now adaies to write or doe any good, but either by flattering a man must offend the godly, or by true speaking procure hatred with the wicked. Of such stinging Waspes and buzzing Drones I had sufficient triall in my former edition before; who if they had found in my booke any iust cause to carpe, or vpon any true zeale of truth had proceeded against the vntruths of my story, and had brought iust proofes for the same, I could haue right well abid it. For God forbid, but that faults whersoeuer they be, should be detected and accused. And therefore accusers in a common-wealth, after my mind, do serue to no small stead. But then such accusers must beware they play not the dog, of whom Cicero in his Oration speaketh, which being set in Capitolio to fray away theeues by night, left the theeues, and fell to barke at true men walking in the day. Where true faults be, there to bay and barke is not amisse. But to carpe where no cause is, to spie in other strawes, and leape ouer their own blocks: to swallow Camels, and to straine Gnats: to oppresse truth with lies, and to set vp lies for truth: to blaspheme the deare Martyrs of Christ, and to canonize for Saints, whom Scripture would scarce allow for good Subiects; that is intollerable. Such barking curs, if they were well serued, would be made a while to stoope. But with these brauling spirits I intend not at this time much to wrastle.

Wherefore to leaue them a while, till further leasure serue me to attend vpon them, thus much I thought in the meane season, by way of protestation or petition, to write vnto you, both in generall and particular the true members and faithfull congregation of Christs Church, whersoeuer either congregated together, or dispersed thorow the whole realme of England; that forsomuch as al the seeking of these aduersaries is to doe what they can, by discrediting of this history with slanders and sinister surmises, how to withdraw the readers from it: this therefore shall be in few words to premonish and desire of all and singuler of you (all well minded louers and partakers of Christs Gospel) not to suffer your selues to be deceiued with the big brags, and hyperbolicall speeches of those slandering tongues, whatsoeuer they haue or shall hereafter exclame against the same. But indifferently staying your iudgement till truth bee tried, you will first peruse, and then refuse: measuring the vnsame. But indifferently staying your iudgement till truth bee tried, you will first peruse, and then refuse: measuring the vntruths of this historie, not by the scoring vp of their hundreds and thousands of lies which they giue out, but wisely weighing the purpose of their doings, according as you find, and so to iudge of the matter.

To reade my books I allure neither one nor other. Euery man as he seeth cause, so like as he list. If any shall think his labour too much in reading this story, his choice is free either to reade this, or any other which he more mindeth. But if the fruit therof shall recompence the readers trauell, then would I wish no man so light eared, to be carried away for any sinister clamour of aduersaries, who many times depraue good doings, not for the faults they find, but therfore find faults because they would depraue. As for me and my history, as my will was to profit all and displease none: so if skill in any part wanted to will, yet hath my purpose bin simple, and certes the cause no lesse vrgent also, which mooued me to take this enterprise in hand.

For first, to see the simple flock of Christ, especially the vnlearned sort, so miserably abused, and al for ignorance of historie, not knowing the course of times, and true descent of the Church, it pitied me, that part of diligence so long to haue bin vnsupplied in this my countrie Church of England. Againe, considering the multitude of Chronielers and Storie-writers, both in England and out of England, of whom the most part haue bin either Monkes or Clients to the see of Rome, it grieued me to behold how partially they handled their stories. Whose painefull trauell albeit I cannot but commend, in committing diuers things to writing, not vnfruitfull to bee knowne, nor vnpleasant to be read: yet it lamented me to see in their Monuments the principall points, which chiefly concerned the state of Christs Church, and were most necessarie of all Christian people to bee knowne, either altogether pretermitted, or if any mention thereof were inserted, yet were all things drawne to the honour specially of the Church of Rome, or else to the fauour of their owne sect of Religion. Whereby the vulgar sort, hearing and reading in their writings no other Church mentioned or magnified, but only that Church which here florished in this world in riches and iollity, were drawne also to the same perswasion, to thinke no other Church to haue stood in all the earth, but only the Church of Rome.

In the number of this sort of writers, besides our Monks of England (for euery Monastery almost had his Chronicler) I might also recite both Italian, and other countrie authors, as Platina, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, Martinus, Antoninus, Vincentius, Onuphrius, Lazsardus, Georgius Lilius, Pollyd. Virgilius, with many moe, who taking vpon them to intermeddle with matters of the Church, although in part they expresse some truth in matters concerning the bishops and See of Rome: yet in suppressing another part, they play with vs, as Ananias & Saphira did with their money, or as Apelles did who Plinie, in painting the one halfe of Venus comming out of the sea, left the other halfe vnperfect. So these writers, while they shew vs one halfe of the bishop of Rome, the other half of him they leaue vnperfect, and vtterly vntold. For as they paint him out on the one part glistering in wealth and glorie, in shewing what succession the popes had from the chaire of S. Peter, when they first began, and how long they sate, what Churches, and what famous buildings they erected, how far their possessions reached, what lawes they made, what Councels they called, what honour they receiued of Kings and Emperors, what Princes and Countries they brought vnder their authoritie, with other like stratagems, of great pomp & roialty: so on y other side, what vices these popes brought with them to their seat, what abominations they practised, what superstition they maintained, what Idolatrie they procured, what wicked doctrine they defended contrary to the expresse word of God, to what heresies they fell, into what diuision of sects they cut the vnity of Christian religion, how some practised by Simonie, some by Necromancie and Sorcerie, some by poisoning, some indenting with the diuell to come by their papacie, what hypocrisie was in their liues, what corruption in their doctrin, what warres they raised, what bloud shed they caused, what treacherie they trauersed against their Lords and Emperours, imprisoning some, betraying some to the Templaries and Saracens, in bringing other vnder their feet, also in beheading some, as they did with Fredericus and Conradinus, the heires and offspring of the house of Frederici Barbarossa, an. 1269. Furthermore how mightily almightie God hath stood against them, how their wars neuer prospered against the Turk, how the iudgements of the godly learned from time to time haue euer repugned against their errors, &c. of these and a thousand other moe, not one word hath bin touched, but all kept as vnder Benedicite in auricular confession.

This partiall dealing and corrupt handling of histories, when I considered, I thought with my selfe nothing more lacking in the church, then a ful and a complete historie, which being faithfully collected out of al our Monastical writers and written Monuments, should containe neither euery vaine written fable, for that would be too much, nor yet leaue out any thing necessary, for that would be too little: but with a moderate discretion taking the best of euery one, should both ease the labor of the Reader from turning ouer such a number of writers: and also should open the plaine truth of times lying long hid in obscure darkenesse of antiquitie. Whereby all studious Readers, beholding as in a glasse the state, course, and alteration of religion, decay of doctrin, and the controuersies of the Church, might discerne the better between antiquitie & nouelty. For if the things which be first (after the rule of Tertullian) are to be preferred before those that be latter, then is the reading of histories much necessarie in the Church, to know what went before, and what followed after. And therfore not without cause Historia, in old authors is called the witnes of times, the light of veritie, the life of memorie, teacher of life, and shewer of antiquitie, &c. Without the knowledge whereof mans life is blind, and soone may fal into any kind of error, as by manifest experience we haue to see, in these desolate latter times of the Church, when as the bishops of Rome vnder colour of antiquitie haue turned truth into heresie, and brought such new found deuices of strange doctrin and religion, as in the former age of the church were neuer heard of before, and all through ignorance of times, and for lacke of true historie.

For to say the truth, if times had been well searched, or if they which write histories had without partialitie gone vpright betweene God and Baal, halting on neither side, it might well haue been found, the most part of all this catholick corruption intruded into the Church by the Bishops of Rome, as transubstantiation, eleuation, and adoration of the sacrament, auricular confession, forced vowes of Priests not to marrie, veneration of images, priuat and satisfactorie masses, the order of Gregories masse now vsed, the vsurped authoritie, and Summa potestas of the See of Rome, with all the rout of their ceremonies and weeds of superstition ouergrowing now the Church, all these (I say) to be new nothings lately coined in the mint of Rome without any stampe of antiquity, as by reading of this present historie shal sufficiently, I trust, appeare. Which history therfore I haue here taken in hand, that as other stori-writers heretofore haue imploied their trauel to magnifie the Church of Rome, so in this historie might appeare to all Christian Readers the Image of both Churches, as wel of the one as of the other; especially of the poore oppressed and persecuted Church of Christ. Which persecuted Church; though it had been of long season trodden vnder foot by enemies, neglected in the world, not regarded in histories, & almost scarse visible or known to worldly eies, yet hath it bin the true Church only of God, wherein he hath mightily wrought hitherto in preserving the same in al extreme distresses, continually stirring vp from time to time faithfull ministers, by whom alwaies hath been kept some sparks of his true doctrine and religion.

Image of both Churches.

Now forasmuch as the true Church of God goeth not lightly alone, but is accompanied with some other Church or Chapell of the diuell to deface and maligne the same, necessarie it is therefore the difference betweene them to be seene, and the descent of the right Church to be described from the Apostles time. Which hitherto in most part of histories hath been lacking, partly for feare, that men durst not: partly for ignorance that men could not discerne rightly betweene the one and the other. Who beholding the Church of Rome to be so visible & glorious in the eies of the world, so shining in outward beautie, to beare such a port, to carry such a traine and multitude, and to stand in such high authority, supposed the same to be only the right Catholicke mother. The other, because it was not so visible knowne in the world, they thought therefore it could not be the true Church of Christ. Wherein they were farre deceiued. For although the right Church of God be not so inuisible in the world, that none can see it; yet neither is it so visible againe, that euery worldly eie may perceiue it. For like as is the nature of truth; so is the proper condition of the true Church, that commonly none seeth it, but such onelie, as bee the members and partakers thereof. And therefore they which require that Gods holy Church should bee euident and visible to the whole world, seeme to define the great synagogue of the world rather then the true spirituall Church of God.

The descent of Christs Church from the Apostles time described.

How the true Church of Christ is visible and not visible.

In Christs time who would haue thought but the congregations and councels of the Pharises had been the right Church? and yet had Christ an other Church in earth besides that; which albeit it was not so manifest in the sight of the world, yet was it the onely true Church in the sight of God. Of this Church meant Christ speaking of the Temple, which hee would raise againe the third day. And yet after that the Lord was risen, hee shewed not himselfe to the world, but onelie to his elect which were but few. The same Church after that increased and multiplied mightily among the Iewes, yet had not the Iewes eies to see Gods Church, but did persecute it till at length all their whole nation was destroyed.

After the Iewes, then came the Heathen Emperours of Rome, who hauing the whole power of the world in their hands, did what the world could doe, to extinguish the name and Church of Christ. Whose violence continued the space of three hundred yeeres. All which while the true Church of Christ was not greatly in sight of the world, but rather was abhorred euery where, and yet notwithstanding the same small silly flocke so despised in the world, the Lord highly regarded and mightilie preserued. For although many then of the Christians did suffer death: yet was their death neither losse to them, nor detriment to the Church: but the more they suffered, the more of their bloud increased.

In the time of these Emperours, God raised vp then in this Realme of Britaine diuers worthy Preachers and Witnesses, as Elnanus, Medwinus, Meltiuianus, Amphibolus, Albanus, Aaron, Iulius, and other moe. In whose time the doctrine of faith without mens traditions was sincerely preached. After their death and martyrdome, it pleased the Lord to prouide a generall quietnesse to his Church, whereby the number of his flocke began more to increase.

The antiquity of the Church here in England with the descent of the same.

In this age the followed here in the said land of Britani Fastidius, Nuianus, Patricius, Bacchiarius, Dubricius, Congellus, Kentigernus, Helmotus, Dauid, Daniel, Sampson, Elnodugus, Asaphus, Gildas, Henlanus, Elhodus, Dinothus, Samuel, Ninius, and a great sort mo, which gouerned y Church of Britain by Christian doctrin a long season; albeit the ciuil gouernors for the time, were were then dissolute and careless, as Gildas very sharply doth lay to their charge, and so at length were subdued by the Saxons.

All this while about the space of foure hundred yeeres, Religion remained in Britaine vncorrupt, and the word of Christ truely preached, till about the comming of Austen and of his companions from Rome, many of the said Britaine Preachers were slaine by the Saxons. After that began Christian faith to enter and spring among the Saxons, after a certaine Rochers were slaine by the Saxons. After that began Christian faith to enter and spring among the Saxons, after a certaine Romish sort, yet notwithstanding somewhat more tollerable, then were the times which after followed, through the diligent inmish sort, yet notwithstanding somewhat more tollerable, then were the times which after followed, through the diligent inmisht sort, yet notwithstanding somewhat more tollerable, then were the times which after followed, through the diligent inmisht sort, yet notwithstanding somewhat more tollerable, then were the tymes weiles in the time of Iohn Wickliffe, as Ocliffe, Wickliffe: anno 1376. William Thorp, White, Purney, Patshall, Paine, Gower, Chaucer, Gascoyne, Williams Swinderby, Walter Brute, Roger Dexter, William Santry, about the yeere 1400. Iohn Badby an. 1410. Nicolas Tailer, Richard Wagstaffe, Michael Scrimener, William Smith, Iohn Henry, William Parchmenar, Roger Goldsmith, with an Anchresse called Mathilde in the citie of Leicester, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton Knight, Iohn Beuerley Preacher, Iohn Husse, Ierome of Prage, Schoolemaster, with a number of faithfull Bohemians, and Thaborites not to be told; with whom I might also adioyne Laurentius Valla, and Ioannes Picus, the learned Earle of Mirandula. But what doe I stand vpon recitall of names, which almost are infinite?

Wherefore, if any be so farre beguiled in his opinion to thinke the doctrine of the Church of Rome (as it now standeth) to be of such antiquity, and that the same was neuer impugned before the time of Luther and Zuinglius now of late, let them reade these histories: or if he thinke the said historie not to bee of sufficient credit to alter his perswasion, let him peruse the Acts and Statutes of Parliaments, passed in this Realme of ancient time, and therein consider and conferre the course of times; where he may find and reade, Anno 5. Regis Richardi 2. in the yeere of our Lord, 1380. of a great number (which there bee called euil persons) going about from towne to towne in freese gownes, preaching vnto the people, &c. Which preachers although the words of the Statute doe terme there to be dissembling persons, preaching diuers Sermons containing heresies and notorious errours, to the emblemishment of Christian faith, and of holy Church, &c. as the words doe there pretend: yet notwithstanding euery true Christian Reader may conceiue of those Preachers to teach no other doctrine, then now they heate their owne preachers in pulpits preach, against the bishop of Rome, and the corrupt heresies of his Church.

Statut. in an. 5. Rich. 2. an. Dom. 1380.

Furthermore, he shall find likewise in Statut. An. 2. Henr. 4. cap. 15. in the yeere of our Lord 1402. another like companie of good preachers and faithfull defenders of true doctrine against blind heresie and errour. Whom albeit the words of the Statute there, through corruption of that time, doe falsely terme, to be false and peruerse Preachers, vnder dissembled holinesse, teaching in those daies openly and priuily new doctrines and heretical opinions, contrary to the faith and determination of holy Church; &c. Yet notwithstanding, whosoeuer readeth histories and conferreth the order and descent of times, shall vnderstand these to be no false teachers, but faithful witnesses of the truth, not teaching any new doctrines contrary to the determination of holy Church: but rather shall find that Church to be vnholy, which they preached against, teaching rather it selfe heretical opinions, contrary both to antiquity, and verity of Christs true Catholicke Church.

Ex Statut. in an. 2. Henr. 4. cap. 15. anno Dom. 1402.

Of the like number also, or greater, of like true faithfull fauorers and followers of Gods holy word, we find in the yeere of our Lord 1422. specified in a letter sent from Henrie Chichestie Archbishop of Canturburie, to pope Martin 5. in the fifth yeere of his popedome, where mention is made of so many here in England infected (as he said) with the heresies of Wickliffe and Husse, that without force of an armie they could not be suppressed, &c. Whereupon the pope sent two Cardinals to the Archbishop, to cause a tenth to be gathered of al spirituall and religious men, and the money to be laid in the chamber Apostolicke, and if that were not sufficient, the residue to be made vp of chalices, candlesticks, and other implements of the Church, &c.

What shall need then any more witnesse to prooue this matter, when you see so many yeeres agoe whole armies and multitudes, thus standing against the pope? who though they be termed here for heretikes and schismatickes, yet in that, which they call heresie, serued they the liuing Lord, within the Arke of his true spirituall and visible Church.

And where is then the friuolous brag of the Papists, which make so much of their painted sheath, and would needs beare vs downe, that this gouernment of the Church of Rome which now is, hath been of such an old standing, time out of mind, euen from the primitiue antiquitie, and that neuer was any other Church demonstrable here in earth for men to follow, besides the said only Catholike mother Church of Rome? when as we haue sufficiently prooued before by the continuall descent of the Church til this present time, that the said Church, after the doctrine which is now reformed, is no new begun matter but euen the old continued Church, by the prouidence and promise of Christ, still standing: which albeit it hath been of late yeeres repressed by the tyrannie of Roman Bishops, more then before: yet notwithstanding it was neuer so oppressed, but God hath euer maintained in it the truth of his Gospell, against heresies and errours of the Church of Rome, as in this history more at full is to be seene.

Let vs now proceed farther as we began, deducing this descent of the Church vnto the 1501. yeere. In which yeere the Lord began to shew in the parts of Germany wonderfull tokens, and bloudie markes of his Passion, as the bloudie crosse, his nailes, speare, and crowne of thornes, which fell from heauen vpon the garments and caps of men, and rocks of women, as you may further reade in this booke, pag. 769. By the which tokens almightie God (no doubt) presignified, what grieuous afflictions and bloudie persecutions should then begin to insue vpon his Church for his Gospels sake, according as in this history is described, wherein is to be seene what Christian bloud hath been spilt, what persecutions raised, what tyrannie exercised, what torments deuised, what treachery vsed, against the poore flock and Church of Christ; in such sort as since Christs time greater hath not been seene.

Bloudie markes of Christs passion seene on the garments and rocks in Germanie an. 1501.

And now by reuolution of yeeres, we are come from that time of 1501. to the yeere now present, 1570. In which the full seuentie yeeres of the Babylonicall captiuity draweth now wel to an end, if we count from the first appearing of these bloudy markes aboue mentioned. Or if we reckon from the beginning of Luther, and his persecution, then lacketh yet xvj. yeeres. Now what the Lord will doe with this wicked world, or what rest he will giue to his Church after these long sorrowes, he is our Father in heauen, his will be done in earth, as seemeth best to his diuine maiestie.

Seuenty yeres of captiuity well neere expired.

In the meane time, let vs for our parts with all patient obedience waite vpon his gratious leisure, and glorifie his holy name, and edifie one another with all humilitie. And if there cannot be an end of our disputing, and contending one against another: yet let there be a moderation in our affections. And forasmuch as it is the good will of our God, that Satan thus should be let loose amongst vs for a short time: yet let vs striue in the meane while what we can to amend the malice of the time with mutuall humanitie. They that be in error, let them not disdaine to learne. They which haue greater talents of knowledge committed, instruct in simplicitie them that be simple. No man liueth in that common-wealth where nothing is amisse: but yet because God hath so placed vs Englishmen here in one common-wealth, also in one Church, as in one ship together: let vs not mangle or diuide the ship, which being diuided perisheth: but euery man serue in his order with diligence, wherein he is called. They that sit at the helme, keepe well the point of the needle, to know how the ship goeth, and whither it should. Whatsoeuer weather betideth, the needle wel touched with the stone of Gods word will neuer faile. Such as labour at the oares, start for no tempest, but do what they can to keepe from the rocks. Likewise, they which be in inferiour roomes, take heed they moue no sedition, nor disturbance against the rowers and mariners. No storme so dangerous to a ship on the Sea, as is discord and disorder in a weale publike, What Countries and Nations, what Kingdoms and Empires, what Cities, Townes, and houses discord hath dissolued, in stories is manifest: I needs not spend time in rehearsing examples. The Lord of peace, who hath power both of land and Sea, reach forth his mercifull hand to helpe them vp that sinke, to keepe them vp that stand, to still these winds and surging seas of discord and contention among vs: that we professing one Christ, may in one vnity of doctrine gather our selues into one Ark of the true Church together, where we continuing stedfast in faith, may at the last luckely be conducted to the ioyfull port of our desired landing place, by his heauenly grace. To whom both in heauen and in earth be all power and glory, with his father and the holy spirit for euer. Amen.

Exhortation to the Church of England.

THE VTILITIE OF THIS Storie.

SEeing the world is replenished with such an infinite multitude of bookes of all kind of matters, I may seeme (perhaps) to take a matter in hand superfluous and needlesse, at this present to set out such volumes, especially of histories, considering now adaies the world is so greatly pestered, not only with superfluous plentie thereof, but of all other Treatises, so that bookes now seeme rather to lacke Readers, then Readers to lacke bookes: In which multitude of bookes, I doubt not, but many do both perceiue, and inwardly bewaile this insatiable boldnesse of many now adaies both in writing and printing; which to say the truth, for my part I do as much lament, as any man else beside: and would therefore no man should thinke that vnadusedly or with rathnesse I haue attempted this enterprise, as one being not only doubtfull, but also both bashfull and fearefull within my selfe for setting the same abroad. And why? first I perceiued how learned this age of ours is in reading of bookes, neither could I tell what the secret iudgements of readers would conceiue, to see so weake a thing, to set vpon such a weightie enterprise, not sufficiently furnished with such ornaments able to satisfie the perfection of so great a storie, or sufficient to serue the vtilitie of the studious, and the delight of the learned. Which abilitie the more I perceiued to be wanting in me, the lesse I durst be bold to become a writer.

But againe on the other side, when I weighed with my selfe what memorable acts and famous doings this latter age of the Church hath ministred vnto vs by the patient sufferings of the worthie Martyrs; I thought it not to be neglected, that so precious Monuments of so many matters, meet to be recorded and registred in bookes, should lie buried by my default vnder darkenesse of oblivion. We thought somewhat was to be said of them for their well deseruing, and something against of our parts for benefits by them receiued. But aboue all other things, nothing did so much stirre me forward hereunto, as the diligent consideration and speciall regard of the common vtilitie which euery man plentifully may receiue by the reading of these Monuments or Martyrologe: which historie as I haue taken in hand chiefly for the vse of the English Church: so haue I framed it in that tongue which the simple people could best vnderstand.

Now if men commonly delite so much in other Chronicles which intreat only vpon matters of policie, and reioyce to behold therein the variable euents of worldly affaires, the Stratagems of valiant Captaines, the terroz of foughten fields, the sacking of cities, the burly burlies of Realmes and people: And if men thinke it such a gay thing in a common-wealth, to commit to historie such old antiquities of things prophane, and bestow all their ornaments of wit and eloquence in garnishing the same, how much more then is it meet for Christians to conserue in remembrance, the liues, acts and doings, not of bloudie warriers, but of milde and constant Martyrs of Christ, which serue not so much to delight the eare, as to garnish the life, to frame it with examples of great profit, and to encourage men to all kind of Christian godlinesse? As first, by reading thereof, we may learne a liuely testimonie of Gods mightie working in the life of man, contrarie to the opinion of Atheists, and all the whole nest of Epicures. For like as one said of Harpalus in times past, that his doings gaue a liuely testimonie against God, because he being so wicked a man escaped so long vnpunished: so contrariwise, in these men we haue a much more assured and plaine witnesse of God, both in their liues and deaths appeared such manifest declarations of Gods diuine working, whiles in such sharpnesse of torments we behold in them strength, so constant aboue mans reach, such readinesse to answere, such patience in imprisonment, such godlinesse in forgiuing, chereefulnesse so courageous in suffering, besides the manifold sense and feeling of the holy Ghost, which they in their liues so plentifully tasted in their afflictions, as in reading of their letters euidently we may vnderstand. Diuers and besides this, the milde deaths of the Saints do not a little auaile to the stablishing of a good conscience, to learne the contempt of the world, and to come to the feare of God. Moreouer, they confirme faith, increase godlinesse, abate pride in prosperitie, and in aduersitie do open an hope of heauenly comfort. For what man reading the miserie of these godly persons, may not therein, as in a glasse behold his owne case, whether he be godly or godlesse? For if God giue aduersitie vnto good men, what may either the better sort promise themselues, or the euill not feare? And whereas by reading of prophane stories, we are made perhaps more skilfull in warlike affaires: so by reading of this we are made better in our liuings, and besides are better prepared vnto the like conflicts, (if by Gods permission they shall happen hereafter) more wise by their doctrine, and more stedfast by their example.

Comparison betweene worldlie soulders, and the soulders of Christ.

To be short, they declare to the world what true Christian fortitude is, and what is the right way to conquer, which standeth not in the power of man, but in hope of the resurrection to come, and is now, I trust, at hand. In consideration whereof, me thinkes I haue good cause to wish, that like as other subiects, euen so also Kings and Princes, which commonly delite in heroicall stories, would diligently peruse such Monuments of Martyrs, and lay them alwaies in sight, not alonely to reade, but to follow, and would paint them vpon their walles, cups, rings and gates. For doubtlesse such as these, are more worthie of honor then an hundred Alexanders, Hectors, Scipions, and warlike Iulies. And though the world iudgeth preposterously of things, yet with God, the true Iudge, certes such are to be reputed in deed, not that kill one another with a weapon, but they which being rather killed in Gods cause, do retaine an inuincible constancie against the threats of tyrants, and violence of tormentors. Such as these, are indeed the true Conquerours of the world, by whom we learne true manhood, so many as fight vnder Christ, and not vnder the world. With this valiantnesse did that most milde Lambe and inuincible Lion of the tribe of Iuda first of all go before vs, of whose vnspeakeable fortitude we heare this Prophetical admiration: Who is this (saith he) which walketh so in the multitude of his strength? For so saith the high Sonne of the high God, once conquered of the world, and yet conquering the world after the same maner he was conquered. Esay 63.

The like dance did all his other Martyrs follow, to whom the ancient antiquitie of the Church did attribute so great honor, as neuer king or emperour could purchase in this world with all their images, pillers, high spires, triumphs, temples, and all their solemne feasts. In probation whereof we see, with what admiration, and almost superstition, not only the memorie, but also the reliques of those good Martyrs were receiued and kept amongst the ancient Christians. We haue also for witnesse the learned Hymnes and songs of Prudentius and Nazianzen, wherewith Pindarus did neuer so much set out his triumphs of Olympia and Nemea. I need not heere rehearse the learned Orations of eloquent Cyprian, Chrysostome, Ambrose and Hierome, who neuer shewed their eloquence more, then when they fell into the commendations of the godly Martyrs.

Whereby it is manifest, what estimation in times past was attributed to Martyrs: with what gratulation, reioyce, mirth, and common ioy the afflictions of those godly, dying in Christs quarrell, were sometime receiued and solemnized; and that not without good reasonable cause. For the Church did well consider how much the was beholding to their benefits, by whose death the vnderstood her treasures to increase. Now then if Martyrs are to be compared with Martyrs, I see no cause why the Martyrs of our time deserue any lesse commendation, then the other in the Primitiue Church, which assuredly are inferiour vnto them in no point of praise: whether we view the number of them that suffered, or greatnesse of their torments, or their constancie in dying: or also consider the fruit that they brought to the amendment of posteritie, and increase of the Gospell. They did water the truth with their blod, that was newly springing vp: so these by their deaths restored it against, being sore decayed and fallen downe. They standing in the forward of the battell, did receiue the first encounter and violence of their enemies, and taught vs by that meanes to ouercome such tyrannie: these with like courage againe, like old beaten soulders did winne the field in the reteward of the battell. They like famous husbandmen of the world did sow the fields of the Church, that first lay vnmanured and waste: these with fatnesse of their blod did cause it to batten and fructifie. Would to God the fruit might be spedily gathered into the barne; which only remaineth behind to come.

Comparison betweene the Martyrs of the Primitiue Church, and of the latter Church.

Now

How, if we ascribe such reputation to godly Preachers (and worthily) which diligently preach the Gospell of Christ, when they liue not withstanding by the benefit of time, without all feare of persecution: how much more reasonable cause haue we to praise and extoll such men as stoutly spend their liues for the defence of the same? All these premisses duely of our parts considered and marked, seeing we haue found so famous Martyrs in this our age, let vs not faile then in publishing and setting forth their doings, lest in that point we seeme more vnkind to them, then the writers of the Primitiue Church were vnto theirs. And though we repute not their ashes, chaines and swords in the stead of reliques: yet let vs yeeld thus much vnto their commemoration, to glorifie the Lord in his Saints, and imitate their death (as much as we may) with like constancie, or their liues at the least with like innocencie. They offered their bodies willingly to the rough handling of the tormentors: and is it so great a matter then for our part, to mortifie our flesh, with all the members thereof? They neglected not only the riches and glorie of the world for Christ, but also their liues: and shall we then keepe so great a thirst one against another, for the transitorie trifles of this world? They continued in patient suffering, when they had most wrong done vnto them, and when their verie hearts blood gushed out of their bodies: and yet will not we forgiue our poore brother, be the iniurie neuer so small, but are readie for euery trifling offence to seeke his destruction, and cut his throat. They wishing well to all men, did of their owne accord forgiue their persecutors: and therefore ought we, which are now the posteritie and children of Martyrs, not to degenerate from their former steps, but being abundantly furnished by their examples, if we cannot expresse their charity toward al men, yet at least to imitate the same to our power and strength. Let vs giue no cause of offence to any. And if any be giuen to vs, let vs ouercome it with patience, forgiuing and not reuenging the same. And let vs not only keepe our hands from shedding of blod, but our tongues also from hurting the fame of others. Besides, let vs not thinke, if cause so require, martyrdom or losse of life, according to their example, to yeeld vp the same in the defence of the Lords flock. Which thing if men would do, much lesse contention and bustines would be in the world then now is. And thus much touching the vtilitie and fruit to be taken of this historie.

TO

TO ALL THE PROFESSED FRIENDS AND FOLLOWERS OF THE POPES proceedings, foure Questions propounded.

Foure Demaundes or questions put forth to the Papists.

YOu all and singuler, which professe the doctrine and religion of the Pope, your holy father, & of your mother Church of Rome, pretending the name of Catholikes, commonly tearmed Papists, wheresoeuer abiding in the Realme of England, these foure Questions or Problemes hereunder following I would moue, desiring you al either to muse vpon them, or to answere them at your leisure.

¶ The first Question.

The first question. Esay 11.65.

FIrst, for so much as mount Sion (which God calleth by the Prophet Esay, the hill of his holinesse) beareth in the Scripture an vndoubted type of the spirituall Church of Christ: and for so much as the said Esay, chapter eleuenth, and sixtie fifth, prophesying of the said mount Sion, saith in these words: Non nocebunt, neque affligent in omni monte sancto meo, dicit Dominus, &c. That is, They shall not kill nor hurt, in all my holy hill, saith the Lord, &c. And againe in the same chapters, thus we rede: Habitabit Lupus cum Agno; & Pardus cum hœdo accubabit: Vitulus, & Leo & Ouis vna commorabuntur, & puellus paruulus ducet eos, &c. That is, The Wolfe shall dwell with the Lambe, and the Leopard with the Kid: the Calfe, the Lion and the Shæpe shall feed together, and a yong child shall rule them. The Cow also and the Beare shall abide together with their yong ones, and the Lion shall eat chaffe and fodder like the Oxe, &c.

Obiection.

Vpon these premisses now followeth my question: How the Church of Rome can be answerable to this hill of Sion; seeing in the same Church of Rome is, and hath been now so many yeares such killing and slaying, such crueltie and tyrannie shewed, such burning and spilling of Christian blod, such malice and mischiefe wrought, as in reading these histories may to al the world appeare.

Refutation.

To this if they answere, and expound these words of the Prophet, as pertaining to the Church triumphant, thereunto I replie againe: that by the words in the same place and in the same sentence expressed, that sense cannot stand, for as much as the Prophet in the very same place, where he prophesieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy mountaine without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the earth, and sheweth also the cause of that godly peace. Because (saith he) the earth is replenished with knowledge and science of the Lord, &c. ibid. And furthermore, the Prophet speaking of the same day when this shall be, addeth saying: In that day the rot of Iesse shall stand for a signe to the people, for the Gentiles to be conuerted, and to seeke vnto him, &c. Which day in no wise can be applied to the Church in heauen triumphant, but only here militant in earth.

Publike execution of lawes not forbidden in Scripture.

Touching which place of Esay, further here is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable mount Sion (which comprehendeth both the states, as well ecclesiastical as temporall) is not restrained the publike penaltie of godlawes needfull to be executed vpon publike malefactors; but here is restrained the fiercenesse, reuenge, crueltie, and violence of mens affections. To which affections men being commonly subiect by nature, though grace and working of the Gospell are altered, reformed, and changed to another disposition: from stoutnesse to softnesse, from violence to sufferance, from fiercenesse to forbearing, from pride to humilitie, from crueltie to compassion, from vnlinesse to simplicitie, from solemne singularitie to humanitie and meekenesse. Which vertues, if they had been in the Church of Rome (according to the rule of Saint Paul, which willeth men that be stronger, to beare with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the spirit of meekenesse, &c. Rom. 15. Galath. 6.) I should not haue needed now at this time to write such a long historie, as this, of the suffering of so many Martyrs.

The conditions and properties of the true Church of Christ. Rom. 15. Galath. 6.

¶ The second Question.

The second question.

MY second question is this; to demand of you Catholike professors of the Popes sect, which so deadly maligne and persecute the Protestants professing the Gospell of Christ; What iust or reasonable cause haue you to alleage for this your extreame hatred ye beare vnto them, that neither you your selues can abide to liue with them, nor yet will suffer them to liue amongst you? If they were Iewes, Turkes or Infidels, or in their doctrine were any idolatrous impietie, or detestable iniquitie in their liues: if they went about any deadly destruction, or priuie conspiracies to oppresse your liues, or by fraudulent dealing to circumuent you; then had you some cause to complaine, and also to reuenge. Now seeing in their doctrine ye haue neither blasphemie, idolatrie, superstition nor mischeefe to obiect vnto them: seeing they are baptised in the same beliefe, and beleeue the same articles of the Creed, as ye do: hauing the same God, the same Christ and Sauiour, the same Baptisme, and are readie to conferre with you in all kind of Christian doctrine, neither do refuse to be tried by any place of the Scripture: how then riseth this mortall malice of you against them? If you thinke them to be heretikes, then bring forth if ye can, any one sentence which they arrogantly hold, contrarie to the mind of holy Scripture: expounded by the censure of most ancient Doctors. Or what is there in all the Scripture to be required, but they acknowledge and confesse the same? See and trie the order of their liues and doings; what great fault find you? They serue God, they walke vnder his feare, they obey his law, as men may do: and though they be transgressors toward him, as other men are, yet toward you what haue they done, what haue they committed or deserued, why you should be so bitter against them?

The deadly hatred of the Papists against the Protestants, grounded vpon no iust cause nor deseruing.

What offended the poore inhabitants of Merindoll and Cabriers, when the Bishop of Aix, the Cardinall of Tenon, and other Bishops of France wresting from Francis the French King a Commission, sent Minerius with his Captaine Iohn de Cay, to destroy their countrey, anno 1530. who driuing the poore people there into a Barne full of straw, set the Barne on fire, and burned vp men, women and children? And likewise in a Church, exercised the like crueltie vpon them, where were murdered the same time to the number of a thousand yong and old, women, children and yong infants, besides seuen whole townes, with the most part of the dwellers therein, being murdered and burnt in the said countrie of Prouence.

Malice and crueltie of Papists against the Citizens of Tholouse in France.

Also before that, what offended the Citizens of Tholouse and Auinion, when Pope Gregorie the ninth set Lewes the French King to warre against them, and against Raymundus their Earle, without cause, where also the said King died at the siege?

Malice and crueltie of Papists against the Protestats in the towne of Merindoll.

Or to speake of latter yeares, what hurt or harme did the poore Protestants in the towne of Mally, who peaceable being at a Sermon, were miserable slaine and cut, men, women and children, by the Duke of Gupes and his armed souldiers? besides other infinite examples almost not to be numbred of like crueltie, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Germany, France, and now of late in Flanders, and in other countries moe.

Malice and crueltie of Papists against the Protestats in the towne of Mally. Clemencie and mercie shewed to Papists in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth.

But to let other countries passe, let vs turne now to the peaceable gouernment in this realme of England, vnder this our so milde and gratious Queene now presently raigning. Vnder whom you see how gently you are suffered, what mercie is shewed vnto you: how quietly ye liue. What lacke you, that you would haue, hauing almost the best rowmes and offices in all the realme, not only without any losse of life, but also without any feare of death. And though a few of your Arch-clerkes be in custodie; yet in how gentle custodie they are, that many a good Protestant in the realme would be glad with all their hearts to change rowmes and diet with them, if they might. And albeit some other for their pleasure haue slipt ouer the seas; if their courage to see countries abroad did so allure them, who could let them: yet this is certaine, no dread there was of death that draue them. For what Papist haue you seene in all this land to lose either life or limbe for Papistry, during all these twelue yeares hitherto since this Queenes raigne? And yet all this notwithstanding, hauing no cause to complaine, so many causes to giue God thankes, ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and mutter, and are not pleased with peace, nor satisfied with safetie, but hope for a day, and faine would haue a change. And to preuent your desired day, ye haue conspired, and risen vp in open rebellion against your Prince, whom the Lord hath set vp to be your Gouernour.

The treacherous murdering of the Lord Iames, Regent of Scotland, Murray. The chiefe cause of all these latter persecutions in the Church, to onely the priuate quarell of the Bishop of Rome.

And as you haue since that, now of late disturbed the quiet and peaceable State of Scotland, in murdering most traytorously the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in sparing the Queenes life there when he had her in his hands, hath now therefore lost his owne) so with like furie, as by your rebellion appeareth, would disturbe the golden quiet and tranquillitie of this Realme of England, if ye might haue your wiles. Which the mercifull grace of the Almightie, for Christ his Sonnes sake our Lord, forfend and vtterly disappoint, Amen.

Wherefore these premises considered, my question is to aske of you and know, what iust or reasonable cause ye haue of these your vnreasonable doings, of this your so mortall and deadly hatred, furie and malice you beare against these your euen-christen, of these your tumults, conturations, gaping and hoping, rebellions, mutterings, and murders, therewith you trouble and ned, of these your tumults, conturations, gaping and hoping, rebellions, mutterings, and murders, wherewith you trouble and disquiet the whole world? Of all which mischeefes, if the true cause were well knowne, the truth would be found doubtlesse to be none other but only the priuate cause of the Bishop of Rome, that he is not receiued, and the dignitie of his church exalted.

Touching

Touching which cause how unreasonable and vniust it is, more shall be said (the Lord willing) in replie, according as I shall see their answere, if it shall so please them, or any of them to answere this question. In the meane time, this for a tryall note shall suffice: that it standeth not with the Scripture, but contrarie to the Scripture, that the Bishop of Rome should so reuenge his owne priuate cause. If this rule and plantation be good and of God, why doth he not referre it vnto God? And no doubt, but if it be so, God will maintaine it, though the whole world said no. If it be otherwise, it will fall and be rooted out, though all the world said yea. Yea the greatest argument to proue this plantation of the Popes supremacie not to be of God, is, that the Pope fighting in his owne priuate cause, by outward and worldly force seeketh his owne glorie. Christ our Saviour being heere refused himselfe, yet neither reuenged his owne cause, nor sought his owne glorie, but only the glorie and will of his Father, thus speaking of himselfe: Siego glorifico meipsum, gloria mea nihil est; Pater meus est, qui glorificat me, &c. Ioh. 8. That is: If I glorifie my self, my glorie is nothing; my Father is he that glorifieth me, &c. Euen so I say with Scripture, that if the Popes proceedings were planted of God, he would not so wrastle for his glorie, as he doth. But for so much as he seeketh by such cruelties and bloudshed to exalt himselfe, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he shall be brought low, &c. Luke 18.

¶ The third Question.

The third question. Apocal. 13. The two beasts of the booke of Reuelation described.

My third question I take of the thirteenth Chapter of the booke of Reuelation. Which booke as it containeth a Prophetical history of the Church; so likewise it requireth by histories to be opened. In this historie mention is made, first, of a certaine beast risen out of the sea, hauing seuen heads and ten hornes, with ten diademes of blasphemie. Vnto the which beast, the dragon, the comming out of the sea, hauing seuen heads and ten hornes, with ten diademes of blasphemie. Vnto the which beast, the dragon, the diuell, gaue his strength, and great power to fight against the Saints, and to ouercome them, and to make fortie two moneths: of the which beast, one of his heads was wounded at length to death, &c.

The second beast with the hornes like a Lambe.

After this immediatly in the same Chapter, mention followeth of another beast, rising out of the land, hauing two hornes like a lambe, and spake like a dragon, and did all the power of the former beast before his face, and caused all dwellers of the earth to worship the beast: whose head was wounded, and lined. Who also had power to giue spirit and life to the said former beast, to make the Image of the beast to speake, and to cause all men from the highest to the lowest, to take the marke of the beast in their hands and foreheads; and whosoeuer worshipped not the Image of the beast, should be killed, &c.

Vpon this description of these two beasts riseth my question; wherein I desire all Papists, from the highest to the lowest, either to answere, or to consider with themselues, what the spirit of the prophecie meaneth by the said two beasts. Neither is the mysterie of this prophecie so obscure, but being historically, by histories it may be explained and easily expounded. Writing therefore to the Papists, as men expert in histories, my question is this: that seeing the prophecie of these two beasts must needs prefigure some people or dominion in the world, of some high estate and power; they will now declare vnto vs, what people or domination this should be. Which if they will do plainly and truly, according to the markes and properties of the said two beasts here set forth, they must needs be driuen of force inuitable to grant and confesse, the same only to agree to the Citie and Empire of Rome, and to no other: Which by these reasons following of necessitie must needs be concluded.

The mysterie of the first beast rising out of the sea, applied.

First, the beast which came out of the sea, hauing the strength, the seat, and power of the great Dragon (the Diuell, called the Prince of this world) committed to him, who also had power giuen ouer all tribes, nations, languages, people and countries in the world besides: and this must needs be an Empire or Monarchie of great force, passing all other Monarchies in the world besides: and this must needs argue the Empire of Rome and none other.

The Image of the beast resembled to the Monarchie of Rome. Apocal. 13.

Secondly, in that the beast had seuen heads, and ten hornes, with ten diademes full of blasphemie vpon them: those seuen heads being expounded in the said booke, chapter seuenteenth, for seuen hilles, notoriously inpointed the citie of Rome, wherein were seuen hilles contained. The like also may be thought of the ten hornes, being there expounded for ten Kings (signifying be like the ten Prouinces or kingdomes of the world subdued to the Roman Empire) with ten crownes of blasphemie vpon their heads: all which conueniently agree to the citie of Rome.

Of these fortie two months, and the resistation thereof, reade page 90.

Thirdly, where the said beast had power to make fortie two months, and to fight against the Saints, and to ouercome them, &c. thereby most manifestly is declared the Empire of Rome, with the heathen persecuting Emperours, which had power giuen the space of so many months, (that is, from Dioclesian to Licinius, 294. yeeres) to persecute Christs Church, as in the Table of the primitiue Church hereafter following, is discoursed more at large.

The wounded head of the beast in the Reuelation, what it meaneth.

Fourthly, where the Prophet speaketh of the one of the heads of the beast to be wounded to death, and the wound afterward to be cured againe: by that he hath vnderstand the decay and subuersion of the citie of Rome and of Italy, which being one of the heads of the Roman Monarchie, was subdued by the Gothes, Vandals, and Lombardes, and the citie of Rome thrice sacked and taken, betweene the raigne of Honorius Emperour of Rome, and the time of Iustinian Emperour of Constantinople; and so remained this head of Rome wounded a long time vnder the dominion of the Lombards, til at length this wound was cured againe.

The second beast rising out of the land, pretending the horns of a Lambe, what it meaneth.

Power to do the workes of the beast before his sight. Apocal. 13.

Christian religion by the Scripture, as necessary in a Christian man, for remission of sinnes and saluation, saue only the two Sacramentall ceremonies of outward Baptisme, and of the Lords Supper: Howbeit neither these also as they are corporall, that is to say, neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other, conferreth remission of sinnes, nor saluation, but only are visible shewes of inuisible and spirituall benefits. And furthermore, if our God whom wee serue, be spirituall; how can his religion and seruice be corporall, as we are taught by the mouth of our Sauiour, saying: God is a spirit, and therefore they that worship him, must worship in spirit and verity, &c. John 4.

Religion of Christ spirituall, and not corporall.

Now if ye grant (as ye must needs) this our Christian religion to be spirituall, and not a corporall religion, then shew, if ye can, any one point of all these things which ye striue so much with vs, to be spirituall, but altogether corporall, and externe matters and ceremoniall obseruations, nothing conducing to any spirituall purpose, as your outward succession of bishops, garnentes, vestures, gestures, colours, choise of meates, difference of dates, times and places, hearing, seeing, saying, touching, tasting, numbring of beades, gilding and worshipping Images, building monasteries, rising at midnight, silence in cloisters, abstaining from flesh and white meate, fasting in Lent, keeping Imberdaies, hearing masse, and diuine seruice, seeing and adoring the body in forme of bread, receiuing holy water, and holy bread, creeping to the crosse, carying palmes, taking ashes, bearing candles, pilgrimage-going, censing, kneeling, knocking, altars, superaltars, candlesticks, pardons: In others, crolling, anointing, chaining, forswearing mariage: In baptisme, crossing, salting, spetling, exorcising, washing of hands: At Easter, eare-confession, penaunce-doing, satisfaction: And in receiuing, with beards new shauen, to imagine a body, where they see no body: and though hee were there present to be seene, yet the outward seeing and touching of him, of it selfe, without faith, conduceth no more, then it did to the Iewes. At Rogation daies, to carrie banners, to follow the crosse, to walke about the fields. After Pentecost, to goe about with Corpus Christi play. At Halowmas to watch in the church, to say a dirige, and commemorations, and to ring for all soules, to pay tithes truely, to giue to the high altar. And if a man will be a priest, to lay masse and mattens, to serue the saint of that day, and to list well ouer his head, &c. In sicknesse to be annelled, to take his rites; after his death to haue funerals, and obites said for him, and to bee rung for at his funerall, moneth mind, and yeere mind, &c. Adde moreouer to these the outward sacrifice of the masse, with opus operatum sine bono motu utentis, &c.

The pope turneth the spirituall religion of Christ to a corporall religion.

All which things aboue recited, as they containe the whole summarie and effect of all the popes catholicke religion: so are they all corporall exercises, consisting in the externe operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right Catholicke Christian, their it may be said, that men may bee made perfect Christians by flesh and blood, without any inward working of faith, or of the holy Ghost. For what is in all these, but that flesh and blood of his strength is able to accomplish, though no inward strength or motion of the holy Ghost did worke?

The whole summe of the popes Catholicke religion set forth in parts.

But now the order of our religion, and way of saluation consisteth not in such corporall or outward things as these, but in or that more high and more spirituall gifts, which farre exceed the capacitie of flesh and blood: of the which gifts the chiefest and onely maine cause that saueth man, and remitteth sinnes, is his faith in Christ. Which faith I thus define; for a man to beleeue by the bloodshedding of Iesus the sonne of God, his sinnes to be forgiuen, Gods wrath to be pacified, and himselfe to be iustified perfectly from all accusations that can be laid vnto him, &c. And though the papists make a light matter of this, to beleeue in Christ, and when they heare vs say, that faith onely iustifieth, they obiect to vs againe and make it a small matter to be saued, if faith only iustifie vs: yet notwithstanding, this faith, if it bee well examined, is such a thing that flesh and blood is not able to attaine thereto, vnlesse Gods holy spirit from aboue doe draw him.

A man may be Catholicke by the popes religion without any working of the holy Ghost.

The nature of true Christian religion described.

Moreouer, besides this faith, many other things are incident also to the doctrine of our saluation. Albeit as no causes thereof, but either as Sacraments and seales of faith, or as declarations thereof, or else as fruits and effects following the same. So Baptisme, and the supper of the Lord be as testimonies and proofes; that by our faith onely in Christ wee are iustified; that as our bodies are washed by water, and our life nourished by bread and wine: so by the blood of Christ, our sins be purged, and the hunger of our soules relieued by the death of his body.

Iustification of man, standeth only in faith of Christ. Faith in Christ no light matter to dye and bleed.

Many things incident to saluation besides faith: but not as causes thereof. Workes of sanctification, how they come and follow faith. Esay 58. Matth. 25.

Vpon the same faith riseth also outward profession by mouth, as a declaration thereof. Other things also as fruits and effects to follow after faith, as peace of conscience, ioy in the holy Ghost, inuocation, patience, charity, mercy, iudgement, and sanctification. For God for our faith in Christ his sonne, therefore giueth into our hearts his holy spirit of comfort, of peace, and sanctification, whereby mans heart is moued to a godly disposition to feare God, to seeke him, to call vpon him, to trust vnto him, to sticke to him in all aduersities and persecutions, to loue him; and for his sake also to loue our brethren, to haue mercy and compassion vpon all, and consisteth in faith, and in no other.

And therefore vpon the same cause I come to my question againe, as I began, to aske whether the religion of Christ be a meere spirituall religion: and whether in the religion of Rome, as it is now, is any thing but onely meere corporall things required, to make a catholicke man. And thus I leaue you to your answere.

IN turning ouer the first leafe of this booke, which is page 2. col. 2. and in the beginning of the same columne, thou shalt find, gentle Reader, the argument of Pighius and Hosius, wherein thus they argue: That forsomuch as Christ must needs haue a Catholicke church euer continuing here in earth, which all men may see, and whereunto all men ought to resort: and seeing no other church hath endured continually from the Apostles, visible here in earth, but only the church of Rome: they conclude therefore, the church onely of Rome to be the right Catholicke church of Christ, &c.

In answering whereunto, this is to be said: that forsomuch as the medius terminus of this argument both in the Maior & Minor, is conditionally onely in the word (visible and vnknowne) if they meane by this word (visible) in the Maior, that Christs church must bee such, then is the Minor false: Like wise, if they meane by the same word (visible) in the Minor, that the same church hath been seene and knowne to any, but onely the church of Rome, they are likewise deceiued. For that no other church hath been seene and knowne to any, but only the church of Rome, shall appeare by the true church of Christ neither is so visible, that all the worldean see it, but onely they which haue spiritual eyes, and bee members thereof: nor yet so inuisible againe, but such as bee Gods elect, and members thereof, doe see it and know it, though the worldly eyes of the most multitude cannot so doe, &c. Whereof reade more in the protestation aboue prefixed to the church of England.

Martyrs, and matters Ecclesiasticall, passed in the Church of Christ, from the Primitiue beginning, to these our dayes, as well in other Countries, as namely in this Realme of England, and also of Scotland, discoursed at large.

And first, the difference betweene the church of Rome that now is, and the ancient church of Rome that then was.

Matth. 16.

CHRIST our Sauiour in the gospel of S. Matth. ca. 16. hearing the confession of Simon Peter, the first of all other openly acknowledged him to be the son of God, perceiuing the secret hand of his father therin, answered again alluding to his name, called him a rock, vpon which rock he would build his church so strong that the gates of hell should not preuaile against it, &c. In which words 3. things are to be noted. First, that Christ will haue a church in this world. Secondlie, that the same church should mightily be impugned, not only by the world, but also by the vttermost strength & powers of all hel. And thirdly, that the same church notwithstanding the vttermost of the diuell and all his malice should continue. Which prophecie of Christ we see wonderfullie to be verified. Insomuch that the whole course of the church to this day, may seem nothing else but a verifieng of the said prophecie. First, that Christ hath set vp a church needeth no declaration. Secondly, what force, what sides and fortes of men, of princes, kings, monarchs, gouernors, & rulers of this world, with their subiects publikely & priuatly, with all their strength and cunning haue bent themselues against this church. And thirdly, how the said church, all this notwithstanding, hath yet endured and holden his owne. What stormes and tempests it hath ouerpast, wonderous it is to behold. For the more euident declaration whereof, I haue addressed this present historie, intending by the fauourable aid of Christ our Lord, not so much to delight the eares of my country in reading of newes, as most specially to profit the hearts of the godlie in perusing antiquities of ancient times, to the end that the wonderfull workes of God, first in his church, might appeare to his glory. Also that the continuance and procedings of the church from time to time being set forth in these Acts & Monuments, more knowledge and experience may redound thereby to the profit of the reader, and edification of christian faith.

Three things noted in Christes words.

The order of the disposition of this historie.

For the better accomplishing whereof, so to prosecute the matter, as may best serue to the profit of the reader: I haue thought good first, beginning from the time of the primitiue church, and so continuing (by the Lords grace) to these latter yeares, to run ouer the whole state and course of the church in generall, in such order as digesting the whole tractation of this historie, into fiue sundrie diuersities of times.

The suffering time of the church.
The flourishing time of the church.
The declining time of the church.

1. First I will intreat of the suffering time of the church, which continued from the Apostles age about three hundred yeares.

2. Secondlie, of the flourishing time of the church, which lasted other three hundred yeres.

3. Thirdly, of the declining or backsliding time of the church, which comprehendeth other three hundred yeares, vntill the lowsing out of Sathan, which was about the thousand yeare after the ceasing of persecution. During which space of time, the church, although in ambition and pride it was much altered from the simple sincerities of the primitiue time, yet in outward profession of doctrine and religion, it was something tolerable, and had some face of a church: notwithstanding some corruption of doctrine, with superstition and hypocrisie was then also crept in. And yet in comparison of that as followed after, it might seeme (as I said) something sufferable.

The time of antichrist in the church.

4. Fourthlie, followeth the time of antichrist, and losing of Sathan, or desolation of the church, whose full swinge conteineth the space of foure hundred yeares. In which time, both doctrine and sincerity of life was vtterly almost extinguished: namely, in the chiefe heades and rulers of this west church, through the meanes of the Romane Bishops, especially counting from Gregorie the seauenth called Hildebrand, Innocentius the third, and friers which with him crept in, till the time of John Wickliffe & John Husse, during foure hundred yeares.

The reformation of the church.

5. Fiftlie, and lastly, after this time of antichrist, reigning in the church of God by violence and tyranny, followeth the reformation and purging of the church of God, wherin antichrist beginneth to be reuealed, and to appeare in his colours, and his antichristian doctrine to be detected, the number of his church decreasing, and the number of the true church increasing. The durance of which time hath continued hitherto about the space of two hundred and fourescore yeares, and how long shall continue more, the Lord and gouernor of all times, he only knoweth. For in these fiue diuersities and alterations of times, I suppose the whole course of the church may well be comprised. The which church, because it is vniuersall, & sparsedlie through all countries dilated, therefore in this historie standing vpon such a generall argument, I shall not be bound to anie one certeine nation, more than another: yet notwithstanding keeping mine argument aforesaid, I haue purposed principallie to tarrie vpon such historicall acts and records, as most appertein to this my countrie of England and Scotland.

The church of Rome.

And forsomuch as the church of Rome, in all these ages aboue specified, hath chalenged to it selfe the supreme title, and ringleading of the whole vniuersall church on earth, by whose direction all other churches haue beene gouerned: in writing therefore of the church of Christ, I cannot but partlie also intermeddle with the acts & procedings of the same church, forsomuch as the doings and orderings of all other churches from time to time, as well here in England, as in other nations, haue this long season chiefely depended vpon the same. Wherfore, as it is much needfull and requisit to haue the doings and orderings of the said church to be made manifest to all christian congregations: so haue I framed this historie, according to the same purpose. First in a generall description briefly to declare, as in a summarie table, the misguiding of that church, comparing the former primitiue state of the forenamed church of Rome, with these latter times of the same. Which done, then after in a more special tractation, to prosecute more at large all the particulars thereof, so farre forth as shall seeme not vnprofitable for the publick instruction of all other christian churches, to behold and consider the maner and dealing of this one.

Foure things to be considered in the church of Rome.
1. Title.
2. Iurisdiction.
3. Life.
4. Doctrine.

In the which one church of Rome foure things, as most speciall points, seeme to me chiefelie to be considered. To wit, title, iurisdiction, life, and doctrine. Wherin I haue here to declare, first concerning the title or primacy of the church, how it first began, and vpon what occasion. Secondly, concerning the iurisdiction and authoritie thereof, what it was, and how far it did extend. Thirdlie, touching the misorder of life and conuersation, how inordinate it is, and fourthly the forme of doctrine, how superstitious and idolatrous of late it hath beene. Of the which foure the first was prejudiciall to all Bishops, the second derogatory tokings and emperors. The third detestable to all men. The fourth iniurious against Christ.

The title of the Pope.

For first, the title and stile of that church was such, that it ouerwent all other churches, being called the holie vniuersall mother church, which could not erre; and the bishop thereof holie father the pope, bishop vniuersall, prince of priests, supreame head of the vniuersall church, and vicar of Christ here in earth, which must not bee iudged, hauing all knowledge of Scripture and all lawes contained within the cheft of his breft.

The vniuersall or holie Pope.

Secondly, the iurisdiction of that bishop was such, that challenging to himselfe both the swords, that is, both the keies of the spirituall, and the sceptre of the latte: not onely he sitte downe all bishops vnder him, but also extended himselfe aboue kings and emperors, causing some of them to lye vnder his fect, some to hold his stirrup, kings to leade his horse by the bridle, some to kisse his fect, plucking and displucking emperors, kinges, dukes and earles from and when hee listed, taking vpon him to translate the empire at his pleasure; first from Greece to France, from France to Germanie, preferring and deposing whom he pleased, confirming them whith were elected. Also being emperor himselfe vsed vacante, pretending authoritie of power to make bishops, to giue benefices to spirituall churches, to giue authoritie to binde and loose, to call generall councels, to iudge ouer the same, to set vp religions, to canonize saints, to take appeales, to binde consciences, to make lawes, to dispense with the lawe and word of God, to deliuer from purgatorie, to command angells, &c.

The pride of his followers in their clothing.

The Decrees of his Popes.

Thirdly, what was the life and conuersation of the court of Rome, hereafter at the proceffe of this history followeth to bee more at large obserued.

Fourthly, such was his doctrine in like manner, tedious to students, pernicious to mens consciences, iniurious to Christ Iesus, and deadly arte to it selfe. In lawes more diuers, in volume more large, in diligence and studie more applied, in vauntage and profession more gainefull, than euer was the studie and learning of the holy scripture of God.

All which foure points well considered and aduised in this present historie set forth, I trust it may minister to the indifferent christian reader, sufficient instruction to iudge, what is of this sir and church of Rome to be deemed.

But hereby the way is to be noted, that all these forenamed abuse touched of bishe title, of pretended iurisdiction, of their ill doctrine, of lephimical life, came not into the church of Rome all at one time, nor sprang with the beginning of the same church, but with long lacking, and continuance of time by little and little creeptop, through occasion, and came not to full perfection, till the time partly of pope Sylvester, partly of pope Gregorie the fourth, in the yeare of our Lord 1170. partly of Innocentius the third, and finally of pope Boniface the eight in the yeare of our Lord 1300: Of the which foure popes, the first brought in the title in the yeare of the Lord 800. which was heard in such simple wise before publikely erected, and receiued publikely in the said church of Rome. The second brought in iurisdiction. The third, which was pope Innocent with his rable of monks and friers (as Thomas Aquine, Peter Lombard, Scotus, Iohannes Scotus) and with such other bishops as sticked to him the same tide after him, corrupted and abused the sinceritie of Christs doctrine and manners also. And lastly pope Boniface the eight, and after him pope Clement the fift, ouer and besides the iurisdiction, sufficiently aduanced before by pope Leo the third, added moreouer the temporall sword to be carried before them. And that no emperour were he neuer so much feared, should bee sufficient and lawfull, without the popes admission, in the yeare of our Lord 1300. whereby the pope power is brought now to his full pride and perfection. And thus came by the corruption of the Romish church in continuance of yeares by degrees, and not altogither, nor at one time, as is declared, and hereafter more particularlie (Christ willing) shall be expressed.

Pope Sylvester.

Pope Gregorie the fourth.

Pope Innocent the third.

Pope Boniface the eight.

Pope Clement the fift.

Notwithstanding, whatsoeuer shall hame hereafter to doe with any aduersaries, about the antiquitie or authoritie of the church of Rome, let them here well consider when and how, the title, iurisdiction, and corruption of doctrine first began in the popes sea. And so that he be, that it be church of Rome, as it is now gouerned with this manner of title, iurisdiction, and institution of doctrine, neuer deriued from the primitiue age of the Apostles or from their succession, Nisi omnium æquiuoce, & non vniuoce. Like as Sancta Maria picta non est sancta Maria, & homo pictus non est homo, as the schoolmen say: that is, As the picture of the holy virgine, is not the holy virgin, and as a man painted on the wall is not a man: so it is to be said of the church of Rome the institution and doctrine of the church of Rome I meane: that although it haue the name of the church apostolicall, and doth bring forth a long genealogie of outward succession from the apostles, as the Pharisies did in Christs time bring their descent from Abraham their father: yet all this is (as I said) but only Aequiuocé, that is, in name only, and not in effect or matter, which maketh the apostolicall church in deed, for as much as the definition of the apostolicall church, neither agreeth now with this present church of Rome, nor yet the matter, forme, and institution of the said Romish church, as it now standeth with this title, iurisdiction and doctrine, had euer any succession or of spring from the primitiue church of the apostles. But as Christ said vn to the Pharisies, that they were the children not of Abraham, but of the deuill: in semblable wise may be answered, that this church of Rome now present, with this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now vsed, cannot be fathered vpon the apostles, neither Petrus, nor Linus, but of an other author, whom here I will not name.

The church of Rome now present.

And here now commeth in the argument of Pighius, Hosius, and Eccius, to be answered vnto, who arguing for the antiquitie and authority of the church of Rome, reason on this manner.

The argument of Pighius, Hosius, & Eccius for the antiquitie of the church of Rome.

Da. That for somuch as an ordinary and a knowne church visible must here be knowen continually on earth, during from the time of the Apostles, to the which church all other churches must haue recourse:

ri. And seeing then there is no other church visible, orderitie knowen to haue indured from the apostles time, but onely the church of Rome:

j. They conclude therefore that the church of Rome, is that church, whereunto all other churches must haue their recourse, &c.

To the which paralogisme I answere thus: that this word Ducatus signifieth during church in the Minor, hath Fallaciam æquiuoci. For although the name of the church and outward succession of Bishops haue had their durance then time of the apostles, yet the definition & matter which maketh a true apostolicall church indeed, and Vniuocè, neither is now in the church of Rome, nor yet the form and institution of the church now vsed in Rome was euer from the apostles: which apostles were neuer authors or fathers of this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now taught in Rome, but rather were enemies euer to the same.

Answere. Fallacia æquiuoci.

The minor examined.

Againe to the Maior, which standeth vpon two parts. I answer. First although the necessitie of the church during from the apostles, may and must be granted; yet the same necessitie was not bound to any certaine place, or person but only to faith: so that wheresoeuer, that is to say, in whatsoeuer congregation true faith was, there was the church of Christ. And because the true faith of Christ must needs euer remaine in earth: therefore the church also must needs remaine in earth. And God forbid that the said true faith of Christ should onely remaine in one city in the world, and not in other as well. And therefore to the second part of the Maior is to be said, that as this true and sincere faith of Christ is not so giuen, to remaine firmly in one place or citie alone: so neither is there any one church in the world so ordained and appointed of God, that all other churches should haue their recourse vnto it, for determination of their causes and controuerfies incident, &c. And thus much to the argument of Pighius and Hosius, &c.

The maior examined.

Now as touching the authorities and allegations of the auncient doctors and holy fathers in the commendation of the church of Rome, here commeth in also to be noted, that whosoeuer will vnderstand rightly their authorities, and answere to the same, must first learne to make a difference and distinction of the said church of Rome, from that it was, to that it is: for as much as the church of Rome is not the same church now, which it was then, but only Aequiuocé: otherwise as touching the very property and definition of a church, it is another thing. Nothing agreeing to that it was then, saue only in outward name and place. Therfore by this distinction made, I answere the place of Irenæus, Cyprianus, and other famous doctors, commending the church of Rome as catholike & apostolicall, and say that these doctors speaking of the church of Rome which then was, said not untrue, calling it catholike & apostolicall, for that the same church take their ordinary succession of Bishops, ioined with the ordinarie doctrine and institution from the Apostles. But speaking of the church of Rome, which now is, we say the said places of the doctors are not true, neither doe appertaine to the same: all which Bishops neither knewe the church of Rome that now is, neither if they had, would euer haue iudged any thing therin worthy such commendation.

A distinction. The church of Rome distinguished into a double consideration of times.

The church of Rome, how it was commended of the old doctors.

Yet euer and besides, our aduersaries yet more obiect against vs, who boasting and vaunting for the antiquitie of the Romish church, for lacke of other matter to oppone, are driuen to fall in scanning the times and peares. What say they? where was this church of yours before these fifftie peares? To whom briefly to answer, first we demaund what they meane by this, which they call our church? If they meane the ordinance and institution of doctrine and sacraments, now receiued of vs, and differing from the church of Rome, we affirme and saie, that our church was, when this church of theirs was not yet hatched out of the shell, nor did yet euer see any light: that is, in the time of the Apostles, in the primitiue age, in the time of Gregorie the first, and the old Romane church, when as yet no vniuersall pope was receiued publikely, but repelled in Rome; nor this fulnesse of plenarie power yet knowen, nor this doctrine, and abuse of sacraments yet heard of. In witnesse whereof we haue the olde acts and histories of ancient time to giue testimonie with vs, wherein sufficient matter we haue for vs, to declare the same form, vsage, and institution of this our church

The principall obiection of the papists against the protestants.

Answere to the obiection.

reformed now, not to be the beginning of anie new church of our owne, but to be the renewing of the old ancient church of Christ: nor to be anie swarming from the church of Rome, but rather a reducing to the church of Rome. Whereas contrarie the church of Rome which now is, is nothing but a swarming from the church of Rome, as partlie is declared, and more shall appeare (Christ willing) hereafter.

The church of Rome remoued from the church of Rome.

Another obiection of the papists.

And where the said our aduersaries do moreouer charge vs with the faith of our fathers and godfathers, wherein we were baptised, accusing and condemning vs, for that we are now reuolted from them and their faith, wherin we were first christened: To this we answer, that we being first baptised by our fathers and godfathers, in water, in the name of the father, of the sonne, and of the holy ghost, the same faith wherein wee were christened then, we do retaine: & because our godfathers were themselues also in the same faith, therefore they cannot say that we haue forsaken the faith of our godfathers, &c. As for other points of ecclesiastical vses and circumstances considered, besides the principall substance of faith and baptisme, if they held any thing which receded from the doctrine and rule of Christ, therein we now remoue our selues; not because we would differ from them, but because we would not with them remoue from the rule of Christs doctrine. Neither doth the sacrament of our baptisme bind vs in all points to the opinions of them that baptised vs, but to the faith of him, in whose name we were baptised. For as if a man were christened of an heretike, the baptisme of him notwithstanding were good, although the baptiser were naught: so if our godfathers or fathers, which christened vs, were taught any thing, not consonant to christian doctrine in all points, neither is our baptisme voide for that, nor yet we bound to follow them in all things, wherein they themselues did not follow the true church of Christ.

An answere to the obiection.

No man bound to follow the opinions of his godfathers in all points wherein they were not consonant in all things.

The church of Rome distinguished from the church of Rome.

Wherefore as it is false, that we haue renounced the faith of our godfathers wherein we were first baptised, so is it not true that we are remoued from the church of Rome: but rather say and by the leaue of Christ will proue that the church of Rome hath vtterly departed from the faith of Christ, according to my distinction before touched. Which thing the more euidently to declare, I will here compare the church of Rome with the church of Rome; and in a general description set forth (by Gods grace) the difference of both the churches, that is, of both the times of the church of Rome: to the intent it may be seene, whether we or the church of Rome haue more apostated from the faith of Christ and his Lawe. And here first I deuide the church of Rome in a double consideration of time, first of those first fiue hundred yeares which were immediately after Christ: and secondly of the other fiue hundred yeares, which now haue been in these our latter daies: and so in comparing these two together, will search out what discrepance is betweene them both. Of the which two ages & states of the Romane church, the first I call the primitiue church of Rome, the other I call the latter church of Rome, counting this latter church the which fiue hundred yeares expired after the binding vp of Satan, to the time of his losing againe, according to the prophesie of the twentith chapter of saint Johns Reuelation; counting these fiue hundred yeares from the ceasling of persecution, vnder Constantinus Magnus, to the beginning of persecution of the church against vnder Innocentius the third, and Otthomannus the first Turcian emperour. And thus haue we the church of Rome parted into two churches, in double respect and consideration of two sundrie states and times. Now in setting and matching the one state with the other, let vs see whether the church of Rome hath swarued from the church of Rome more than we, or no.

Two times of the church of Rome considered and examined.

The first point.

And to begin first with the order and qualities of life; I aske here of this Romane clergie, where was this church of theirs which now is, in the old ancient time of the primitiue church of Rome, with this pompe and pride, with this riches and superfluitie, with this Gloria mundi, and name of cardinals, with this prancing dissolutenesse and wantonnesse of the curtisans, with this extortion, bribing, buying and selling of spirituall dignities, these annats, reformations, procurations, exactions, and other practises for money, this auarice insatiable, ambition intolerable, sleshly filthinesse most detestable, barbarousnesse and negligence in preaching, promise breaking faithlesse, poisoning and supplanting one another, with such schismes and diuisions, which neuer were more seene than in the elections and court of Rome these seuen hundred yeares, with such extreame cruelties, malice, and tyrannie in burning and persecuting their poore brethren to death?

The enormities of life in the fierce church of Rome described.

Pollicies and practises of Rome to get monie.

Summa totalis.

It were too long, & a thing infinit, to stand particularly vpon these aboue rehearsed. And if a man should professe at large all the schismes that haue been in the church of Rome since the time of Damasus the first, which are counted to the number of eightene schismes; what a volume would it require? Or if there should be recorded all that this see hath burned and put to death since the losing out of satan, who were able to nomunber them? Or all their sleights to get money should be described as processe of matter would require, who were able to recite them all? Of which all notwithstanding, the most principall grounds are reckoned at least to foureteene or fiftene sleights.

Fifteene practises of the new church of Rome to get monie.

First for annats, or vacacies of archbishoprikes, bishoprikes, abbacies, priories conuentuall, and other benefices elective. 1

Secondly, for the holding and reteining of all other spirituall liuings whatsoeuer, besides this which now the incumbent paieth for, or which he may hold hereafter. 2

Thirdly, new annats for all the same are required againe. Toties quoties any one of all his spirituall liuings be, or are fauned to be not orderly come by, whereby it hath chanced diuers times three or foure annats to be paied for one benefice. 3

Fourthly, for grauing out preuentions of benefices before they fall, and many times some one preuention to be giuen to diuers and sundrie persons by the office of monies false. 4

Fiftly, for relignations vpon fauour, which in many cases the pope challengeth to be referued to himselfe. 5

Sixtie, for commendams. 6

Seuenthly, for compounding with such as be absent from their charge, and giue their attendance about the court. 7

Eightly, for infinite dispensations, as to dispense with age, with order, with benefices incompatible, as if the number bee full, if the house be of such or such an order. Item dispensation for irregularitie, for whoredome and adulterie, for times of marriage, for marring in degrees forbidden, or in affinitie canonicall, for gossips to marrie, for the which it hath been seene in France a thousand crownes to be paid to Rome at one time, for dispensing with this canonicall affinitie of gossips, as we call it, the same being yet not true, but fained. Item dispensing for eating meates in times prohibited. 8

Ninthlie, for his innumerable priuiledges, exemptions, graces for not visiting, or visiting by a proctor, for confirmations of priuiledges, for translations made vpon speciall fauor of the pope, for permutations of benefices with dispensation annexed, or making of pensions, with such like. 9

Tenthly, for mandats granted by the pope, to ordinaries, whereof euery ordinarie, if he haue the collation or presentation often, may receiue one mandat; if he haue fiftie, he may receiue two mandats: & for euery mandat there comes to the pope about twentie duckats. And yet notwithstanding so many are sold, as will cume buiers to pay for; them. 10

Eleuenthly, for the popes penitentiarie, for absolution of cases reserued to the pope, for breaking & changing of vowes, for translation from one monasterie to another, also from one order to another, for licence to enter into certaine monasteries, to carrie about altars, with many other things of like deuice, pertaining to the office of the popes penitentiarie. 11

Twelfthly, for giuing and granting of innumerable pardons and indulgences, to be read not onely in publike temples, but also to be bought in priuate houses, and of priuat persons, in diuers and sundrie respects. 12

Thirteenthly, for making notaries, and protonotaries, and other offices of the court of Rome. 13

Fourteenthly, for granting out bulls and commissions of new foundations, or for changing of the old, for reducing regular monasteries to a secular state, or for reducing againe into the old, and for other infinite rescripts and writs about matters depending in controuersie, and otherwise might and ought by the ordinarie to be decided. 14

Fiftenthlie, for giuing the pall to archbishops newlie elected. By reason of all which deuices besides the first of the annates, it hath been accounted out of the kings records in France, in the time of Ludouike the ninth (as testifieth Polenetus) to the number of two hundred thousand crownes, onelie out of France paied and transported to Rome. Which summe since that time hath been doubled and tripled, besides annats and palles, which all together are thought to make the totall summe, yeerely going out of France to the popes coffers of late yeeres, ten millions, or millions, euery myriad mounting to ten thousand crownes. Now what hath risen besides in other realmes and nations, let other men coniecture. 15

Wherefore if the gospell send vs to the fruits to know the tree, I pray you what is to be thought of the church of Rome, with these fruits of life? Or if we will seeke the church in length and number of yeeres, where was this church of Rome with these qualities then, at what time the church of Rome was a persecuted church, not a persecuting church? And when the bishops thereof did not make martyrs, as these now do, but were made martyrs themselues, to the number of fiue and twentie, in order one after another? Or when the bishops thereof were elected and exalted, not by factious conspiring, not by power of parts taking, not by monie & friends making, as they be now; but by the free voices of the people and of the clergie, with the consent of the emperour ioined withall, and not by a few conspired cardinals, closed vp in a conner, as they be now, &c.

The iurisdiction and power of this new church of Rome examined.

And yet if there were no other difference in the matter, but only corruption of life, all that we would tolerat, or els impute to the common fragilitie of man, & charge them no further therein, than we might charge our selues. Now ouer and beside this dissolutnesse of life, wherein they are cleane gone from the former steps of the true church of Rome, we haue moreouer to charge them in greater points, more neerely touching the substantiall ground of the church, as in their iurisdiction presumptuoulie vsurped, in their title falselie grounded, and in their doctrine heretically corrupted. In all which they be points, this latter pretended church of Rome hath vtterly forsaken it self from the image and nature of the ancient and true church of Rome, and haue created to themselues a new church of their owne making, as first vsurping a iurisdiction neuer knowne before to their ancient predecessors. For although the church of Rome in the old primitiue time had his true authority & place due vnto that see, among other patriarchall churches, ouer and vpon such churches as were within his precinct, and bordering neere vnto it, as appeareth by the acts of Nicen councell: yet the vniuersall fulnesse and plenitude of power in both the regiments, spirituall and temporall, in deposing & disposing matters of the church, not to him belonging, in hearing appeales, in giuing elections, inuesting in benefices, in exempting himself from obedience and subiection of his ordinarie power and magistrate, with his coactiue power newly erected in the church of Rome, was neuer receiued nor vsed in the old Romane church, from the which they disagree in all their doings.

A.q. doctrine

This new church of Rome in diuers points chiefly to be obserued.

Nicen. can. cap. 6.

Victor excom-municated by Irenæus.

For although Victor then bishop of Rome, Anno 200. went about to excommunicate the east churches, for the obseruation of Easter day: yet neither did he proceed therein, neither was permitted by Irenæus so to do. And although Boniface the first likewise, writing to the bishops of Carthage, required of them to send vp their appellations vnto the church of Rome, alleaging moreouer the decree of Nicen councell for his authorite: the bishops and clergie of Carthage assembling together in a generall councell (called the first councell of Carthage) to the number of two hundred and seuentene bishops, after that they had perused the decrees in the authentike copies of the foresaid Nicen councell, and found no such matter by the said Pontifacts alleaged, made therefore a publike decree, that none out of that countrie should make any appeale ouer the sea, &c. And what marueil if appeales were forbidden them to be made to Rome, when as both here in England the kings of this land would not permit any to appeale from them to Rome, before king Henrie the second, because of the murther of Thomas Becket, being thereunto compelled by pope Alexander the third? And also in France the like prohibitions were sundry times made by Ludouicus Pius, Anno 828, which bindes bid by a publike instrument, called Pragmatica sanctio, all eccasions of the popes court within his realme. Also by king Philip named Le bel, An. 1296. the like was done, which not onely restrained all sending or going vp of his subiects to Rome, but also that no monie, armour, or substitute should be transported out of his realme. The like also after him did king Charles the fift surnamed the wise, & his sonne likewise after him Charles the first, who also punished as traitors, certain seditious persons for appealing to Rome. The like restraunce moreouer was in the said countrie of France, against the popes reseruations, preuentions, & other like practises of his usurped iurisdiction in the daies of pope Martin the fift. An. 1418. Item, when Henrie the first in England, & king Charles the seuenth in France, did both accord with the pope, in inuesting and in collation of benefices: yet notwithstanding the high court of parlement in France did not admit the same, but still maintained the old liberties & customs of the French church. Insomuch that when the duke of Bedford came with the kings letters patent to haue the popes reseruations & reseruations abunited, yet the court of parlement would not agree to the same, but the kings procurator generall was faine to goe beyond seas, as is to bee seene in their registers, An. 1425. the fift day of March. In the daies of the which king Charles the seuenth, was set forth in France, Pragmatica sanctio, as they call it, against the annats, reseruations, expectatiues, & such other proceedings of the popes pretended iurisdiction, An. 1438. Wherefore what marueil if this iurisdiction of the popes court in excommunicating, taking appeales, & giuing of benefices, was not vsed in the old church of Rome, when as in these latter daies it hath bin so much resisted?

Ex Annals de gestis Francorum, lib. 5. cap. 33.

The popes iurisdiction reiected in France.

Pragmatica sanctio.

And what should I speake of the forme and manner of elections, now vsed in the church of Rome, cleane contrarie from the manner of the old church of their predecessors? For first in those ancient daies, when as yet the church remained in the apostles onely, and a few other disciples, the apostles then with prayer and imposition of hands elected bishops and ministers, as by the apostles Iames was made bishop of Hierusalem, Paul in Creta elected Titus, and Timothe in Ephesus. Also Peter ordained Linus and Cleuerus in Rome, &c. After which time of the apostles, when the church began more to multiplie, the election of bishops and ministers stood by the clergie and the people, with the consent of the chiefe magistrat of the place, and so continued during all the time of the primitiue church, till the time, and after the time of Constantine the fourth emperour, which emperour (as writeth Platina and Sabellicus, Ennead. 8. lib. 6.) published a law concerning the election of the Romane bishop, that he should be taken for true bishop, whom the clergie and people of Rome did chese and elect, without any tarying for any authorite of the emperour of Constantinople, or the deputie of Italie: so as the custome and fashion had euer been before that day, Anno 680. And here the bishops began first to writhe out their elections and their necks a little from the emperours subiection, if it be so as the said Platina and Sabellicus after him reporteth. But many coniectures there be, not vnprobable, rather to thinke this constitution of Constantine to be forged and vntrue: First, for that it is taken out of the popes bibliothecarie, a suspected place, and collected by the keeper and master of the popes librarie, a suspected author, who whatsoeuer feined traditions or apocrypha he could find in the popes chests of records, making any thing on his masters side: that he compiled together, and thereof both Platina, Sabellicus, and Gratianus take most part of their reports, and therefore may the more be suspected, &c.

Platina. Sabel. Ennad. 8. lib. 6.

Constantine the fourth restores of Constantinople examined.

Secondly, where Platina and Sabellicus say that Constantine mooued with the holinesse of pope Wenedict the first made that constitution: thou seemest that to stand with truth, when both the emperour was so farre off from him being at Constantinople, and also for that the said pope reigned but ten moneths? Which was but a small time to make his holinesse knowne to the emperor so farre off. And giue he were so holy, yet that holinesse might rather be an occasion for the emperor so to constitute and maintaine the old receiued manor of his institution, than to alter it.

The vnholinesse of the pope examined.

The third coniecture is this, for that the said constitution was not obserued, but shortly after by the said Benedict was broken in the election of pope Conon. And yet notwithstanding albeit the constitution were true, yet the election thereby was not taken away from the people, and limited to the clergie onely, and much lesse might be taken away from the clergie, and be limited onely to the cardinals, without the consent of their prince and ruler, according to their owne rubric in their decrees, where the rubric saith: De ordinatione episcopi: Nullus inuitis detur episcopus, cleri, plebis, & ordinis consensus & delectum requiratur, &c. That is: Let no bishop be giuen to any people against their wills: but let the consent and desire both of the clergie and of the people, and of the order, be also required, &c. And in the same Dist. also, cap. Sacrorum, we read the same libertie and interest to be granted by Carolus Magnus, and Ludouicus his sonne, not to a few cardinals onelie, but to the order as well of the clergie, as of the people, to chose not onely the bishop of Rome, but also other bishops within their owne diocesse whatsoeuer, and to the monks likewise to chose their owne abbat, setting aside all respect of persons and gifts, onely for the worthinesse of life, and gift of wisdome, so as might be most profitable for doctrine, and example vnto the flocke, &c. And this continued till the time of the foresaid Carolus Magnus & Ludouicus his sonne. An. 820. of the which two, Carolous the father receiued expresse of pope Adrian the first, full iurisdiction & power to elect & ordaine the bishop of Rome, like as pope Leo the ninth did also to Otho the first Germane emperor. An. 961. The other, that is, Ludouicus, sonne to the foresaid Charles, is said to renounce againe, & surrender from himselfe and his successors, into pope Paschalis and the Romans the right and interest of chusing the Romane bishop, and more ouer to giue and grant to the said Paschalis the full possession of the citie of Rome, and the whole territorie to the same belonging. Anno 821. as appeareth by the decree, Ego Ludouicus, Dist. 63. But admit that fained decree to bee vnfeinedly true (as it may well bee suspected for many causes, as proceeding out of the same fountaine, with the constitution of Constantine afore mentioned, that is, from the matter of the popes librarie, of whom both Gratianus and Volaterran, by their owne confession take their ground) yet the same decree doth not so giue away the freedome of that election, that he limiteth it only to the cardinals, but also requireth the whole consent of the Romans: neither doth he simplie and absolutely giue the same, but with condition, so that, Omnes Romani vno consilio, & vna concordia, sine aliqua promissione aut pactionis ordinem eligerent: that is, That whom as all the Romans with one counsell, and with one accord, without any promise of their voices granted before, shall chose to be bishop of Rome. And moreouer in the same decree is required, that at the conferration of the same bishop, messengers should be directed to conuent out the French king concerning the same.

Constantius Caietanus, what ground they haue of their records. Dist. 63. cap. Ego Ludouicus.

Election of the bishop of Rome standeth vpon the consent of the clergie, and the people of Rome.

Gratianus and Caietanus.

Furthermore, neither yet did the same decree (albeit it were true) long continue. For although pope Stephan the fourth, and pope Paschalis the first, in Ludouicus time were vnpaased though diuers without election of the emperour, yet they were faine by message to send their purgation to him of their election. And after that, in the time of Eugenius the second, which succeeded next to Paschalis, Lotharius sonne of Ludouicus, and emperour with his father, came to Rome, and there appointed lawes and magistrats ouer the citie. Wherby may appeare the donation of Ludouike, in giuing away the citie of Rome to the pope, to be feined. And after Eugenius, pope Gregorie the fourth, who following within a yeere after Eugenius, durst not take his election without the consent and confirmation of the said emperour Ludouicus. And so in like manner his successors pope Sergius the second, pope Leo the fourth, pope Nicholas the first, and so orderlie in a long tract of time, from the foresaid Nicholas the first, to pope Nicholas the second, Anno 1061. (such Nicholas in his decree beginning, Irrumpente Domini. dist. 22. obtained also the same) so that in the election of the bishops of Rome, commonlie the consent of the emperour and the people with the clergie of Rome was not lacking. After which Nicholas came Alexander ander the second, and wicked Hildebrand, which Alexander being first elected without the emperours will and consent, afterward repenting the same, openly in his preaching to the people declared that he would no longer sit in the apostolike se, vnlesse he were by the emperour confirmed. Wherfore he was greatly rebuked, and cast into prison by Hildebrand, and so deposed. Then Hildebrand & his followers so ordered the matter of this election, that first the emperor then the lay people, after that the clergie also began to be excluded. And so the election by little & little was reduced to the hands of a few cardinals, contrarie to all ancient order, where euer since it hath remained.

And like as in elections, so also in power iudiciary, in deciding and determining of causes of faith, and of ecclesiasticall discipline. the state of the church of Rome, now being, hath no conformitie with the old Romane church heretofore. For then bishops debated all causes of faith only by the scriptures, and other questions of ecclesiasticall discipline they determined by the canons, not of the pope, but of the church, such as were decreed by the ancient councels, as writeth Greg. Turonensis in Francorum historia. Whereas now both the rule of scripture, and functions of the old councels in a manner all things for the most part are decided by certaine new decretall or rather extradecretall and extrauagant constitutions, in the popes canon law compiled, and in his constitutes practised.

The popes iurisdiction without peere in ruling and disposing ecclesiasticall promotions.

And whereas the old ordinance and disposition, as well of the common law, as of the sacred councels, and institution of ancient fathers haue giuen to bishops and other prelates, also to parsons and deanes of ecclesiasticall liuings, all things for the within his owne precinct and dominion, also to cathedrall churches and other; to haue their free elections and to preserue the same in full effect, ordering and disposing promotions, collations, prouisions and dispositions of prelacies, dignities, and all other ecclesiasticall benefices whatsoeuer, after their owne arbitrement, as appeareth by the first generall councell of France 160. q. 7. cap. Omnes Basilicæ. by the first generall councell of Nice cap. 6. Also by the generall councell of Antioch cap. 9. and is to be seene in the popes decrees 9. q. 3. Per singulas. And likewise beside these ancient decrees, the same is confirmed againe in more latter yeeres by Ludouicus the ninth French king in his constitution called Pragmatica sanctio, made and prouided by full parlement against the popes exactions, in the yeere of our Lord 1228. in these words as follow. Item exactiones & onera grauissima pecuniarum, per curiam Romanam ecclesiæ regni nostri imposita vel imposita (quibus regnum miserabiliter depauperatum existit) siue etiam imponendas vel imponenda leuari aut colligi nullatenus volumus: nisi duntaxat pro rationabili, pia & vrgentissima causa, vel inuitabili necessitate, ac etiam de expresso, & spontaneo iussu nostro, & ipsius ecclesiæ regni nostri, &c, that is: Item all exactions and vnpotable burdens of mony, which the court of Rome hath laid vpon the church of our kingdome (wherby the said our kingdome hath been miserable hitherto impouerished) or hereafter shall impose or lay vpon vs, we vtterly discharge and forbid to be leuied or collected hereafter for any manner of cause, vnlesse there come some reasonable, godly, and most vrgent, and inuitable necessitie; and that also not to be done without the expresse and voluntarie commandement of vs, and of the church of the same our foresaid kingdome, &c. Also contrarie to and against these to manifest and expresse determents of generall councels, and constitutions synodall, this latter church of Rome of late presumption, degenerating from all the steps of their elders, haue taken vpon them a singuler iurisdiction by themselues, and for their owne aduantage, to intermeddle in disposing and transposing churches, colleges, monasteries, with the collations, exemptions, elections, grants and lands to the same belonging, by reason and example whereof haue come in these impropiations, first fruits, and reseruations of benefices to the miserable despoyling of parishes, and horrible decay of christian faith, which things among the old Romane elders were neuer knowne. For so much then did it lacke, that due necessities were pluckt from the church, that emperours, kings, and princes plucking from their owne, did rather cumulate the church with superfluities.

Impropiations and first fruits of benefices.

Institutiones canonicæ sub Ludouico Pio.

And where goods were giuen to the church by those auncestors, they were neither so giuen, nor yet taken, to serue the priuat vse of certaine churchmen taking no paines therein, but rather to serue the publike subuention of the needie, as is contained in the canonicall institutions by the emperour Ludouicus Pius, set forth in the yeere of our Lord 830. The words be these: Res ecclesiæ vota sunt fidelium, pretia peccatorum, & patrimonia pauperum, that is: The goods of the church be the vowes and bequests of the faithfull, prices to ransome such as be in captiuitie or prison, and patrimontes to succour them with hospitalitie, that be needie.

The words of Prosper.

Wherevnto agreeth also the testimonie of Prosper, whose words be these: Viros sanctos ecclesiæ res non vendicasse vt proprias, sed vt commendatas pauperibus diuisse: certum est, God inch tooke the goods of the church not as their owne, but distributed them as giuen and bequeathed to the poor. And saith moreouer: Quod habet ecclesia, cum omnibus nihil habentibus habet communem: that is, what soeuer the church hath, it hath it common with all such as haue nothing, &c.

Si autem priuatim, quæ nobis sufficiant possidemus, non sunt illa nostra, sed pauperum, quorum procurationem quodammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis vsurpatione damnat ille vendicamus, &c.

Vnwedding and pluralities of benefices.

Likewise vnwedding and pluralities of benefices were things then as much vnknowne, as now they are pernitions to the church, taking away all free election of ministers from the flocke of Christ.

Three points wherein the popes church erreth in his iurisdiction.

All which inconueniences as they first came and crept in chiefly by the pretended authoritie and iurisdiction abused in this latter church of Rome: so it cannot be denied, but the said latter church of Rome hath taken and attributed to it selfe much more, than either the limits of Gods word doe giue, or standeth with the example of the old Romane church, in these three things especiall. Whereof as mention is touched before, so briefly I will recapitulate the same.

1 Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction falsely restrained and impropriate to the church of Rome, which ought to be vniuersally equall to all christen christian.

The first is in this, that whatsoeuer the scripture giueth and referreth, either to the whole church vniuersally, or to euery particular church seuerally, this church now of Rome doth arrogate to it selfe absolutely and onely, both doing iniurie to other churches, and also abusing the scriptures of God. For albeit the scripture doth giue authoritie to bind and lose, it limiteth it neither to person nor place, that is, neither to the citie of Rome onely, more than to other cities; nor to the see of Peter, more then to other apostles, but giueth it clearelie to the church, whereof soeuer he did beare the figure, so that wheresoeuer the true church of Christ is, there is annexed power to bind and lose, giuen and taken meerely as from Christ, and not mediatlie by the pope or bishop of Peters see.

2 Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction abused and restrained in the church of Rome further than the word limiteth.

The second point wherein this present church of Rome abuseth his iurisdiction contrary to the scripture and steps of the old Romane church, is this, for that it extendeth his authoritie further and more amplie, than either the warrant of the word, or example of time will giue. For although the church of Rome hath (as other particular churches haue) authoritie to bind and absolue, yet it hath no such authoritie to absolue subiects from their oth, fidelitie and loialtie to their rulers and magistrats, to dispense with periurie, to denounce remission, where no carnell repentance is seene before, to number remission by daies and yeeres, to dispense with things expressely in the word forbidden, or to restraine that which the word maketh free, to diuide religion into religions, to bind and burthen consciences with constitutions of men, to excommunicat for worldly matters, as for breaking of parkes, for not ringing bels at the bishops comming, for not bringing litter for their horse, for not paying their fees and rents, for withholding the church goods, for holding on their princes side in priuat by cases, for not going at the popes commandement, for not agreeing to the popes election in another princes realme, with other such things mo, and more vaine then these, &c. Against, although the scripture giueth leaue and authoritie to the bishop and church of Rome to minister sacraments, much lesse to worship sacraments. And though their authoritie serueth to baptise men, yet it extendeth not to christen bels: neither haue they authoritie by any word of God to adde to the word of God, or take from the same, to set vp vnwritten verities vnder paine of damnation, to make other articles of beleefe, to institute strange worship, otherwise than he hath prescribed, which hath told vs how he would be worshipped, &c.

Christening of bels.

3 The iurisdiction of the pope abused and vsurped in temporall matters where he hath nothing to doe.

The third abuse of the popes iurisdiction standeth in this, that as in spirituall iurisdiction they haue vehemently exceded the bounds of scripture, so they haue impudently intermedled themselues in temporall iurisdiction, wherein they haue nothing to doe. Insomuch that they haue translated the empire, they haue deposed emperors, kings, princes, rulers, and tirants of Rome, and set vp other, or the same againe at their pleasure, they haue proclaimed warres, and haue inuested themselues. And whereas emperors in ancient time haue dignified them in titles, haue inlarged them with donations, and they receiuing their confirmation by the emperors, haue like ingratefull clients to such benefactors, afterward stampt vpon their medes, haue made them to hold their stirrop, come to hold the heads of their horse, haue caused them to take their confirmation at their hand, yea haue kept emperors themselues, Sede vacante, & in discordia electionis, and also haue been senators of the citie; moreouer haue erected into their owne hands the plenarie iurisdicte of power and iurisdiction of both the swords, especially since the time of pope Hildebrand: which Hildebrand deposing Henricus the fourth emperour, made him giue attendance at his citie gate. And after him pope Bonifacius the eight, shewed himself vnto the people on the first day like a bishop, with his keies before him, and the next day in his robes imperiall, hauing a naked sword borne before him, like an emperor, in the yeere of our Lord 1298. And so for so much as this inordinate iurisdiction hath not onely been vsed of them, but also to this day is maintained in Rome; let vs therefore now compare for visage hereof to the old maner in times past, meaning the primitiue and first age of the church of the Romans. Wherin the old bishops of Rome in those daies, as they were then subiect to their emperors, so were other bishops in like maner of other nations subiect euery one to his king and prince, acknowledging them for their lords, and were ordered by their authority and obeied their lawes, and that not onely in causes ciuill, but also in regiment ecclesiasticall, as appeareth Dist. 10. cap. 1. & 2. Dist. 97. cap. De illicita.

Also 24. q. 3. So was Gregorius surnamed Magnus, subiect to Mauricius, and to Phocas, although a wicked emperour. So also both pope and people of Rome tooke their lawes of the emperours of Constantinople, and were submitted to them not only in the time of Honorius an hundred yeres after Constantine the great, but also in the time of Marcianus, Anno 451. and so further vnto the time of Iustinian and of Carolus Magnus, and also after the daies of them. In all which continuance of time, it is manifest, that the imperiall law of Rome did rule and bind in Rome, both in the daies of Iustinian, Anno 150 yeres after, till the time of the empire being translated from Greece vnto France. Whereby it may appeare false, that the citie of Rome was giuen by Constantine the first, vnto the bishop of Rome to gouerne for that pope Bonifacius the first writing to the emperour Honorius, falleth in the same place Rome the emperours citie. Dist. 97. cap. 10. And Lotharius also emperour appointed magistrats and lawes in Rome, as is aboue mentioned. Moreouer, for further probation hereof, that both the bishop of Rome and all other ecclesiasticall persons were in former time, and ought to be subiect to their emperours and lawfull magistrates, in causes as well spirituall as ciuill, by many euidences may appeare, taken out both of Gods lawe, and mans law. And first by Gods law, we haue example of godly king Dauid, who numbred all the priests & leuites, & disposed them into foure & twentie orders or courses, appointing them continually to serue in the tabernacle in euery one in his proper order & turne, as came about: which institution of the clergie also god king Ezechias afterward renewed, of whom it is written, He did that was right in the sight of the Lord according to all things as his father Dauid had done before, he toke away the high grooues, and brake downe images: 2. Reg. 8. The said Ezechias also reduced the priests and Leuits into their orders, prescribed by Dauid before, to serue euerie one in his office of ministration. 2. Paralip. 30. 21. And this order from Dauid still continued till the time of Zacharie at the comming of Christ our Lord, being of Abias course, which was the eight order of priests appointed to serue in the tabernacle, Luke 1. To passe ouer other lighter offices translated from the priests to the kings authoritie, as concerning the ordering of oblations in the temple, and reparations of the Lords house, king Salomon displaced Abiathar the high priest by his kingly power, and placed Sadoch in his stead: 3. Reg. cap. 6. Also dedicating the temple of the Lord with all the people blessed the whole congregation of Israel. 3. Reg. 8. Iudas Machabeus also cleared priests, such as being without spot had a zeale to the law of the Lord, to purge the temple, which the idolatrous gentiles had before prophaned: 1. Mac. 4.

Also king Alexander writing to Jonathas appointed him chiefe priest in his country, 1. Mac. 10. Demetrius ordained Simon and Lichenus in the office of priesthood. Iosaphat likewise as in the whole land did set iudges; so also in Jerusalem he appointed Leuits and priests, and heads of families to haue the hearing of causes, and to minister iudgement ouer the people: 2. Paral. 19. By these and many other is to be seene, that kings and princes in the old time, as well when priests were borne priests, as when they were made by election, had the dealing also in ecclesiasticall matters, as in calling the people to Gods seruice, in cutting downe groues, in destroying images, in gathering tithes into the Lords house, in dedicating the temple, in blessing the people, in offering before the high seruant within the temple, in correcting and deposing priests, in constituting the order and offices of priests, in commanding such things as pertained to the seruice and worship of God, and in punishing the contrarie, &c. And in the new testament what meaneth the example of Christ himselfe both giuing and teaching tribute to be giuen to Cesar? to Cesar I say, and not to the high priest. What meaneth his words to Pilate not denying power to be giuen to him from aboue?

And againe declaring the kings of nations to haue dominion ouer them, and willing his disciples not so to do, giuing vs to vnderstand the difference betweene the regiment of his spirituall kingdome, and of the kingdome of this world, willing all worldly states to be subiect vnder the superior rulers and magistrates, in whose regiment is dominion and subiection, and not in the other. Wherevnto accordeth also the doctrine of S. Paul, where it is written: Let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers, vnder whose obedience neither pope, cardinall, patriarch, bishop, priest, frier nor monke is exempted, nor exempted as Theophylactus expounding the same place declareth, and saith: Vniuersos erudit, siue sacerdos sit ille, siue monachus, siue apostolus, vt se principibus subdat: that is, He teacheth all sorts, whether he be priest, or monke, or else apostle, that they should submit themselues vnder their princes. &c. And saint Augustine writing ad Bonifacium, saith in much like sort: Quicunque autem legibus imperatoris, quæ pro Dei veritate feruntur, obtemperare non vult, acquirit grande supplicium: that is, Whosoeuer refuseth to obey the lawes of the emperour, which make for the veritie of God, incurreth the danger of great punishment, &c. Also in another place, writing Contra Cresconium, hath these words: In hoc enim reges ſeruit eis diuinitus præcipitur, Deo seruiunt, in quantum reges, ſi in ſuo regno bona iubeant, mala prohibeant, non ſolùm quæ pertinent ad humanam societatem, verumetiam quæ ad diuinam religionem & chat is, Kings accordings as it is inioyned them of God, do serue God in that they are kings, if they in their kingdome command those things that be good, and forbid things that be euill, such as appertaine not onely to humane societie, but also to Gods religion, &c. And yet to come more neere to the popes owne doctors, Thomas Aquine not much discrepant from the iniunction of the apostle aboue alleaged, thus describeth the office of a king: Hoc, inquit, officium rex ſe ſuſceptiſſe cogneſcat, vt ſit in regno, ſicut in corpore anima, & ſicut Deus in mundo, &c: Let a king (saith he) vnderstand, that he hath taken this office vpon him, to be as the soule within the bodie, and as God in the world. In like agreement with the holy apostle saint Paul (openeth also saint Peter: Be you subiect (saith he) to euerie humane creature, whether it be to the king, as most pre-eminent, or to other set ouer you, &c. Where the common glosse addeth thereto, To obay the same, whether they be good or euill. These places rightly pondered, let any man now iudge whether the pope hath done open wrong to the emperour, in surpassing aboue the iurisdiction of his lawfull prince and magistrat, notwithstanding that for euer his olde canon law saith to the contrarie.

And as it is sufficiently hitherto prooued by Gods lawe, that all ecclesiasticall persons owe their due subiection to their lawfull princes, in matters as well temporall, as spirituall: so no lesse euidences may also be inferred out of mans lawe, and examples of the oldest fathers, to prooue the same. And first to begin with the example of Gregorie the great, who in his epiſtle to Mauricius writeth thus: Dominus meus ſuiſti, quando adhuc Dominus omnium non eras: ecce per meſuerum vltimum ſuum & veſtrum reſpondebit Chriſtus, &c: that is: You were then my lord, when you were not the lord of the whole empire, behold Christ himselfe shall make you answere by me, which am his most simple seruant and poore, &c. And before him Eleutherius his predecessor bishop of Rome, writing to Lucius, king of this realme, calleth him by the name of Christs vicar. But what needeth much confirmation of this matter, when the popes decrees and canons be full of records hereof, testifying how the ancient church of Rome not onely receiued, but also required of the emperors, lawes and constitutions to be made, touching not onely such causes, but also such persons as were ecclesiasticall. And here to omit by the way the chap. Principes seculi, also chap. Administratores, 23. quæſt. 5. with diuers other besides, I will recite out of the epistle of Boniface the first, to the emperor Honorius, so much as serueth for our purpose, written Dist. 92. cap. Eccleſiæ, cap. Victor. Where it is ment I need not that the said Bonifacius bishop of Rome sent an humble supplication to the forenamed emperor, desiring him by his authoritie to prouide some remedie against the ambitious contentions of the clergie, concerning the bishopric of Rome. Which emperor Honorius incontinent at his request, decreed & stablished a law, that none should be made bishop of Rome through ambition, charging all ecclesiasticall ministers to surceasse from ambition; appointing moreouer, that if two were elected together, neither of them both should be taken, but the election to proceed further to another to be chosen by a full consent of voices, as is expressed Dist. 79. cap. Si duo.

To this I adioyne also the law and constitution of Iustinian the emperor, ratified and renewed afterward in the counsell of Paris, in time of king Ludouicus Pius. Where al bishops and priests be expressie forbidden not to excommunicate any man, before his cause was knowne and proued to be such, as for the which the ancient canons of the church would him to bee excommunicate. And if any should otherwise proceed contrarie to the same, then the excommunicate person to be absolued by the authoritie of an higher degree, and the excommunicate to be sequestred from the communion, so long as should seeme conuenient to him that had the execution thereof, as is expressed, 24. q. 3. De illicita. The same Iustinian moreouer in his lawes and constitutions, how many things did he dispose and ordaine in church matters, as to haue a determinate number of churchmen or clerks in churches, const. 3. Also concerning monasteries and monks, const. 5. how bishops & priests should be ordained, const. 6. concerning removing of ecclesiasticall persons from one church to another. Also concerning the constitution of the churches in Affrike. And that the holy mysteries should not be done in priuate houses; so that whosoeuer should attempt the contrarie, should be deposed, const. 57. Moreouer concerning clerks leauing their churches, const. 58. Also concerning the order and manner of funerals, const. 59. And that bishops should not keepe from their flocke, const. 67. The same Iustinian granted to the clergie of Constantinople the priuiledge of the seculer court, in cases onely ciuill, and such as touched not the disturbance of the bishop, otherwise in all criminall causes he left them to the iudgement of the seculer court, const. 83. He giueth also lawes and decrees for breach of matrimonie, const. 117, and in diuers other places. And in his const. 123. after the doctrine of saint Paul, he commandeth doth all bishops and priests to sound out their seruice, and to celebrate the mysteries, not after a secret manner, but with a loud voice, so as they might not onely be heard, but also be vnderstood of the faithful people, what was said and done. Where by it is to be gathered, that diuine prayers and seruice then, was in the vulgar tongue.

And as the said Iustinian, and other emperours in those daies had the iurisdiction and gouernment ouer spirituall matters and persons, the like examples also may be brought of other kings in other lands, who had no lesse authoritie in their realmes, than emperours had in their empire. As in France, Clodoueus the first christened king at Rhiance caused a councell of thirtie three bishops, where thirtie three canons were instituted concerning the gouernment of the church, within two hundred yeres after Christ: Ex primo tomo Concil. Carolus Magnus, beside his other lawes and edicts politicall, called fiue synods, one at Spentz, the second at Rome, the third at Rhemes, the fourth at Cabilone, the fift at Arelate, where sundrie rites and ordinances were giuen to the clergie, about eight hundred and ten yeres after Christ. The same Carolus also decreed, that onely the canonicall bookes of scripture should be read in the church, and none other. Which before also was decreed Anno 417. in the third generall councell of Carthage. Item hee exhorted and charged bishops and priests to preach the word, with a godly iniunction: Epiſcopi verò vt ſiue per ſe, ſiue per vicarios, pabulum verbi diuini ſeduló populis annuncient. Quia, vt ait beatus Gregorius: iram contra ſe occulti iudicis excitat facerdos, ſi ſine prædicationis ſonitu incedit. Et vt ipſi clerum ſibi commiſſum in ſobrietate & caſtitate nutriant. Superſtitiones quas quidam in exequiis mortuorum nonnulli faciunt, eradicent, that is: That bishops either by themselues, or their deputies, shall shew vnto the sonne of Gods word to the people with all diligence. For as Gregorie saith, the priest procureth against him the wrath of the secret iudge, which goeth without the sound of preaching. And also that they bring vp their clergie to them committed in sobernesse and chastitie. The superstition which in certaine places is vsed of some, about the funerals of the dead, let them exterminate and plucke vp by the roots, &c.

Moreouer, instructing and informing the said bishops and priests in the office of preaching, willeth them not to suffer any to faine or preach to the people any new doctrine of their owne inuention, and not agreeing to the word of God, but that they themselues both will preach such things as lead to eternall life, and also that they set vp other to doe the same, and to teach withall a godly exhortation. Ideo, dilectiſſimi, toto corde præparemus nos in ſcientia veritatis, & mox: Vt diuina donante gratia verbum Dei currat & creſcat, & multiplicetur, in profectum eccleſiæ Dei ſanctæ, & ſalutem animarum noſtrarum, & laudem, & gloriam nominis Domini noſtri Ieſu Chriſti. Pax prædicantibus, gratia obedientibus, gloria Domino noſtro Ieſu Chriſto, Amen. Furthermore, the said Carolus in his constitutions diuideth the gods giuen to the church so, that in the more wealthie places, two parts should goe to the vse of the poore, the third to the stipend of the clergie. Otherwise in poore places an equall diuision to be made betweene the poorette and the clergie, vnlesse the gift had some speciall exception. Ex Anſegiſo. lib. 1. cap. 80. And in the same booke a little after, cap. 83. the author declareth, by the said Carolus to be decreed, that no ecclesiastical person or persons from thenceforth should possesse to take of any person, any such gift or donation, whereby the children or kinsfolkes of the said donor should be defeated of their inheritance duely to them belonging. Ludouicus Pius king of France, and after emperor, was sonne to the foresaid Charles, who being ioyned together with the said Charles his father in the empire, ordained also with his father sundrie acts and obseruances touching the gouernment of the church, as in the author before alleaged may appeare. As first, that no entrie should bee made into the church by simonie: againe, that bishops should be ordained by the free election of the clergie and of the people, without all respect of person or reward, onely for the merit of life, & gift of heauenly wisdome.

Also the said kings and emperours forbad that any freeman or citizen should enter the profession of monkerie, without licence asked of the king before, and added a double cause therefore. First, for that many not for mere deuotion, but for idlenesse and auoiding the kings wars, doe giue themselues to religion: Againe, for that many be craftily circumuented and deluded by subtill couetous persons, seeking to get from them that which they haue. Lib. 1. cap. 114. ibidem. Item that no young children or boies should be shauen or enter any profession on without the will of their parents. And no young maidens should take the vale or profession of a nun, before she came to sufficient discretion of yeres to discerne and choose what they will follow. That none should be interred or buried thencefoorth within the church: which also was decreed by Theodosius and Valentinianus, fortie yeres before them. Item the said Carolus two and twentie yeres before this emperour, enacted that murtherers and such as were guiltie of death by the law, should haue no sanctuarie by flying into the church, &c: which also was decreed by Iustinian three hundred yeres before this Carolus. Ex Nouel. Iustinian.

Moreouer the foresaid Ludouicus Pius, with his sonne Clotharius (or as some call him, Lotharius) ioyned with him, among other ecclesiasticall sanctions, ordained a godly law, for taimen to communicate the sacrament of the bodie and bloud of the Lord, in these words: Vt ſi non frequentius, vel ter, laici hominес communicent: niſi fortè grauioribus quibuſdam criminibus impediantur: That laimen doe communicate at least thrise, if not oftner, except they be let perselfe by some more hainous and grieuous offences. Anseg. lib. 2. cap. 43. Item they enacted that no goods of the church should be alienated vnder the paine Leoninæ conſtitutionis. Vnto this Lotharius French king and emperour, pope Leo the fourth writeth, that Romana, lex, that is, the Romane law (meaning the law of the French emperours), as it hath hitherto stood in force: Ita & nunc ſuum robur propriumque vigorem obtineat, that is: So now it may continue still to his vigour and strength. Ino Carnotensis. lib. 11. Decretorum. About the yere of the Lord 848. after this Lotharius, succeeded his sonne Ludouicus the second in the kingdome and empire of France, before vpon the foresaid pope Leo was brought into iudgement, and pleaded his cause of treason, and there was before the emperour quit and released. Which declareth that popes and bishops all this while were in subiection vnder their kings and emperors.

Moreouer, descending yet to lower times, Anno 1228. Ludouicus the ninth, called holy Ludouike, made a law against the pestiferous simonie in the church, also for the maintenance of the liberte of the church of France, established a law or decree, against the new inuentions, reseruations, prescriptions, and exactions of the court of Rome, called Pragmatica ſanctio, Ludouici, the which sanction was also practised long after in the kingdome of France against the popes collectors and vndercollectors, as appeareth by the Arellan of the councell of Paris Anno 1463. Ex Molinæo in Commentariis. Furthermore king Philip le Bel. 1303. set forth a law, called Philippina, wherein was forbid any eraction of new tithes and first fruits, and other vncustomed collections, to be put vpon the church of France. Carolus the first named Sapiens, Anno 1369. by a law commanded, that no bishops nor prelats, or their officials within his kingdome of France, should execute any censure of suspense, or excommunication, or the popes commandement, ouer or vpon the cities or townes, corporations, or commons of his realme. Ex regiſt. antiquarum conſt. chart. 62. Item Carolus the first Anno 1588. against the cardinals & other officials, and collectors of the pope, reuoking against the power which he had giuen to them before, prouided by a law, that the fruites and rents of benefices, with other pensions, and bishops goods that departed, should no more be exported by the cardinals and the popes collectors into Rome, but should be brought to the king, and so reserued to them to whom they did rightly appertaine.

The like also may be inferred and proued by the stories and examples of our kings here in England, as king Offa, king Ethelbertus, Segarus, Alueredus, Athelstanus, Canutus, Edwardus, William Conqueror, Williams, Henrie the first, Henrie the second, til the time of king Iohn and after. Whose dealing as well in ecclesiastical cases, as in temporall, is a sufficient demonstration, to prooue what iniurie the popes in these latter daies haue done vnto the emperours their lawfull gouernours and magistrates: in vsurping such fulnesse of power and iurisdiction ouer them, to whom properly they owe subiection, contrarie to the steps and example of the old Romane bishops their ancestors, and therefore haue incurred the danger of a premunire, worthie to be deprived. Although it is not to be denied, but that ecclesiastical ministers and seruitours haue their power also committed vnto them, after their sort of the Lord: yet it becommeth euery man to keepe his owne place and standing, and there to keepe him, wherein his owne precinct bodyeth him, and not rashly to breake out into other mens walks. As it is not lawfull for a ciuill magistrate to intermeddle with a bishops or a preachers function: so barrestike and vnsemelie it is against that Boniface the eight should haue borne before him the temporall mace, and the naked sword of the emperour: or that any pope should haue a triple crowne, or take vpon him like a lord and king. Wherefore let euery man consider the compasse and limitation of his charge, and exceed no further. The office of a bishop or seruitour ecclesiasticall, was in the old law to offer sacrifice, to burne incense, to pray for the people, to expound the law, to minister in the tabernacle, with other like office it was not lawfull for any prince or man else to intermeddle, as we read how Vzias was punished for offering incense, and another for touching the arke: so now the office of christian ministers is to preach the word, to minister sacraments, to pray, to bind and loose, where cause vrgently requireth, to iudge in spirituall cases, to pitifully and denounce free reconciliation and remission in the name of Christ, to erect and comfort troubled consciences with the rich grace of the gospell, to teach the people the true difference betwixt the law and the gospell, whereof the one is belonging to such as be not in Christ, and come not to him: the other pertaineth to the true beleeuers in the name of God: to admonish also the magistrates erring or transgressing in their office, &c.

And

The office of ciuill rulers and magistrats.

And as these properly belong to the function of the ecclesiasticall sort: so hath the ciuill gouernour or magistrate againe his proper charge and office to him assigned, which is, to see the administration of iustice and iudgement, to defend with power the right of the weake that suffer wrong, to defend from oppression the poore oppressed, to minister with equalitie that which is right and equall to euery man, to prouide lawes good and godly, to see the execution of the same as cause moueth: especially to see the law of God maintained, to promote Christs glorie and gospell, in setting vp and sending out good preachers, in maintaining the same, in prouiding bishops to bee elected that be faithfull, in removing or els correcting the same being faultie or negligent, in congregating the clergie, when need is of any councell or election, to heare their learning in causes propounded, and according to the truth learned, to direct his iudgement in disposing such rites and ordinances for the church, as make to edification, not to the destruction thereof; in conserving the discipline of the church, and setting all things in a congrue order. Briefly, the office of the ciuill ruler and magistrate extendeth to minister iustice and iudgement in all courts as well temporall as ecclesiasticall: to haue correction ouer all transgressours, whether they be laimen or persons ecclesiasticall. And finally all such things as belong to the mouing of the sword, whatsoeuer, that is to say, all outward punishment is referred to the iurisdiction of the ciuill magistrate, vnder whose subiection the ordinance of God hath subiected all orders and states of men.

Here we haue the witnesse also of Hormisda bishop of Rome, which being well weied, maketh the matter plaine, that princes haue to deale in spirituall causes also, not onely in temporall: where the said Hormisda writeth to Epiphanius patriarch of Constantinople in this sort: Clara coelestis misericordiae demonstratio procedit, quando reges seculi causas de fide, cum gubernatione politiae coniungunt, &c. ex Act. v. vniuersal. Concil. Constantini secundi, An. 538. And thus much & to much peraduenture concerning the matter of iurisdiction, in which point this new church of Rome hath swarued from the ancient church of Rome which was, as is sufficiently proued.

The third point wherein the church of Rome is altered from the church of Rome.

The titles and state of the bishop of Rome.

THe third point wherein the church of Rome hath broken and is departed from the church of Rome, is the forme of title and title annexed to the bishop of that see. As where he is called pope, most holy father, vicar generall, & vicar of Christ, successour of Peter, vniuersall bishop, prince of priests, head of the church vniuersal, Summus orbis pontifex, Stupor mundi, head bishop of the world, the admiration of the world, neither God nor man, but a thing betweene both, &c. for all these terms be giuen him in peptik bookes. Albeit the name pope, being a Greeke name, deriued of παππας, which soundeth as much as Father in the Syracusane speech, may peraduenture seeme more tolerable, as which hath been vsed in the old time among bishops, for so Austen was called of the councell of Aphrike, Hieremy, of Boniface and other. Also Cyprian bishop of Carthage was called Papa. 24. q. 1. cap. loquitur: & dist. 50. cap. Decoo ramen. Item Cleodoueus or (as Rhenanus calleth him) Ludouicus, first christian king of France, calleth a certaine simpler bishop Papam. Hierome also in his epistle to Chromatius calleth Valerianus by the name of pope; and likewise writing to Eustachium and Fabiola, he calleth Epiphanius Beatum papam. In the apologies of Athanasius, we read oft times that he was called Papa, and Archiepiscopus. Ruffinus also lib. 2. cap. 26. calleth him Pontificem maximum. Also Aurelius president in the first councell of Carthage was called of the said councell Papa. ex cap. 4. vi. Concil. Carthag. And before this Eleutherius bishop of Rome, writing to king Lucius the first christian king in this land, calleth him in his epistle, the vicar of Christ, &c. But that any of these tearmes were so peculiarly applied to the bishop of Rome, that other bishops were excluded from the same, or that any one bishop aboue the rest had the name of oecumenicall or vniuersall, or head, to the derogation of other bishops, or with such glorie as is now annexed to the same: that is not to be found neither in histories of the old time, nor in any example of the primitiue church, nor in the testimonies of ancient approued doctors. First, before the councell of Nice, it is euident by pope Pius the second that there was no respect had to the church of Rome, but euery church then was ruled by his owne gouernance, till the yere of our Lord 340. Then followed the councell of Nice, wherein was decreed, that throughout the whole vniuersitie of Christs church, which was now far spread ouer all the world, certaine prouinces or precincts to the number of foure were appointed, euery one to haue his head church, and chiefe bishop, called then metropolitane or patriarch, to haue the ouersight of such churches as did lie about him. In the number of which patriarchs or metropolitans, the bishop of Rome had the first place: the bishop of Alexandria was the second, the bishop of Antioch the third; the bishop of Hierusalem was the fourth patriarch. Afterward in the number of these patriarchs came in also the bishop of Constantinople in the reigne of the bishop of Antioch. So these foure or fiue metropolitans or patriarchs, had their peculiar circuits and precincts to them peculiarly appointed, in such sort, as one of them should not deale within an others precinct, and also that there should be among them equalitie of honour, whereupon we read so oft in the decrees of the old councels, τὰ ἴσα πρεσβεῖα τῇ θρόνῳ, καὶ τὴν τιμήν, that is, Equall degree of themes, and of honour among priests and ministers. Againe, speaking of the said patriarchs or primats, wee read in the second and third chapter of the councell of Constantinople, ἐπισκόπους τοὺς ὑπ' ἑκάστου διοικήσεως μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν, κυριεύειν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, that is, That bishops should not inuade the diocelle of other bishops without their borders, nor confound together churches. &c. Moreouer, the old doctors for the most and best part doe accord in one sentence, that all bishops placed thereelsewer, in the church of God, be Eiusdem meriti & honoris, & successores apostolorum, that is, To be of one merit, of like honour, and all to be successours together of the apostles. Also, he that is the author of the booke called Dionysius Areopagita, calleth all the bishops ἱεραρχικὰς καὶ ἱστιμους, that is, Of equall order, and of like honor. &c. All this while the bishop of Rome was a patriarch, and a metropolitane or bishop called of the first see, but no oecumenicall bishop, nor head of the vniuersall church, nor any such matter. Insomuch that he, with all other bishops, was debarred from that, by a plaine decree of the councell of Carthage, Can. 39. in these words: ὥστε τὸ πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λέγεσθαι ἐξουσίαν ἀρχιερέων, ἢ ἀκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιοῦτόν τινος, that is, That the bishop of the first seat shall not be called the prince of priests, or the high priest, or any such thing.

And lest any here should take occasion of cauilling, to heare him called bishop of the first seat, here is to be expounded what is meant by the first seat, and wherefore he was so called, not for any dignitie of the person, either of him which succeedeth, or of him whom he is said to succede, but onely of the place wherein he sitteth. This is plainely proued by the councel of Calcedon, chapter 28. Wherein is manifestly declared the cause why the see of Rome among all other patriarchall sees is nombred for the first see by the ancient fathers. For why, saith the councel, κατὰ γὰρ τοὺς πατέρας ἐκείνους ἐδόθησαν τοῖς θρόνοις τὰ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, ὃν πατέρες εὐστοχοῦντες ἀποδεδώκασι τὰ αὐτὰ πρεσβεῖα, that is: For that our forefathers did worthily attribute the chiefe degree of honor to the see of old Rome, because the principall reigne or emperie was in that citie, &c. The same also is confirmed by Eusebius Cæsariensis, declaring, Quòd excellentia Romani imperii extulit papatum Rom. pontificis supra alias ecclesias; That the excellencie of the Romane emperie did aduance the popedome of the Romane bishop aboue other churches, &c. Ex Gab. Biel. Moreouer, saith the said Cæsariensis: Nicena synodus hoc contulit priuilegium Rom. pontifici, vt sicut Romanorum rex Augustus præ cæteris appellatur: ita Rom. pontifex præ cæteris episcopis papa vocaretur. That is, The councell (saith he) of Nice gaue this priuiledge to the bishop of Rome, that like as the king of the Romans is named emperour aboue all other kings, so the bishop of the same citie of Rome should bee called pope aboue other bishops, &c. By these places hitherto alleaged (and such other, many more than be here alleaged) it appeareth, that though these titles of supremitie had been attributed to the bishop of Rome, yet it remaineth certaine, that the said bishop receiued that preferment lure non diuino, sed humano, by mans law, not by the law of God. And so is the distinction of the popes prooued false, where is said: Romanam ecclesiam non a concilio aliquo, sed a diuina voce primatum accepisse, That the church of Rome take not his primacie by any councell, but onely by the voice of God. And this is to be said, although it were true, that these titles and tearmes were so giuen to the bishop of Rome in the old time, yet how and by whom they were giuen, yee see. Now to the matter, as touching an vsue with our aduersaries, whether these foresaid titles of soueraignitie were applied in the old time of the primitiue church to the bishop of Rome, as to be called the vicar generall of Christ, the head of the whole church, and vniuersal bishop, remaineth to be proued. Wherevnto this in my mind is to be answered, that albeit the bishops of Rome (of some peraduenture) were so called by the names of higher preeminence of that citie, of some going about to pleasle them, or to craue some helpe at their hands, yet that calling: 1 Was vsed then but of a few. 2, Neither was giuen to many. 3, Was rather giuen then sought for, of the most. 4, Was not so giuen that it maketh or can make any generall necessitie of law, why euery one is so bound to call them, as the bishop of Rome ought so to be taken and called, and that by necessitie of saluation, as the decree of pope Boniface the eight witnesseth, where is said, Quòd sit de necessitate salutis, vt creatur primatus ecclesiæ Rom. & ei subdesit: That it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation, to beleeue the primacie of the church of Rome, and to be subiect to the same, &c.

As touching therefore these titles and tearmes of preeminence aforesaid, orderly to set fourth and declare that histories of times doe say in that matter, by the grace of Christ: 1. First we will see what be the titles, the bishop of Rome doth take and challenge to himself, and what is the meaning of them. 2. When they first came in, whether in the primitiue time or not. and by whom. 3. How they were first giuen to the Roman bishops, that is, whether of necessarie dutie, or volantarie deuotion, whether

4 whether commonly of the whole, or particularly of a few, and whether in respect of Peter, or in respect of the citie, or else of the worthinesse of the bishop which there sat. 4. And if the foresaid names were then giuen of certaine bishops, vnto the bishop of Rome: whether all the said names were giuen, or but
5 certaine, or what they were. 5. Or whether they were then received of all bishops of Rome, to whom they were giuen, or 6 else refused of some. 6. And finally, whether they ought to haue been receiued being giuen, or not. Touching the discourse of which matters, although it appertaine to the possession rather of diuines than historicians, & would require a long and large debating: yet for so much as both in these, and diuers other weighttie controuersies of diuinitie, the knowledge of times and histories must nedes helpe diuines disputing about the same, so much as the grace of Christ shall assist me therein, I will ioyne to the seeking out of truth, such helpe as I may.

And first to begin with the names and titles, how claimed and attributed to the see and bishop of Rome, and what they be, is sufficiently declared aboue, that is, the Chiefe priest of the world, the Prince of the church, Bishop apostolicall, the Vniuersall head of the church, the Head & bishop of the vniuersall church, the Successor of Peter, Most holie pope, Vicar of God on earth, Neither God nor man, but a mixt thing betweene both: the Patriarch or Metropolitane of the church of Rome, the Bishop of the first see, &c. Vnto the which titles or stiles is annexed a triple crowne, a triple crosse, two crossed keies, a naked sword, seuenfold seales, in token of the seuenfold gifts of the holy Ghost, hee being carried pickbacke vpon mens shoulders, after the maner of the heathen kings, hauing all the empire and the emperour vnder his dominion: and that it is not conuenient for any terrene prince to reigne there, where he sitteth, hauing the plenarie fulnesse of power, as well of temporall things as spirituall things in his hands, that all things are his, and that all such princes as haue giuen him any thing, haue giuen him but his owne, hauing at his will and pleasure to preach indulgences, and the croslle against christian princes that soeuer: and that the emperour and certaine other princes ought to make to him confession of fubiection at their coronation: hauing authoritie to depose, and that hee De facto, hath deposed emperors and the king of France: also to absolue the subiects from their allegiance to their princes, whom kings haue serued for sodnen to lead his horse, and the emperour to hold his stirrop: that he may and doth giue power to bishops vpon the bodies of men, and hath granted them to haue pilans, without whose authoritie no generall councell hath any force. And to whom appellations in all manner of causes may and ought to be made. That his decrees be equall with the decrees of Nicen councell, and are to be obserued and taken in no lesse force, than if they had been confirmed with the heauenly voice of saint Peter himselfe. Ex fra. Barth. & alijs. Item that the said bishop of Rome hath the heauenly disposition of things, and therefore may alter and change the nature of things, by applying the substance of one thing to another. cap. Quando de transl. Epis. tit. 7. Item that he can of nothing make something, and cause the sentence, which before was none to stand in effect, and may dispense aboue the law, and of iniustice make iustice, in correcting & changing lawes, for he hath the fulnesse of power. And againe, dist. 40. cap. Si Papa: If the pope bee lead with him innumerable soules by flocks into hell, yet no man must presume to reproue his faults in this world. Item that it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation to beleeue the primacie of the see of Rome, and to be subiect to the same, &c.

These things thus declared, now let vs see whether these names and titles, with the forme and manner of this authoritie and regalitie aboue rehearsed, were euer attributed of any in the primitiue time to the bishop of Rome. For all these he doth challenge and claime vnto him by old possession from the time of S. Peter. And here a question is to be asked of our aduersaries the papists, Whether they will auouch all these aforesaid titles, together with the whole forme and tenour of regalitie to the same belonging as is afore touched, or not? If they will, let them come forth with their allegations, which they neuer haue done yet, nor euer shall be able. If they will not, or cannot auouch them all together in maner as is specified, then why doth the bishop claime them all together so stoutly, wurpe them so falselie, and obtrude them vpon vs so strictlie? Moreouer if the said our aduersaries, being conuicted by plaine euidence of histoyie, and example of time, will yeeld vnto vs (as they must needs) in part, and not in the whole, let vs come then to the particulars, and see what part of this regalitie they will defend, and derive from the ancient custome of the primitiue church, (that is, from the first fiue hundred yeres, I meane after Christ.) First, if the councell of Nice, which was the yeere of our Lord 340. and in the first canon of the said councell, we find it so decreed: that in euery province or precinct some one church, and bishop of the same, was appointed and set vp to haue the inspection and regiment of other churches about him. Secundum morem antiquum, that is, After the ancient custome, as the words of the councell doe purport: so that the bishop of Alexandria should haue power of Lybia, and Pentapolis in Egypt, for as much as the bishop of the citie of Rome hath the like or same maner. And in like sort also in Antioch, & in other countries, let euery church haue his due honour, and consequentlie that the bishop of Ierusalem haue also his due honour to him reserued, so that such order be kept, that the metropolitane cities be not defrauded of their dignitie which to them is due and proper, &c. In this councell and in the same canon first and seuerally, where the bishops of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch, are ioyned together in one like maner of dignitie, first there appeareth no difference of honour to be meant therein. Secondly for so much as in the said two canons after mention made of them, immediately followeth, that no bishops should be made without consent of their metropolitans, yea and that the citie also of Hierusalem should be vnder his metropolitane, and that the metropolitane should haue the full power to confirme euery bishop made in his prouince: therefore it may be well suspected, that the third epistle decretall of pope Anacletus, and of pope Stephanus, with other more, are forged, wherein these bishops, especialle the bishop of Rome, is exempted and disioyned from the name of a metropolitane or an archbishop, to the name of a patriarch or primat: as appeareth in the decrees, Dist. 22. cap. Sacrosancta. Wherefore as wee must needs grant the bishop of Rome to bee a metropolitane or an archbishop by the councell of Nice: so we will not greatly sticke in this also, to haue him numbred with patriarchs or primats. Which title seemeth in the old time to be common to mo cities than to Rome, both by the epistle of Anacletus, of pope Stephanus, of pope Julius, and Leo, &c.

Ex Concil. Nice. can.

Dist. 22. cap. Sacrosancta.

The bishop of Rome called metropolitane, archbishop, patriarch, primat.

After this followed a generall councell in Aphrike, called the first councell of Carthage, An. 420. where were congregated two hundred & seuentene bishops, among whom was also Augustinus, Prosper, Orosius, with diuers other famous persons. This councell continued the space of fiue yeeres, wherein was great contention about the supremacie and iurisdiction of Rome: the bishop whereof then was Zosimus. This Zosimus the Romane bishop had received the same time into the communion of the church without any examination, one that came to complaine to him out of Sicylie, named Apiarius, a priest whom Aurelius the metropolitane with the councell of Aphrike had worthilie excommunicated for his detestable conditions before. Vpon this Zosimus after that he had receiued and theined such fauour to Apiarius, for that he did appeale to him, sendeth to the councell his messengers, to wit, Faustinus bishop of Potentine, and two priests of the church of Rome named Philippus and Asellus, with these foure requests: first, that Apiarius, whom hee had absolued might bee receiued of them againe, and that it might be lawfull for bishops or priests to appeale from the sentence of their metropolites, and also of the councell to the see of Rome.

The first councell of Carthage.

Ex concilijorum vol. 1. in festa Synod. Carthag.

Secondly, that bishops should not saile ouer importunate Ad comitatum. Thirdlie, that if any priest or deacon were wrongfullie excommunicate by the bishops of their owne prouince, it should be lawfull for them to remoone the hearing and iudging of their cause to their neighbour bishops. Fourthlie, that Urbanus their bishop, either should be excommunicated, or else sent vp to Rome, vnlesse he would correct those things that were to be corrected, &c. For the approbation whereof, the said Zosimus alleaged for him the words (as hee pretended) taken out of Nicene councell. The councell of Carthage hearing this, and remembring no such thing in the councell of Nice to be decreed, and yet not suspecting the bishop of Rome, to dare wrongfully to falsifie the words of that councell, writeth againe to Zosimus, declaring that they neuer read to their remembrance, in their common Latine exemplar of Nicen councell any such canon; yet notwithstanding for quietnesse sake, they would obserue the same till time they might procure the originall copies of that councell to be sent to them from Constantinople, Alexandria, and from Antioch. In like effect afterward they wrote to pope Boniface, which then succeeded Zosimus. And thirdly also to Celestinus, which shortly after succeeded Boniface.

Urbanus excommunicate.

The popes of Rome taken with the manner in falsifying the decree of Nicene councell.

In the meane time this foresaid councell sent their legates, Marcellus and Innocentius to Atticus patriarch of Constantinople, and to Cyrillus patriarch of Alexandria, for the authentike copies in Greeke of Nicen councell, which being sent vnto them, and they finding in the true originals no such canon, as the bishop of Rome had falsely forged, they wrote a sharpe and an handsome letter to Celestinus bishop of Rome, calling him in the said letter by the way: Domine frater: declaring to him, how they had perused all the copies of the councell of Nice, & could find no such canon as here and his predecessours had falsely alleaged, and therewithall reciting the first canon afore mentioned, declared how the decrees of Nicen councell had committed all and singuler persons ecclesiasticall, as well bishops as other, vnto the charge of their metropolitans. Moreouer expounding the same decree, they shewed the reasons thereof.

The bishop of Rome called Dominus frater, that is, brother bishop.

Bishops of Rome proued falsifiers of Nicen councell.

1 For that (said they) the fathers of that councell did well foresee, to be most iust and conuenient, that all controuersies there be ended (In isdem locis) where they begin. 1

2 For that it is not to be supposed contrarie, but that the grace of God will be as prest & readie in one prouince as in an other, to instruct his ministers both prudently to vnderstand iudge- 2 iudgement, and constantly to maintaine the same.

3 3 For that there is no need to seeke further to any outlandish helpe, because specially that the party wholsoeuer is not contented with the determination of his iudges or commissioners, may lawfully appeale either to the prouinciall or to any generall councell.

4 4 That way to be better, than to runne to any forren iudge, it must needs be granted; because it is not like that our God will inspire his iustice and truth of examining vnto one bishop, and deny it to a multitude congregated in a whole councell.

Curry courtie to appeale first to his owne archbishop, or conclo to a prouinciall or generall councell.

5 5 Neither can it be, that any such outlandish iudgement in hearing and determining causes, can stand perfect and vpright, for that the necessary persons of witnesses, either for infirmitie of sex, of age, of sickneslle, or some other impeachment, are not able to be present, by whom the truth of the sentence should be directed. Wherefore as by these and other reasons they thought it not conuenient from thence to bring their matters ouer vnto Rome: so neither was it to be found, said they, by any councell of the old fathers decreed, that any legates should be sent from Rome to them, for deciding of their matters. And therefore exhorted they the said bishop of Rome, that he would not induce Fumosum typum (or rather as I may call it) typhos seculi, in ecclesiam Christi, quæ lucem simplicitatis & humilitatis præfert iis qui Deum diligunt, that is, That he would not induce the swelling pride of the world into the church of Christ, which church shewed and giueth the light of simplicitie and of humilitie to such as loue to be Gods, &c. In these foresaid letters moreouer is signified, how the forenamed malefactors Apiarius, whom the bishop of Rome before had absolued and received to the communion of the church, was afterward found culpable, and therefore the councell proceeded against him, brought him to open confession of his faults, and to intombed him bue penance for his demerits, notwithstanding the absolution and inconsiderate clearing of the bishop of Rome before proceeding.

Summarie noting gathered out of the councell of Carthage against the pope.

2 In sum, out of this councell of Carthage these are to be noted. First, how glad the bishops of Rome were to receiue such as came to them so succour.

2 2 What pride they take by the occasion thereof, thinking and seeking thereby to haue all vnder their subiection.

3 3 To the intent to allure other to seeke to them, how readily they were to release and quit this Apiarius as guiltlesse, with after was tried culpable by his owne confession.

4 4 How contrary to the acts and doings of the Romish bishop, this councell condemned him, whom the said bishop of Rome before had absolued, little respecting the proceedings of the Romish church.

5 5 How the bishops of old time haue been fautiers of ancient councels and writings, whereby it may be suspected that they which shamed not to falsifie and corrupt the councell of Nice, much lesse would they sticke to abuse and falsifie the decretall epistles and writings of particular bishops and doctors for their owne aduantage, as no doubt they haue done many one.

6 6 In this foresaid councell, whereat Augustine himselfe was present, and where Aurelius president of the same was called Papa, the bishop of Rome was called expressile in their letters, but bishop of the citie of Rome, and Dominus frater, that is, Brother bishop.

7 7 Secuerthly, the dominion of this Roman patriarch, in the said councell of Carthage, was cut so short, that neither it was permitted to them of Afrike to appeale ouer the sea to him, nor for him to send ouer his legates to them for ending their controuersies. Whereby it may sufficiently appeare, that the Bishop of Rome in those daies was not fully admitted to be the chiefe of all other bishops, nor the head of the vniuersall church of Christ in earth, &c.

8 8 We heare in this councell, fiue causes or reasons giuen, why it is not necessarie nor yet conuenient for all forren causes to be brought to one vniuersall head or iudge, as is before recited.

9 9 Lastly, by the said councell of Carthage, we heare a vertuous exhortation to be giuen to the bishop of Rome, that he would not induce into the meeke and humble church of Christ, the cunning and swelling pride of the world, as is before declared, &c. In this, or in some other councell of Carthage, it was moreouer prouided by expresse law, and also specified in the popes decrees, that no bishop of the first seat, should be called the prince of priests, or the chiefe priest, or any such like thing; but only the bishop of the first seat, as followeth more in the said decree: Vniuersalis autem, nec ciam Romanus pontifex appelletur, that is, Be it enacted, that no bishop, no not the bishop of Rome be called vniuersall bishop, &c. And thus much concerning this foresaid councell of Carthage.

Dist. 99. cap. fedes episc.

The highest title is belonging to a bishop is to be called the bishop of the first seat.

The bishop of Rome forbidden to be called vniuersall bishop.

Synodus Milevitana.

Not long before this councell, was celebrate in Afrike an other councell, called Synodus Mileuitana, about the yeere of our Lord 445, at the which councell also S. Augustine was present, where it was decreed vnder paine of excommunication, that no minister or bishop should appeale ouer the sea to the bishop of Rome. Whereby it may appeare that the bishop of Rome all this space was not vniuersally called by the terme of oecumenicall or vniuersall bishop, but bishop of the first seat: so that if there were any preferment therein, it was in the recurrence of the place, and not in the authoritie of the person. And yet it was not to in the place, that the place importeth the citie of Rome onely, but the first seat then was called metropolitan church, as by the words of the Nicene councell, and other constitutions mo is to be seene, where the foure patriarchs were called πρωτοι, οι πρωτοθρονοι, or πρωτοθρονες. as namely, by the words of y councel of Carthage may appeare, which be these: εἰ μήτε τὰ ἐκκλησιαστικὰ ἢ τὰ τοῦτο πολλάκις τεθειμένα ἐκάστης ἐπισκόπου τόπου ἐν τῇ ἁγίᾳ συνόδῳ τῇ προσῆκον τῷ κατ' ἐξαίρετον λόγῳ, that is, Except he haue some special licence or exception, by the consent of the first seat of the proper bishop in euery countrie, that is, of him that is the primat in the said countrie, &c. Also the words of the can. 39. of the councell of Carthage, before touched be these, ὥστε τὸν πρῶτον τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς μὴ λέγεσθαι ἔξαρχον ἢ ἀρχιερέα, ἢ ἄλλον τοιοῦτόν τι ὄνομα, that is, That the bishop of the first seat be not called prince of priests, or head priest, or else any such like. Against Antetius the tenth bishop of Rome, and pope Stephan and pope Felix, making a difference betweene primate and metropolitane, writeth thus: Licitio archiepiscopus de ordinates, but onely such as haue the first seat, &c. Thus it is made plaine, how the bishop of the first seat, or first bishop, or primate is none other, but he which was called patriarch, and belonged not onely to the church of Rome, but to all such cities and places, where as before among the Gentiles were Primi flamines, &c. dist. 80. cap. 8. 9. 10. & in illis. Where by the way is to be noted the repugnance or contrarietie of such as craftily but falsely haue counterfeited the popes decretall epistles, which besides other great and many coniectures also hereby may be gathered. For where Clement, Anacletus, epi. 1. 2. Anicetus and other, ioyning together the office of patriarches and primates doe diuide the same from the order of metropolitans or archbishops, alleaging therein the constitution of the apostles and their successors, that is to be found false by the canons of the apostles, by the councell of Nice, and by the councell of Antioch with other mo. For in the canons of the apostles, where in euerie canon almost, mention is made of bishops, priests, and deacons, no word is there touched, neither of any other as bone the bishop, or leiuer then the deacon, saue onely in the thirtie three canon, setting an order among bishops the canon willeth the bishops of euery nation to know their first or chiefe bishop, and him to be taken for the head of them: he saith not the head of the church, or head of the world, but the head of those bishops. And where not in Rome onely, but plainely and expresse in euery nation, for to the words purport, τὸν ἐπισκοπον ἐκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, that is, The bishops of euerie nation ought to know the first or chiefe among them, &c. Moreouer, the councell of Antioch reciting the foresaid canon word for word, expounded the matter plainely, in stead of τὸν πρῶτον, writing τὸν μητροπόλεως πρωτοστάτα ἐπίσκοπον: which is as much to say, as metropolitan; and in the end of the said canon, calleth him τὸν μητροπόλεος ἐπίσκοπον, Id est, metropolitanum, 6. q. 3. per singulas. Whereby it is concluded, that to be false, that Clement and Anacletus, and Anicetus be reported, but falsedelie, to put a difference betweene primats or patriarches, and metropolitans, or archbishops. Whereas by sufficient authoritie it is to be proued, that in the old church both primats, first bishops, bishops of the first seat, patriarchs, metropolitans, bishops of the mother citie, and archbishops were all one. First, that primats and metropolitans were both one, is before declared by the canons of the apostles, and by the councell of Antioch aforesaid. Againe, that patriarches and archbishops were all one, it is euident Ex Novella Iustinians cap. 3. vnto the said constitution reciting the foure patriarchs (aboue mentioned) called them by the name of archbishops. And a little after called they the patriarch of Constantinople archbishop, by these words: οὐ τίνες ὑπὸ τὸν μακαριώτατον ἀρχιεπίσκοπον κωνσταντινουπόλεως, καὶ πατριάρχην ὄντα διάφερον εἶναι: that is, Which be vnder the archbishop & patriarch of Constantinople. And after speaking more plainly in the matter, setteth an other order, diuers from that of Clement, Anacletus, and Anicetus, in placing these foresaid persons first beginning with bishops, then ouer them setteth the metropolitan, and ouer him againe, the archbishop, and there staieth, making no further mention of any other aboue him: whole words be these, τίνὲς ἐπίσκοποι ἢ ὁ κατὰ χρόνον ὄντες τοῦ τόπου μητροπολίτου ἐξετάζειν τὰ λεγόμενα, εἰ δὲ μητροπολίτης εἴη, τὸν μακαριώτατον, ὑφ' ὃν τελᾷ. that is, If a bishop be accused, the metropolitane to haue the examination of those things that are brought against him; if the metropolitane be accused, then the archbishop to haue the hearing thereof, vnder whom he diuideth and pertaineth, &c.

If any sute or supplication be brought against a bishop by a minister, first the metropolitane to haue the deciding of the matter, and if any default shall be found in the iudgement thereof, then the hearing and ending of the case to be brought before the archbishop, &c.

In this constitution of Iustinian, although the metropolitane bee placed aboue the bishop, and the archbishop aboue the metropolitane: yet notwithstanding by this is sufficientlie confuted the forged constitution of Clement, Anacletus, Anicetus, Stephanus, and Felix: who in their epistles decretall, ioine together in one forme and order, both archbishop and metropolitane, and aboue them both do place the patriarch, and aboue the patriarch the apostolicall see, to wit the bishop of Rome, as may appeare in reading the first epistle of Clement: In illis autem ciuitatibus, &c. The second epistle of Anacletus, art. 4. prouincie. dist. 99. ca. Nulli archiepiscop. Also the epistle of pope Stephan I first, art. 5. (where note by the way, that Gratianus referreth this place of the epistle to pope Lucius) Item the epistle of pope Felix the second, art. 12. In all which foresaid epistles, this order and difference of degrees is taken, that the first and principall place is giuen to primats or patriarchs, the second to metropolitans, or archbishops, the third to bishops, and finally aboue all these is extolled the apostolicall see of the bishop of Rome, as contrary to all that which before hath been alleaged out of Iustinian, the councell of Nice and of Antioch, &c. Whereby it may appeare, that either Iustinian in preferring archbishops aboue metropolitans, did not read these epistles decretall, if they were vnfeined; or if they were forged, they which forged the said Epistles in their names, did not well aduise that Iustinian had written in this matter before.

Thus then these titles, that a bishop, a metropolitane, bishop of the first see, primat, patriarch, archbishop, that is to meane, chiefe bishop, or head bishop to other bishops of his prouince, we denie not but were in the old time applied & might bee applied to the bishop of Rome, like as the same also were applied to other patriarchs in other chiefe cities and prouinces.

As touching the name likewise of the high priest, or high priesthood, now challenged by the bishop of Rome from scripture, monuments and records of ancient times, but in such wise and sort as it hath beene common to bishops indifferently, and not singularly attributed to any one bishop or see. Whereof testimony we haue out of the seuenth generall councell, dist. 38. ca. Omnes, where the bishops office is called Summū sacerdotium, The hie priesthood, in these words: Substãtia summi sacerdotij nostri iuxta eloquia diuina & traditiones scripturarum disciplina, &c. that is, The substance (say they) of our high priesthood, is the word of discipline of holy scriptures giuen vs from aboue, &c.

Also Fabianus bishop of Rome, in the yeare of the Lord 240. writing in generall to his brethren, and to all bishops and ministers ecclesiasticall, doth attribute to them the same title of Summum sacerdotium, in these words: Deus ergò, fratres, qui præordinauit vos, & omnes qui summo sacerdotio funguntur &c. God (sayth he) prepaained you brethren, & all them which beare the office of high priesthood, &c. cap. 6. q. 3. per singulos. Urbanus the first was bishop of Rome in the yeare of Christ 226. who of his writings alleaged by Gratian, referreth the name & place Summi pontificis, or the high bishop, not onely to the seat of Rome, but indifferently to euery bishop, as appeareth in the wordes of the dist. 51. cap. Now then because this title Constantinople, to take the name of vniuersall Bishop.

Ex quinta Synodo vniuersalis, actione prima, cap. post. constantinum. Thal. cap. dom. in sexto.

Now whether this title of vniuersall bishop, as Mennas and especially Iohannes patriarch of Constantinople, who calling a councell at Constantinople, went about to stablish and ratifie and to dignifie his throne by the consent of the councell, and the emperour of Constantinople, and obteined the same: as appeareth in the fift generall councell of Constantinople, act. the first, where both Menna is named Oecumenicus patriarchanum, and also Ioannes in the said councell is titled Oecumenicus patriarcha ex concil. general. 5. cap. Domino. Concerning the which title although it was then vsed in Constantinople through the sufferance of the emperours, being then willing to haue their imperiall citie aduanced: yet notwithstanding this foresaid title, all this while was not in the citie of Rome. And in Constantinople it then had not been in force (saue aliquo diuino) but onely by mans lawe. And thirdly it was then but vsed verbalis titulus: hauing no true domination vpon all other churches, or any realt subiection belonging to the same; For asmuch as neither the bishop of Rome, nor anie of the west churches were subiect or did acknowledge seruice vnto them, but rather did repugne the same: namely Pelagius the second, and Gregorius the first both bishops at that time of Rome, which Pelagius writing to all Bishops, saith plainely in these wordes: that No patriarch should take the name of vniuersality at any time, because that if any be called vniuersall, the name of patriarch is derogate from all other. But let this be far, saith he, from all faithfull men, to will to take that thing to him, whereby the honor of all his brethren is diminished. Wherefore the said Pelagius chargeth all such bishops, that none of them in their letters vse name any patriarch to be vniuersall, least hee take from himselfe the honour due to him, while they giue that which is not one to another. What can be more euident than these wordes of Pelagius, who was Bishop of Rome next before Gregorie, Anno 583. In like manner or more plainelie, and more earnestlie writeth also Gregorie of this matter in his register, praising and disputing that no man ought to be called vniuersall bishop. Moreouer, with sharpe wordes and rebukes detesting the same title, calling it new, foolish, proud, peruerse, wicked, prophane, and such as to consent vnto it, is as much as to denie the faith. Hee addeth further and saith, that Whosoeuer goeth about to extoll himselfe aboue other bishops, in so doing followeth the fact of Lucifer, to whome it was not sufficient to be counted equall or like vnto other angelles. In his epistles how oft doth he repeat and declare the same to repugne directly against the gospell, and auncient decrees of councels? affirming that none of his predecessours did euer vsurpe to himselfe that title or title, and concludeth that whosoeuer so doth, declareth himselfe to bee a forerunner of antichrist, &c. With this iudgement of Gregorie well agreeth also the words of S. Augustine, lib. 3. cap. 3. de Baptismo, where reciting the words of Cyprian, he thus saith: Neque enim quisquam nostrum se episcopum episcopum constituit, aut tyrannico more ad obsequendi necessitatem colegas suos adigit, &c. that is, For none of vs doth euer set himselfe to be bishop of bishops, or after a tyrannicall manner doth subdue and bring vnder his fellowes vnto the necessitie of his obedience, &c. By these words of Cyprian, and Augustine, it is manifest that in their time was no supremasie, or vniuersall title among bishops receiued, nor that anie great reuerence was had to the bishop of Rome (as Pius the second saith, epist. 201.) before the councell of Nice. And after in that councell the said bishop of Rome had no further authoritie to him limited, than onely onelie ouer his prouince, and places suburbane, bordering about the citie of Rome. Against whose primacie diuerse cities also did resist long after that, as the church of Ravenna, Mediolanes his, and Aquileiensis. Also the Greeke churches long resisted the same, so did the churches of Asia, Rutenicæ, Moscouiticæ, Volachicæ, and other mo.

Gregory against the vniuersalitie of the Bishop of Constantinople.

But to returne againe to Gregorie, who confirming the sentence of Pelagius his predecessor above mentioned, gaue no small occasion about this title matter, both vnto the patriarch, and vnto the Emperour of Constantinople, as witnesseth Antonius, and other, &c. The bishop is thus. After that John being made of a monke, patriarch of Constantinople, by his flatterie and hypocrisie, had obtained of Mauricius the emperour to be exalted aboue other bishops, with the name of vniuersall patriarch, and that he would write to Gregorie bishop then of Rome, for his consent concerning the same: Gregory abiding still in his constancy, did set himselfe stoutly against that ambitious title, and would giue no place. At the same time the Lombards had inuaded the countrie of Italie, and the citie of Rome, the Emperor keeping then at Constantinople, and setting in Italie an ouerseer called Exarchus, to rule in Ravenna. Gregorie perceiuing the Emperor Mauricius to be displeased with him about the matter afore touched, writeth to Constantina the empresse, arguing and declaring in his letters, that presumption and pride of him to be vniuersall patriarch, was both against the rule of the gospel, and decrees of the canons, namelie, the first canon of y Nicen councell, and the nouelitie of that newfound title to declare nothing else, but that the time of antichrist was neere. Vpon this, Mauricius the Emperor taking displeasure with him, calleth home his soldiers against the Italie, and incited the Lombards against the Romans: who buisy their king Agiulphus, thereupon contracte to their league made before, set vpon the city of Rome, and besieged it a whole yeare together, Gregorie yet notwithstanding still remaining in his former constancie. After these afflictions thus ouerpast, Eulogius patriarch of Alexandria, writeth to the said Gregory in his letters, naming him vniuersall pope: vnto whom Gregorie refusing the same, answereth against as followeth.

The letter of Gregory to the Patriarch of Alexandria.

The answere of Gregorie to Eulogius patriarch of Alexandria.

BEhold: in the preface of your epistle directed to me, ye haue vsed a word of a proud name, calling me vniuersall pope, which I pray your holines you will cease hereafter to doe, for that is derogated from you, whatsoeuer is attributed to another more than right and reason requireth. As for me I seeke not mine aduancement in words, but in manners: neither do I account that any honor, wherein the honor of my brethren I see to be hindered: for my honor I take to be the honor of the vniuersall church: my honor is the whole and perfect vigour of my brethren. Then am I honoured when to no man is denied the due honor which to him belongeth. For if your holines cal me vniuersall pope, in so doing you deny your selfe to bee that, which ye affirme me to be, vniuersall: but that God forbid. Let these words therefore go, which do nothing but puffe vp vanity, and wound charity, &c.

Dist. 99. cap. Nouerit.

Gregorie refuseth the name of vniuersall pope.

Now here to let passe to infer all such letters and epistles of his, concerning this matter, written to the Empero? Mauricius and Constantina the Empresse, but that shal more largely appeare hereafter (Christ willing) in the bodie of the historie, when we come to the peare and time of Gregorie, which was well nigh about five hundred yeares after Christ. In the meane season this is sufficient to declare, how the church of Rome with the name and title of vniuersall supremacie now vsed and maintained, hath vtterly swarued from the ancient steps of the primitiue church of Rome.

Now let vs see what the aduersarie side hath to obiect against for the title of their vniuersalitie, or rather singularitie. And first here commeth in a blinde cauillation of a certaine scripture, who gloseth vpon the words of Pelagius aboue recited, labouring to colour the plaine text with a subtile vncouthnesse, as though the sense of the canon were this, not to denie there the state of supremacie: Sed negari ibi aliquem posse esse vniuersalem Episcopum, sub eo sensu duntaxat, quod esset cunctæ ecclesiæ proprius rector, ita quòd nullus alius esset episcopus, &c. that is, Not to denie there, that anie may bee vniuersall bishop after this sense and meaning onelie, to that he should be the proper pastor of euerie church alone, and that there should be to other bishop but he himselfe, &c. This goeth this sophister about to dash out this text, but he cannot so discharge the matter. For neither did John the patriarch then seeke anie such thing, to be bishop and proper pastor of euerie church alone; nor if he had, the councell of Chalcedon and the emperor Iustinian would neuer haue agreed thereunto. Neither is it true, that this glozer denieth Pelagius, heere to forbid the primacie or supremacie of that patriarch, which indeed is the onelie intent of Pelagius in that canon, witnessing as well other historiographers, as namelie, Anton. tit. 12. cap. 3. par. 13. and also the glose ordinarie vpon the same canon, &c.

A sophisticall cauillation vpon the words of Pelagius and Gregory answered.

Out of the same fountaine springeth the like or heric same reason of late reuiued by a certaine new start English clerke in these our daies, who answering to the places of Gregorie touching the said matter, laboureth to auoid the cleare authoritie of him, by a like blind cauillation, saying that John bishop of Constantinople, by this title of vniuersall bishop, vnderstood himselfe onely to be a bishop, and none else. And that Gregorie in resisting him, had none other meaning but the same. And to proue this to be the verie meaning of Gregorie, he reciteth the words of Gregorie written to the said John archbishop of Constantinople as followeth: Qui enim indignum te esse fatebaris, vt episcopus dici debuisses, ad hoc quandóque perductus es, vt despectis fratribus episcopus apperas solus vocari: that it to saie, For thou (John bishop of Constantinople) which sometime diddest grant thy selfe vnworthie the name of a bishop, art now come to this, that thou doost seeke to be called a bishop alone, &c. Vpon this word Episcopus solus, this gloser would ground a surmise, that Gregorie did find fault with the archbishop, not for anie primacie which he sought for: aboue other bishops, but onelie for that he coueted to be a bishop and pastor alone in euery church, in such sort, as there should be no other bishop nor pastor else, but himselfe onely. But as is saide, that was neuer the bishops seeking, nor the matter of Gregories reprehension. For the said Archbishop of Constantinople went not about to be bishop alone (which was too much absurd, and also impossible) but to bee vniuersall alone: nor to take awaie the office from other, but the honour from other: not to depose them, but to despise them. And therefore saith Gregory, Vt despectis fratribus, not Depositis fratribus: to that this word Solus import not a depriuing of others, not a bereauing of other, and impositeth a singularitie in condition aboue other, and not the office or substance of ministration without other, that is, to be vniuersall among manie, and not be one alone without anie, nor to diminish the number of them, but onlie to increase the honour to himselfe. For the more euident probation thereof (although the thing of it selfe is so euident, that it needeth no proofe) I will vse more plaine, than the words themselues of Pelagius and Gregorie: wherewith they charge him for naming before his brethren, for challenging superioritie aboue them, for diminishing their honour, by taking more honour than to him was due, for following the angell of pride in exalting himselfe, in admitting that to him, which the bishops of Rome and their predecessours had refused, being offered to them before, &c. All which declare that he sought not to thrust out all other bishops out of their churches, and but to be himselfe alone. For that was neuer offered to the bishops of Rome by the councell of Chalcedon, that they should be bishops alone, and none other. Neither did Lucifer seeke to haue no moe angels in all heauen but himselfe, but he to be aboue all other alone.

A double vntruth in one popish argument. Peter how he had charge and not charge of the church. The first vntruth in this argument. The dignitie of the church aboue the apostles.

Likewise the word Præcurrere, that is, To runne before another, in the epistle of Pelagius, declareth that John sought not to be bishop alone, but bishop vniuersall. Wee saie not that a man runneth before another, when he runneth alone, and no man followeth him, that is not properly Præcurrere, but Solus currere. Moreouer, in seeking to be superior to other bishops, hee seeketh not to take awaie other bishops, but to make other bishops inferior to him. For where no inferior is, there can be no superior, for simple and together are correlatiues, and infer a necessary respect mutually. And if it were true in this glozer saith, that he had sought to be bishop alone, how would that councell either haue granted that vnto him, or haue offered it to the bishop of Rome before? or if they had, how could it be possible for him alone to serue all churches, without anie fellow bishop to helpe him? And where this forsaide clearke standeth so much vpon the words of S. Gregory: Solus episcopus: Gregorie by those words shall oppunne Gregory, and himselues shall declare another. Therefore if this diuine (whatsoeuer he be, doctor or bachelor) either knoweth not, or would learn, what (onelie bishop) meaneth in this place: an other place of the said Gregorie may instruct him, where Gregorie writing to Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, giueth this reason why he refused the same title offered to him (which then was offered to the said John patriarch of Constantinople) saying: Quia videlicet in vnus patriarcha omnes falli dicitur, patriarchæ omnes cæteris derogatur, sed absit hoc, &c. That is to say: For if one alone would bee called a patriarch vniuersall, then should the name of patriarchs be derogated from all other, &c. Whereby two things are to be noted: First, what thing it was which the patriarch of Constantinople did seeke, for Gregorie here findeth no other fault, but with the same which was giuen to John which was to be called patriarch vniuersall. The second thing to be noted, is the cause why Gregory did rebuke this title, both giuen to John, and offred to him, because (saith he) if one take vpon him the name of vniuersall patriarch, then is the name patriarch taken from the rest. As who would say: if I would take vpon me to be named vniuersall patriarch, then should there be no other patriarch, but I should be bishop patriarch alone. And here commeth in your Solus episcopus, &c.

Furthermore the same Gregorie speaking of the said Solus, in an other place by, seemeth to declare there what he meaneth by this Solus here, in these words as follow: Ve & nulli subesse, & solus omnibus præesse videretur: that is to saie: So that he would be subiect to none, and would be chiefetaine to all other alone, &c. And so by this place may the other place be expounded, Vt solus episcopus fieri, qui solus inter episcopos præesse appetat, that is, he that seeketh to be as bishop alone, who alone seeketh to be exalted aboue other bishops. But to be short in a matter that needeth not many words: he that thus cauilleth vpon this place Solus Episcopus in Gregorie, must be desired here not to take Solus alone, but ioyne twitall the two going before, which is, Despectis fratribus. By the which might seeme sufficiently declared, what Gregory meant by Solus Episcopus, meaning, that to despise other bishops, and to diminish their honor, to set vp his owne, and to be subiect to none, but to preferre himselfe inequally before all others, is as much as to be counted bishop alone. And thus much touching this obiection.

Another obiection of our aduersaries is this: Although (say they) no bishop of Rome was euer called, or would bee called by the name of vniuersall bishop: yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be heads of the vniuersall church. Their reason is this:

Another obiection resolued.

As S. Peter had the charge of the whole church (by the testimonie of Gregorie) committed vnto him, although he were not called vniuersall apostle:

So no more absurd it is for the pope to be called the head of the whole church, and to haue the charge thereof, although he be not called vniuersall bishop, &c.

Wherein is a double vntruth to be noted, first in that they pretend Peter to be the head, and to haue the charge of the whole church: if we take here (charge or heed) in a commun or matter vp to all: for so Peter, were committed to Peter, before the rest of the apostles, which bee but seruants to Christ and to the church: yea and though they were princes of the church, yet after the mind of Waldus, Magic accordeth more to a princelie, quiet and idle life, than to this word (charge) he meant only the office and diligence of teaching: to that I answere: The same Lord that said to Peter, Feed my sheepe, said also to the other, Goe and preach this gospell to all nations. And he that said to Peter, Whatsoeuer you loosell, said also to the other, Whatsoeuer ye remit in the earth. Moreouer if the matter go by preaching, Paul the apostle laboured more therein, than euer did Peter by his owne confession. Plus laboraui, also he suffered more for the same, Plus sustinui, neither was his doctrine lesse sound. Yea and in one point hee went before Peter, and was teacher and schoolemaster vnto Peter, whereas Peter was by him iustlie corrected: Gal. 2. Furthermore, teaching is not alwaies nor in all things a point of mastership, but sometime a point of seruice. As if a Frenchman should be put to an Englishman to teach him French, although he perhaps teach him in the chiefe faculties: yet it followeth not therefore, that he hath fulnesse of power vpon him, to appoint his diet, to rule his household, to prescribe his lawes, to rule his lands, and such other. Wherefore seeing in trauell of teaching, in paines of preaching, in gifts of tongues, in largenesse of commission, in operation of miracles, in grace of vocation, in receiuing the Holie ghost, in vehemencie of torments and death for Christes sake, the other apostles were nothing inferiour to Peter: why Peter then should claime any speciall prerogatiue aboue the rest, I vnderstand no cause. As indeed he neuer claimed any, but the patrons of the apostolicall see doe claime it for him, which he neuer claimed himselfe: neither if he were here, would no lesse abhorre it with soule and conscience, than we doe now: and yet our abhorring now is not for any malice of person, or any bantage to ourselues, but onelie for the vehemencie of truth, and zeale to Christ and to his congregation. Moreouer, if these men would needs haue Peter to be the curat and ouerseer of the whole vniuersall church (which was too much for one man to take charge of) and to be prince of all other apostles, then would I faine learne of them, what meaneth (Dextræ societatis) the right hand of societie betweene Peter, Paul, and Barnabe, mentioned, Gal. 2. What taking of hands, and giuing the pledges and right hand of fellowship: Mr where fellowship is, what mastership is there? Mr againe, what state of mastership is it like that Christ would giue to Peter, who being indeed maister of all, tooke such little mastership vpon himselfe, and that not onelie in inward affection, but also in outward fact? Although I am not ignorant that Peter in diuers places of the gospell hath his commendation, neither doe I denie Peter to be worthie of the same. But yet these words of commendation giue to him no state of superioritie, or iurisdiction vpon all other, to haue all vnder his subiection. for his riper towardnesse: yet this giueth him no fulnesse of authoritie, or power coactiue vpon the rest, vnlesse by speciall admission he be deputed thereunto. Wherefore, nothing can be gathered of Peter, for if it be true that S. Augustine saith, that such things as were spoken to Peter, haue no lightsome vnderstanding, except they be referred to the church, whereof Peter did beare a figure: then hath the person of Peter nothing to claime by these words, but all redounded to the church, which being meant by Peter, hath power by this reason, both ouer the person of Peter, and all other persons in the Lord.

Augustin. in præfat. psal. 103.

But here stumbleth in an argument of our aduersarie againe, which he in the margeut of his booke calleth an inuincible argument drawne out of the bowels of S. John Chrysostome lib. 2. de Sacerd. Whereby he supposeth to haue giuen vs heere not to take Solus alone, but ioyne twitall the two going before, which is, Despectis fratribus. And thus much touching this obiection.

Answer to an inuincible argument vpon-ding by Chrysostome the whole church to be committed to S. Peter.

Another obiection of our aduersaries is this: Although (say they) no bishop of Rome was euer called, or would bee called by the name of vniuersall bishop: yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be heads of the vniuersall church. Their reason is this:

For this cause and fashion, and out of the same figure, the sayns author patcheth moreouer another argument, prouing that the bishop of Rome was tituled the head of Christes church, in the primitiue time of the old ancestors, before the age of Gregorie. His argument proceedeth thus, in the third figure:

Saint Peter was called by the ancient fathers, head of An argument of the papists.

Answer to the argument.

Christs church:

Saint Peter was bishop of Rome:

Ergo, the bishop of Rome was called head of the church in the old ancient time.

This argument sopositticke being cloated vp in the third figure, and concluding singularely, hath rather a shew of an argument, than maketh any necessarie conclusion, standing vpon no mood in the said figure, if the author thereof were put to his triall. Albeit to leaue the same, and to come to the matter of the argument. First, how well will he dispatch himselfe of the maior, and prooue vs that S. Peter although he were at Rome, and taught at Rome, and suffered at Rome: yet that he was bishop and proper ordinarie of that citie and speciall see of Rome? As touching the allegation of Alditus, Optatus, Ado, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, Epiphanius, and Augustine brought forth for his most aduantage, to proue his maior: thus I answer concerning Dionisius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierom and Augustine, that where they speake of S. Peters chaire, or planting the faith at Rome, straightway this man argueth thereupon, that Peter was bishop of Rome: But that doth not cleerely follow. For the office of the apostles was to plant the faith in all places, and in euery region, yet were they not bishops in euery region. And as for the chaire, as it is no difference essentiall that maketh a bishop (for so much as a doctour may haue a chaire, and yet be no bishop) so cannot he conclude by the chaire of Peter, that S. Peter was bishop of Rome. For at this preacher no further, but that Peter was at Rome, and there taught the faith of Christ, as Paul did also, no perauenture in a chaire likewise: yet we say not that Paul was therefore bishop of Rome: but that he was there as an apostle of Christ, whether he taught there standing on his feet, or sitting in a chaire. In the scripture commonly the chaire signifieth doctrine or iudgement, as sitting also declareth such as teach or iudge, whether they sit in the chaire of Moises, or in the chaire of pestilence. Planting likewise is a word apostolicall, and signifieth not onely the office of a bishop. Wherefore it is no good consequent, He sat, he taught, he planted at Rome, his chaire and seat was at Rome; Ergo, he was bishop of Rome. And thus much touching Dionisius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine.

As for Alditus, Ado, Optatus, and such others, although we should haue much wrong offered, and neuer should make an end, if we should be preft with the authoritie of euerie one that could or did mone pen, in all the whole first age of the church, to be our iudges in euery ecclesiasticall matter: and much more wrong should haue, if the authors either corrupted, or counterfeited, should be laid vnto vs, speaking not in the same sense, or in the same tongue, or in the same time wherin they wrote: yet to helpe and to salue the authorities of these authors so much as we may, I answer to their allegations, with this distinction of a bishop, which is to be taken either generallie or specialle. After the first a bishop is he to whom ouer the publike cure and charge of soules is committed, without any limitation of place. And in the name of bishop is coincident with the office of apostle, or any publike pastor, doctor, or curat of the vniuersall flocke of Christ. And thus may Paul, Peter, or any other of the apostles be called bishops. So also is Christ himselfe by expresse word called ἐπίσκοπος and ποίμην, that is, bishop and pastor, 1. Pet. 2. And thus may Peter well be named a bishop of these foresaid authors after this manner of taking. But this publike and generall charge vniuersallie ouer the whole, without limitation, ceased after Christ and the apostles. For then were bishops by places and prouinces appointed, to haue specially ouer sight of some particular flocke or prouince, and so to be residents and attendant only vpon the same.

A double taking of the word bishop.

Christ himselfe a bishop.

The other diuersitie of this name bishop, is so to be taken after a more speciall sort, which is, when any person orderly called, is assigned, namely and specialie to some one certaine place, citie, or prouince, wherevnto he is onely bound to employ his office and charge, and no where else, according to the old canons of the apostles, and of the councell of Nice. And this bishop differing from the other, is called Episcopus ineruallus, hauing his name of his citie or diocelle. And thus may be one that Peter the apostle was euer bishop elected, installed, or intituled to the citie of Rome: neither doth Optatus, Alditus, Ado, or Hierome affirme the same. And if Ado say that Peter was bishop of Rome fiue and twentie yeres, vntill the last yere of Nero, that is cleerlie refuted both by the scriptures and histories: for so he vnderstand by the declaration of S. Paul, Gal. 1. 2. that fourteene yeres after his conuersion, saint Paul had Peter by the hand at Hierusalem.

Euseb. Apost. 23 2. 14. Con. Nice. cap. 15. Concil. Antioch. cap. 10. Peters being at Rome.

Moreouer, the said Paul in the foresaid epistle witnesseth, that the charge apostolicall was committed vnto Peter ouer the circumcised, and so was he intituled. Also S. Iland writing to the Romans, in his manifold salutations to them in Rome, maketh no mention there of S. Peter, which doubtlesse should not haue been vnremembred, if he had been then in Rome. Againe S. Peter, dating his epistle from Babylon, was not then beside at Rome.

Furthermore, histories do record, that Peter was at Pontus fiue yeres, and at Antioch seuen yeres. How could hee then be fiue and twentie yeres at Rome? Finallie, where our aduersaries alleaging out of Ioy, saith, that S. Peter was there fiue and twentie yeres, vntill the last yere of Nero: how can that stand, when S. Paul suffering vnder Nero, was put to death the same day twelue moneth, that is, a whole yere after Peter? &c. But especiallie how agreeth this with scripture, that Christ should make Peter an apostle vniuersall to walke in all the world? Ite per vniuersum orbem. Item, Eritis mihi testes vsque ad fines terræ, &c. And our papists would needs make him a sitting bishop, and intitle him to Rome. How accord these: Apostolus and Episcopus, Ite and sedete, Omnes gentes and Roma together?

Orosius. Tertul. lib. 4. prescript. aduer. hæres. Cypri. lib. 1. ep. 3. Hieron. in Zach. cap. 8. epist. 42.

And thus haue I resolued the first vntruth of that popish demonstration before rehearsed, wherein they thinke to proue that as Peter, although he was not called vniuersall apostle, yet was the head of the whole church: so the pope might and hath had after him the charge of the whole church, although he was not called vniuersall bishop in the old time, &c.

The first vntruth of the argument aboue mentioned.

Now followeth the second vntruth to be touched in the same argument, which is, that because Peter was the head of the church: so therefore the pope must also bee the head of the church, and was, albeit he was not called vniuersall bishop a long time. But this we do deny, yea the matter denied is false by their owne position, for being granted by them, that the title of vniuersall bishop was not receiued at Rome, but refused to the time of Gregorie: then must it necessarilie be granted, that the bishops of Rome before S. Gregorie had not the charge of the whole church, neither could be admitted by that reason to be heads of the church. For so much as there can be no head, but which is vniuersall to the whole bodie, neither can any haue charge of the whole, but he must needs be vniuersall to all and singuler parts of that, whereof he hath the charge. As in sciences, whosoeuer hath knowledge and cunning in all the seuen liberall sciences, and all the parts thereof pertaining to liberal knowledge, is said to be an vniuersall learned man: so in office, to whom ouer the publike charge of all churches both appertaine, how is he not to be called bishop vniuersall? Now if before S. Gregories time, the name of vniuersall bishop was repealed in Rome: how then can the name be refused, and the definition of the name be admitted? Or els let our aduersaries tell vs how they define an vniuersall bishop, seeing this word bishop is properlie the name of office referred or annexed charge. Wherefore, if a bishop be he which hath the charge of all soules in his diocesse committed to him, and must render account for them all; then whose charge extendeth to al singuler churches, & must render account for euery christian soule within the whole world, to him cannot be denied the name of an vniuersall bishop, hauing the office of an vniuersall bishop. Or if he be not an vniuersall bishop, he cannot then haue the charge of the whole, that is, of all singuler churches of Christ. For such is the rule of true definition: Cui conuenit definitio, conuenit & definitum, & contra: Cui adimitur definitio, eidem & definitum adimitur. Although this word vniuersall, in the Greek writers, signifieth that, which we in our vulgar English tongue call catholike: yet I suppose our aduersaries here will not take vniuersall in that sense. For after that meaning, as we do not denie that the bishops of Rome may be vniuersall bishops, so neither can they denie but other bishops also may be as vniuersal, that is, as catholike as they. But such as more distinctly and scholastike discusse this matter, define vniuersall or catholike by these things to wit, by time, place, and person. So that tobatholike extendeth it selfe to all times, all places, and all persons, that is properlie vniuersall or catholike. And contrariwise, what thing is to be called vniuersal or catholike, reacheth to al those three aforesaid, comprehending all places, times, and persons, and extendeth it self of his owne nature to the same, or els it is not to be called properlie vniuersall or catholike. And thus those things there be which most commonlie are call catholike or vniuersall: that is, the church, which is called the catholike church: faith, which is called the catholike faith: a man, whom also we call a man catholike, because these three of their own nature and disposition (no contrarie obstacle letting) extend themselues to to all, ỹ is time, place, nor person is excluded. Which three conditions, if they altogether concurre in the charge of the bishop of Rome, then is it an vniuersall charge, and he an vniuersall bishop: if not, then is his charge neither vniuersall, nor he the head of the church, nor yet vniuersall bishop. For how these three can be separated, I cannot see, except the aduersarie part doe proue it more euidently than yet they haue done.

The second vntruth to be touched in the same argument.

Regula definitionis.

Cui conuenit definitio, conuenit & definitum.

Vniuersall described by three things, time, place, and person.

Three things commonlie called catholike or vniuersall.

And thus much to the obiection of our aduersaries, arguing thus, that as S. Peter being not called vniuersall apostle, yet was the head of the vniuersall church: so the pope although he was not first called vniuersall bishop, had, and might haue the charge of the whole church, and was the vniuersall head of the same. The which obiection containing, as is said, a double vntruth, our aduersaries yet notwithstanding doe builde themselues greatlie to confirm by simbole testimonies and allegations patched out of old and ancient doctors, but specially out of Theodoretus, Irenæus, Ambrose and Augustine, proouing by them that the see of Rome hauing the preeminence & principalitie, hath been honored aboue all other churches. Wherevpon the said aduersarie before minded, grounded his consequent:

To haue vniuersall charge to be head of the vniuersall church, and to be vniuersall bishop are all conuenient together.

Irenæus. lib. 3. Cap. 3. Amb. de dell. gent. lib. 2. cap. 6. Augu. epist. 162.

Irenæus, Ambrose, Augustine and Theodoretus affirme, that the church of Rome is the chiefe of all other churches:

Ergo,

An argument of the papists. Answer.

Ergo, the bishop and head of that church is chiefe and head ouer all bishops, and head of all other churches.

What this consequent is to be denied, for that the excellencie of the church or place doth not alwaies argue the excellencie of the minister or bishop, nor yet necessarily doth cause the same. For in matters of the church which are spirituall, all preeminence standeth vpon spirituall & inward gifts (Spiritualis enim spiritualibus comparatur) as said, pietie, learning and godlie knowledge, zeale and feruencie in the holie ghost, vnitie of doctrine, &c: which gifts many times may excell in a church, where the minister or bishop is inferior to bishops or ministers of other churches. As the most famous schole in a realme hath not alwaye the most famous schoolemaister, neither doth make him thereby most excellent in learning aboue all others. So if our aduersaries doe meane by this preeminence of the church of Rome, such inward gifts of doctrine, faith, vnitie and peace of religion; then say I, the excellencie hereof doth not inferre or argue the excellencie of the bishop. And thus concerning the principalitie of the church of Rome, commended at that time of the doctors, it may be true, and so well expounded one way. And thus do I grant the antecedent of this argument, and denie the consequent. What here will our aduersaries peraduenture replie againe and say, that the principalitie of the church of Rome which is commended by the doctors, is not meant here so much by inward gifts and indowments belonging to a christian church, as by outward authoritie and domination ouer other churches. Wherevnto is to be answered: first, what necessitie is there, or where did our papists learne, to bring into the spirituall church of Christ, this outward sworne of ciuill regiment and policie: that as the Romane emperors in times past gouerned ouer all the world, so the Romane bishop must haue his monarchie vpon the vniuersall cleargie, to make all other churches to stoope vnder his subiection. And where then be the words of our Sauior: Vos autem non sic. If they hold theyr affirmatiue God sic, where then is Christs negatiue Non sic? If they say, there must needs be distinction of degrees in the church, and in this distinction of degrees, superiorities must necessarilie be granted to the outward discipline of the church, for directing matters, for quieting of iarres, for setting of orders, for commensing of conuocations and councels, as need shall require, &c. Against this superiorities we stand not, and therefore we yeeld to our superiors powers, kings, and princes, our due obedience, and to our lawfull gouernours vnder God of both regiments, ecclesiasticall and temporall. Also in the ecclesiasticall state, we take not alway the distinction of ordinarie degrees, such as by the scripture be appointed, as bring the primitiue church allowed, as patriarchs, or archbishops, bishops, ministers and deacons, for of these foure we specially reade as chiefe. In which foure degrees as we grant diuersitie of office, so we admit in the same also, diuersitie of dignitie: neither denying that which is due to each degree, neither yet maintaining the ambition of any singuler person. For as we giue to the minister place aboue the deacon, so the bishop aboue the minister, to the archbishop aboue the bishop: so we see no cause of inequalitie, why one minister should be aboue another minister: one bishop in his degree aboue another bishop to deale in his diocesse: or one archbishop aboue another archbishop. And this is to keepe an order duely and truly in the church, according to the true nature and definition of order by the true schoolie of August. lib. De ciuit. Dei. Where he thus defineth what order was called order: Ordo est parium dispariumque rerum sua cuique loca tribuens dispositio. Order (saith he) is a direction or disposition giuen to all things, according as they are matches, or not matches, proportionallie to euery one his owne right and proper place.

What argument is to be denied.

Preeminence of a church effected after a double consideration.

Obiection. Answer.

The first answere to the obiection.

Non sic, saith Christ: Quod sic saith the pope. Obiection. Answer.

That is an vniuersall bishop.

Hyperiosities in the church. Distinction of degrees in the church. Diuersitie of dignities in degrees. Order kept in the church, and what true order is.

Aug. lib. de Ciuit. Dei cap. 91. Order defined.

This definition of S. Augustine, standing with the things before premised: now here to meet the question betweene vs and the papists, whether the metropolitane church of Rome, with the archbishop of the same, ought to be preferred before other metropolitane churches and archbishops, through vniuersall institution or not? To the answere whereof, if the voice of order might here be heard, it would say: Giue to things that be matches and like, like honour; to things vnlike, vnlike honour, &c. Wherefore, seeing the see of Rome is a patriarchall see appointed by the primitiue church, and the bishop thereof an archbishop limited within his owne bordering churches, which the councell of Nice calleth Suburbicas ecclesias, as other archbishops be: he ought therefore orderly to haue the honour of an archbishop (ordering himselfe thereafter) and such outward preeminence as to other archbishops is due. Now if he do require, he weaketh the rule of right order, he falleth into presumption, and doth wrong vnto his fellowes; and they also doe wrong vnto themselues, if soeuer they be, they yeelding his humor of ambition, giue more vnto him then the forsaid rule of order doth require. For so much as they yeeld to him more then is his right, so much they take from themselues, which is due to them. And the same is the cause, why both Gregorie and Pelagius his predecessor reprehended them, which gaue to the archbishop of Constantinople, that, which vnto the bishop of Rome claimeth to himselfe, charging them with the breach of order in these words: Ne dum priuatim aliquod daretur vni, honore debito sacerdotes priuaeuntur vniuersi, that is,

Ex registro Greg. lib. A. epist. 32.

Lest that while any singular thing is giuen to one person, all other priests be depriued of their due honour. And so the like cause Pelagius exhorteth that no priest do giue to any one archbishop, the name of vniuersall bishop. Ne sibi debitum subtrahat, cum alteri honorem offert indebitum, that is, Lest (saith he) in so doing, he take from himselfe his due honour, while he perdeth that, which is not due to another. And also in the same epistle: Quia si summus patriarcha vniuersalis dicitur, patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur. For (said he) if he be called the chiefe vniuersall patriarch, then is the name of patriarchs derogated to others, &c. Wherefore as is said, seeing the bishop of Rome is an archbishop, as others be, order giueth that he should haue the dignity which to archbishops is due, whatsoeuer is aboue more, is derogation to the rest. And thus much concerning distinction of degrees, and order in giuing to euerie degree his place and honour.

Ex epist. 2. Pelag. 2. dist. 99. cap. Nullus.

The second answere to the obiection before mooned.

The second reason or answere to the obiection before moued, is this: That being granted to the papists, that the doctours aforesaid, speaking of the principalitie of the church of Rome, doe meane not onely of the inward vertues of that church, but also of the outward authoritie and iurisdiction of the same, aboue other churches: yet the cause wherefore they did attribute so much to ỹ church, is to be expended, which was this, as before was alleaged out of the councell of Chalcedon, ca. 28. Διὰ τὸ βασιλεύουσαν τῆς πόλεως ταύτης, that is, For the rule and empirie which that citie of Rome had then aboue other cities; which cause being outward and carnall, was neither then cause sufficient, and now ceasing, importeth not to vs the like effect, according as they say: Sublata causa tollitur effectus. So that by the reason thereof, the foresaid principalitie of the church of Rome, did not hold then Iure diuino sed humano. And as it holdeth by mans law, so by mans law may be repealed againe.

Ex concil. Chalcedon. cap. 28.

Wherefore, be it admitted that both the pope sitteth and succeedeth in the chaire of Peter, and also that he is the bishop of the greatest citie in the world: yet it followeth not thereby that hee should haue rule and lordship ouer all other bishops and churches of the world. For first touching the succession of Peter, many things are to be considered.

Certaine demands for the papists to answer vnto.

First, whether Peter sate, and had his chaire in Rome, or not?

Secondlie, whether he sate there as an apostle, or as a bishop?

Thirdly, whether the sitting in the outward seat of Peter, maketh successor of Peter?

Fourthly, whether he sitteth in the chaire and seat of Peter, which sitteth not in the doctrine of Peter?

Fiftly, whether the succession of Peter maketh rather an apostle than a bishop, and so should we call the pope, the apostle of Rome, and not the bishop of Rome?

Sixtly, whether ecclesiasticall functions ought to be esteemed by ordinarie succession of place, or by Gods secret calling or sending?

Seuenthly and lastly, whether it stand by scripture, any succession at all to be pointed in Christs church, or why more from Peter than from other apostles?

All which interrogatories being well discussed (which would aske a long processe) it should well appeare what little hold the pope hath to take this state vpon him, aboue all other churches as he doth. In the meane time, this one argument by the way may suffice in stead of many, for our aduersaries to answere to at their conuenient leisure. Which argument thus I frame and frame in Camestres.

An argument proouing the popes of this time not successors of Peter.

Ca- All the true successors of Peter sit in the chaire of the doctrine of Peter, and other apostles vniformlie:

me- No popes of this latter church of Rome sit in the chaire of S. Peters and other apostles doctrine vniformlie:

stres. Ergo, No popes of this latter church of Rome bee the true successors of Peter.

And when they haue well perused the minor of this argument, & haue well conferred together the doctrine taught them of S. Peter, with the doctrine taught now by the popes, of iustification of a christian man, of the office of the laie, of the strength and largenes of time, of mens merits, of free will, of works of supererogation, of setting vp images, of seuen sacraments, of auricular confession, of satisfaction, of sacrifice of the masse, of communicating vnder one kind, of eleuating and adoring the sacramentall elements, of Latine seruice, of inuocation, of prohibition of meats and mariage, of vowing chastitie, of sects and rules of diuers religions, of indulgences and pardons: also with their doctrine taught now of magistrates, of the seuerall of power, and regalitie of the see of Rome, with many other like to these, &c: then will I be glad to heare what they will say to the premisses.

Secondly, if they would proone by the allegation of the doctors, Irenæus, Ambrose, Augustine, Theodoretus aforesaid, the bishop of Rome to be the chiefe of all bishops therefore, because the citie whereof he is bishop is the chiefe and principall aboue all other churches, that consequent is to be denied. For it followeth why not (taking, as I said, the principalitie of that church to stand διὰ τὸ βασιλεύουσαν τῆς πόλεως, that is, vpon the principall dominion of that citie) no more than this consequent followeth.

London is the chiefe citie in all England:

W. ỹ. Ergo,

Ergo, The bishop of London is the chiefest of all bishops in the realme.

Which argument were derogatorie to the bishop both of Canturburie and of Yorke.

But to grant yet more to our aduersaries (which is all they can require) the mind of the foresaid doctors, as Irenæus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoretus, in giuing principalitie vnto Rome, to haue respect vnto the vertue of succession from Peter, & not vnto the greatnesse of the citie: yet notwithstanding, for all this their argument holdeth not, if it be rightly considered, to say:

A false conclusion of the papists.

The apostolicall see of Rome, hauing succession from Peter, with the bishops thereof was chiefe then of all other churches in the primitiue time of these doctors:

Ergo, The apostolicall see of Rome, with the bishops thereof, hauing succession from Peter, ought now to be chiefe of all other churches in these our daies.

Answere to the consequent.

This consequent might well follow, if the times were like, or if succession which gaue them the cause of principalitie, were the same now, which was then. But now the time and succession is not correspondent, for then succession in the time of these doctors was as well in doctrine apostolicall, as in place apostolicall. Now the succession of doctrine apostolicall hath long ceased in the see apostolicall: and nothing remaineth but onely place, which is the least matter of true spirituall and apostolicall succession. And thus much to the authoritie and testimonie of these forenamed doctors.

Succession apostolicall possible were to be considered.

Besides these obiections heretofore recited out of Irenæus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoretus, our aduersaries yet obiect and heape vp against vs moreouer examples of the primitiue time of the church, testimonies of generall councels, and opinions of ancient writers taken out of the bookes of councels, and epistles decretall, wherby their intent is to prooue the foresaid termes (of the head of the church, ruler of the church, chiefe of all other priests) to be applied not onely to Peter, but also to the bishop of Rome within the compasse of the primitiue time. And here commeth in the testimonie cited of Tiberius Hieronimus. Of the epistle of Paschalius and his fellowes, writing to Leo from the councell of Chalcedon. The testimonie also of Iustinian the emperour in his Codex: Iubere Ioannes then pope was called Caput omnium ecclesiarum, epist. inter claras, cap. De summa trinit. & fide cath. The testimonie also of Athanasius, with his fellow bishops of Egypt, of Thebaida, and Lybia, in their epistles to pope Marcus, Liberius, and Felix. Likewise the testimonie of Jerome, In prefat. 4. Euang. Item epist. 42. tom. 1. Item epist. 41. tom. 2. Of S. Ambrose, 1. tom. 2. Of S. Augustine to Boniface. Ad Bonifac. contra duas epist. Pelagian. lib. 1. cap. 1. Item lib. 2. de baptism. ca. 1. Of Theodoretus in his epistle to pope Leo. epist. commentar. in Pauli epist. prefixa. Of Chrysostome, epist. ad Innocentium, tom. 5. &c. By which testimonies our aduersaries would prooue S. Peter, and after him the bishop of Rome to be called and taken for head of the church, chiefe bishop, prince & ruler of the whole clergie. To all which obiections fullie and orderly to answer in order, would require a whole volume by it selfe. In the meane time, leauing the rest vnto them, vnto whom it doth more properlie appertaine, briefly with this one short distinction I answer these and all such other like places, where S. Peter with his successours are called, head of the church, chiefe of bishops, prince of the apostles, &c. In which places, this word head, chiefe, and prince of the apostles, may be taken two manner of wayes: to note either dominion, or els commendation. For so we read sometime Caput & Princeps, to be words not of authoritie, but of excellencie, whereby is declared the chiefest and worthiest part among many parts, and not possessour and gouernour of the whole. Like as in the person of man, the head is the principall part of the whole bodie, being indued with reason, and furnished with most excellent senses, by the which the whole body of man is directed, so threef is termed by a metaphore, to what man or thing soeuer nature or condition hath giuen the greatest excellencie of gifts and properties aboue other parts or members, the same societie to be called of the said parties, Caput or Princeps, head or prince. And yet the same head or prince so called, hath not always dominion or iurisdiction of the rest. So we call in our vulgar speech the head or chiefe men of the parish, who for their riches, wisdome, or place, are most specially noted: after like phrase of speech we call the head man of the inquest, him that hath the first place: and yet neither they nor these haue any dominion or iurisdiction vpon the residue. In a schole the chiefest scholler in learning, is not therefore the maister or gouernor of his fellowes. Neither hath M. Cicero any title therby to claime subiection and seruice of all other orators, because hee is named Princeps eloquentiæ, & goeth before them in that kind of phrase. The same Cicero, lib. 1. offic. calleth Cratippum principem huius ætatis philosophorum, as Hauneras also may bee called Poetarum princeps: and yet neither philosophers to Cratippus, nor poets to Homer owe any thing else, but only fame and praise.

Testimonies alleaged for the primacie of the pope.

Answere by a distinction.

Caput & princeps haue a double understanding.

And what if S. Peter the blessed apostle be called and counted of the old ancient doctours, as head and prince of the apostles, which is as much as Coryphæus apostolorum, for his excellent faith, for his diuine confession and singular affection to the Lord Iesus: yet what interest or charge either hath he to challenge ouer the apostles, or the pope after him ouer all other bishops and the whole church of Christ, although the pope haue the like excellencie of Christs faith which Peter had, as would God he had! Is concerning these allegations therefore out of the doctors, two things are to be obserued: first, that neither these names and titles though they be giuen to Peter, do giue him any state or dominion aboue other apostles: nor yet the succession of him doth further any whit this celsitude and regalitie of the pope to aduance him aboue his fellow archbishops, as he now doth.

Petrus princeps & coryphæus apostolorum.

And if our aduersaries would needes prouoke vs to the numbring of testimonies, and diuiding the house (speaking of the writers and councels of the primitiue age) for these aforesaid testimonies alleaged on their side, I could on the contrarie part recite out of the volumes of doctors, out of the examples of councels, and practises of emperors, no lesse than fortie boires, much more repugnant against their assertion, than there is for the pope. The tractation whereof for this present I do refer, either to them that haue more leasure at this time to discourse them, or else omit it to another time, if the good pleasure of the Lord shall be to grant me further leasure in another booke to intreat thereof at large, in such order, as (if the Lord so grant) shall appeare sufficient matter to prooue by the doctors, generall councels, examples and histories of time, that the bishops of Rome, during the first fiue hundred yeares after Christ, although for the greatnesse of the empire, were somewhat more magnified than the other, and therefore were sought of many, and were flattered of some, and they themselues diuers did set foorth themselues more than they should: yet by the common consent of churches were stopped of their purpose, so that by the consension of the most part, within the compasse of that age the bishops of Rome had not this regall state of title, iurisdiction, and fulnesse of power, which now they vsurpe, but were taken as archbishops, of equall honour, of equall merit with other archbishops and rulers of the church. And if any preferment was giuen vnto them touching more the rest, yet neither was it so giuen of all, nor of the most part: secondlie, neither was it so giuen of them for any such necessitie of Gods word. Aut iure aliquo diuino, as which did so bind them thereunto, nor yet so much for the respect of Peter, and his succession: as for certaine other causes and respects, as may be gathered to the number of thirteene.

Thirteene causes of aduancing the see of Rome.

1 Of which, the first is the greatnesse of the citie and monarchie of Rome.

2 The second, is the authoritie of the emperour Constantine the great, first of the emperours conuerted to the faith, and raising in the same citie, by whom the vniuersall liberte of the church was first promoted: and the causes of the bishops being then at variance, were committed partly to the bishop of Rome, partly to other bishops neere by, to be decided, as appeareth. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

3 The third was the councell of Nice, which confirmed the preeminences of that church to haue the ouersight of the churches bordering about it.

4 The fourth cause of aduancing the church of Rome, was the vnquiet state of the Greeke church, much troubled in th se daies with sects, factions, and dissensions, whereof we may read, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 15. Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 8.

How the church of Christ ought to be gouerned.

5 The fift, when as synods were called by other metropolitans, then if it chanced the bishops of Rome to be absent, and their sentence being absent to be required, by the occasion thereof they began at length to take their sentence to: a canon or rule ecclesiastical, and thereby to refuse other synods, where their decree or sentence was not required.

6 Another cause was, that when any common matter was in hand in other places, whatsoeuer was done, commonly the manner was to write to the Roman bishop for his approbation in the same, for publike vnity & consent to bee had in Christs church, as appeareth, Lib. 10. epist. 78. Ambrol. ad Theophil.

7 Item, for that the testimonie sometimes of the Romish bishop was layed in those daies also to be beleeued, for admitting teachers and bishops in other churches, whereof we haue example in Socrat. lib. 4. cap. 37.

8 Moreouer, this was a great setting vp of that church, when as their sentence not onely was required, but also executed diuers times of other bishops. And when bishops of other prouinces were at any dissension among themselues, they of their owne accord appealed to the bishop of Rome, desiring him to cite the parties, and to haue the hearing and deciding of the cause, as did Pacatius and Hyspchius send to Iulius then bishop of Rome, &c.

9 Item, in that certaine of the Arrians returning from their Arrianisme, offered vp and exhibited vnto the bishops of Rome their libels of repentance, and were of them receiued againe, as Vrsatius and Valens did to Iulius. Socra. lib. 2. cap. 24.

10 The tenth cause was also, for that Gaianus the emperor made a law, that all men should retaine that religion which Damasus bishop of Rome, and Peter bishop of Alexandria did hold. Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 4.

11 And also, if it happened the bishop of Rome to disallow the ordering of any minister or ministers, the popes perceiuing how how diligent and readie they were to seeke their fauour, and to send vp their messengers to Rome for their purgation, whose thereby no little maner of exaltation. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 23.

12 Besides these aforesaid, the bishops of Rome had also an other artificiall practise, that in sending out their letters abroad, as they did to many, in all their epistles (if the epistles be theirs and not forged) euer they were harping of the greatnes of their name, and of their apostolicke see, and of the primacie of S. Peter, their predecessour, and prince of all the apostles, &c. And this they vsed in euery letter, whensoeuer they wrote to any, as appeareth in all their letters decretall, namely, in the letters of Siluiades, Marcellus, and Marcus, &c.

13 Againe, many of the east church directed any writing to them, wherein any signification was contained of neuer so little reuerence giuen vnto them (as learned men commonly vse for modesties sake) that was taken by and by and construed for plaine subiection and due obedience, as declareth the letter of Damasius written to the bishops of the east church, beginning thus: Quòd debita reuerentia, &c. In English thus: But that your charitie yeeldeth due reuerence to the apostolicall see, you in so doing (deare children) doe much for your selues, &c. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 9. where as the bishops of the east church notwithstanding had shewed little or no reuerence in their epistle to pope Damasius before.

Thus haue ye the first and original grounds, by the means whereof, the archbishops of the Romish see haue atchieued to this their great kingdome and celsitude ouer Christs church, first beginning the mysterie of their iniquitie by that which was modestly and voluntarily giuen them; afterward by vse and custome claiming it ambitiouslie vnto them of dutie and seruice, and lastly holding fast (as we see) that which once they had gotten into their possession, to that now in no case they can abide the birds to call home their feathers againe, which they so long haue disrayed.

The latter church of Rome differing from the first church at Rome, in some of gouernment.

And thus much concerning the life, iurisdiction, and title of the Romane bishops: in all which (as is declared) they, and not we, haue fallen from the church of Rome. To these I might also ioyne the manner of gouernment, wherin the said Romish bishops haue no lesse altered both from the rule of scripture, and from the steps of the true church of Rome, which gouernment as it hath been, and ought to be onely spirituall, to hath the clergie of Rome vsed it of late yeeres no otherwise than hath the carthly king or prince gouerned his realme and dominions, with riches, glorie, power, terror, outward strength, force, prefort, death, execution, lawes, policies, promoting his friends to dignities, reuenging his affections, punishing and correcting faults against his person more than other offenses against God committed, lying and abusing in all these things the word of God for his pretert and cloke to worke his worldly purpose withall; whereas indeed the word of God ministreth no such power to spirituall persons, but such as is spirituall according to the saying of the apostle: Arma militiæ nostræ non sunt carnalia, sed spiritualia, &c. The armour and artillerie, saith S. Paul, of our warfare, is not carnall, but spirituall: such as serue not against flesh and bloud, nor against the weake person of man: but against satan, against the gates of hell, and the prophundities of the wicked power, &c.

Which armour as it is all spirituall, so ought they, which haue the dealing thereof, to be likewise spirituall, well furnished with all such gifts and graces of the holie ghost, met for the gouernance of his spirituall church: as with wisdome and knowledge in the scripture to instruct the ignorant: with inward intelligence and foresight of the craftie cogitations and operations of satan, with power of the spirit to resist the same: with practise and experience of temptations, to comfort such as be afflicted and oppressed of satan: with heauenly discretion to discerne spirits, and truth from untruth: with iudgement and knowledge of tongues and learning to conuict error: with zeale of Gods glorie, with feruencie of prayer, with patience in persecution: with a mind contented with all cases and states inclient, with teares and compassion on other mens griefes: with stoutnes and courage against proud and stout oppressors: with humilitie toward the poore and miserable: with the counsell of the Lord Iesus, by his word and spirit to direct him in all things to be done: with strength against sinne: with hatred of this world: with gift of faith: power of the keies in spirituall causes, as to minister the word, the sacraments and excommunication when the word biddeth, that the spirit may be giuen and to reconcile again, as cause requireth, &c. These & such like are the matters wherein consisteth the sinews and strength of the church, and for true gouernance of the same. But contrarie to these aforesaid both the bishop & clergie of this latter church of Rome, proceeding in their administration and gouernance, as who vnder the name and pretense of Christ and his word, haue exercised of long time nothing else but a worldly dominion, seeking indeed their owne glorie, not the glorie of Christ: riches of the world, not the lucre of soules: not feeding the flock, but filling the purse: reuenging their owne wrongs, but neglecting Gods glorie: striuing against man onlie, and killing him; but not killing the vice, nor confuting the errour of man: strong against flesh and bloud, but weake against the diuell, stout against the simple, but meeke against the mightie: briefly, doing almost all things preposterouslie, more like to secular princes, than spirituall pastors of Christs flocke, with outward forcement, and feare of punishment, with prisoning, famishing, hanging, racking, drowning, heading, slaying, murdering, and burning, and warring also on the other side, with his riches and treasures, with his gard and gardiance, with strength of men, with court and cardinals: with pompe and pride about them, with their triple crowne, with the naked sword, with their ordinarie succession: with their lawes, and executions: their promotions and preferments: their biddings and commandings: threatnings and reuengings, &c.

Preposterous gouernment of the church by the pope.

In fine, to compare therfore the images of a worldly kingdome, with this kingdome of the pope, there is no difference, saue onely that this kingdome of the pope, vnder hypocrisie maketh a face of the spirituall sword, which is the word of God: but in very deed both all things with the temporall sword, that is, with outward forcement and coaction: differring nothing from ciuill and secular regiment in all properties and conditions, if it be well considered. For as in an earthly kingdome, first there is a prince or some chiefe magistrate appointed, hauing dominion ouer his nobles and commons, containing all his subiects vnder his statutes and lawes, with the which lawes notwithstanding he disposeth at his pleasure: vnder whom all other inferiour magistrats haue their order and place to them appointed to rule ouer the subiects, and yet to be subiect vnder him: so if the state and forme of the pope be well considered, we shall see it alreteth nothing from the same, but only in the names of the persons. In ciuill gouernment, all subiection is referred to one head ruler, whose authoritie surmounteth all the rest, and keepeth them vnder obedience: in like maner, the gouernment of the popish church is committed to one man, who as chiefe steward, ouerseer and ruler of Christs household in his absence, hath supreme power ouer all churches, to moderat and direct all the affaires thereof. What heere standeth the difference, in ciuill policy he is called a king or prince: here he is called a pope.

A comparison betweene the kingdome of this world and the kingdome of the pope.

The king hath next vnto him his dukes and earles: the popes nobilitie standeth in his cardinals & legats, who though they be no dukes in name, yet in pompe and pride will not onely giue checke to them, but also mate to kings themselues, if they might be suffered, as did Theodorus, Lanfraucus, Anselmus, Thomas Becket, and so would Thomas Wolsey haue done, had not the king giuen him a necke to his mate betime. In ciuill policie next to dukes and earles followeth the order of lords, barons, knights, esquires, gentlemen, with maiors, shiriffes, constables, bailiffes, wardens, &c. The like race is to be seene also, although vnder other names, in the popes politie: of primats, bishops, suffragans, prouosts, deans, canons, vicars, archdeacons, parsons, priests, deacons, subdeacons, acolits, exorcists, lectors, doore keepers, singers, with other clerks. And as in the other vnder wardens commeth the order of scauingers: so neither doth the popes monarchy lacke his chanelrakers, to whom may well be compared the rablement of abbats, prouincials, priors, monks, friers, with their couents, and nunries.

Secular nobilitie compared with ecclesiastical nobilitie.

Ciuill magistrats compared with ecclesiasticall.

Moreouer, from iustices, iudges, lawyers, sergeants, attorneies, which be necessarie officers in the common wealth, what differeth the popes inquisitors, canonists, doctors, and bachelors of the popes laws, commissaries, scrials, proctors, pursuitors, with such others, which serue no lesse in spirituall court and in the consistorp, than the other aforesaid do in temporall court, or in Guildhall? Now who so list to compare the glorie & magnificence of the one, with the glorie of the other: also the power and strength of the one regiment, with the power of the other: and so the riches of the one, with riches of the other: I suppose he shall see no great ods betweene them both, taking the popes kingdome, as it hath stood in his full cuffe, and yet both stand where churches are not reformed. As for subtilitie and politike practise, there is no man that doubteth that is indifferent, nor that seeth not that hath his eies, but that the popes hierarchie in holding vp their state, far excelleth all the kingdomes of worldly princes, of whom all other may take example to learne.

Officers of the temporall court compared with the officers of the spirituall court.

Glorie compared.

Power compared.

Riches compared.

Subtilitie compared.

Thus in comparing the popes regiment with ciuill gouernance, as they doe little or nothing dilagree a sunder: so in comparing again the same with the order of scriptures, or with the regiment that was in the old ancient church of Rome, we shall see no resemblance betweene them. As we read in the apostles time, all the armour of Christs ministers was spirituall and full of godly power against the spirituall enemies of our saluation, gouerning the church then with peace, patience, humilitie, true knowledge of God, the sword of the spirit, the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousnesse, hartie charitie, sincere faith, and a good conscience: so after the apostles in the time of Ambrose, by his owne testimonie is to be vnderstood, that the armour of churchmen was then, Preces & lachrymæ, prairs and teares: where now the armour of the popes priesthood is nothing els but Ignis & ferrum, fire and sword, wherewith they keepe all things vnder their subiection. And heere commeth the enorme and horrible abuse of excommunication, suspension, and interdiction in cases frinolous, or worldly, and for such as for which the ciuill magistrat will not commit any citizens to the stocks, the popes censure will not sticke to commit a christian to the diuell: not to speake of their other vsurped dealings

The difference betweene the popes regiment and the order of the primitiue church.

2. Cor. 10. Ephes. 6. 1. Tim. 1. The armour proper to churchmen.

Horrible abuse of excommunication in the popes church.

The popes gouerning in matters of religion not pertayning.

and doings in matters, that belong to the ciuill sworde, and be to them impertinent. As in punishing whoredome and aduoutrie, in administration and probats of testaments, in bearing ciuill office, as popes to be senators of Rome, and emperour also Sede vacante, cardinals to be captains in warr, and rulers of regions: bishops to be presidents or chancellors, priests to be stewards in great mens houses, or masters of mints, or clerks of the market, or gardiners to gentlemen, &c. All which here I ouerpasse, referring them to the deeper consideration of such as haue more leisure to marke the order of their doings, and so to iudge of the same with indifferencie, according to the rule of truth, touched with Gods worde, and publike examples of the ancient church of Christ in the primitiue time.

The corrupt doctrine of the popes church reuiued and bettered.

Thus hauing discoursed sufficiently so much as concerneth the manner of life, stile, iurisdiction, & gouernment of the popes see in al which points is to be scene how this latter church of Rome hath receded from the true ancient church of Rome) now remaineth, according to my promise, and order prefixed, consequently to proceed to the fourth and last point, which is of doctrine: wherein consisteth the chiefest matter that maketh with vs and against them, in such sort as (their doctrin standing as it doth) neither they are to be reputed for true catholikes, being altered so far from them: no we otherwise then heretikes if we should now ioine with these. For the more triall whereof, let vs examine the doctrine and rites of the said church of Rome now vsed, and compare the same with the teaching of the ancient catholikes, to the intent that such simple soules as haue been hitherto, & yet are seduced by the false colour and image of this pretended and bastarde church, perceiuing that lieth within it, may be warned betime, either to eschew the perill, if they list to be instructed: or if not, to blame none but themselues for their owne wilfull destruction. And albeit I could here charge the newfangled church of the pope with fewer or eight hainous crimes, as blasphemie, idolatrie, hereste, superstition, abhorrible, banitie, cruelti, and contrarietie (as which neither agreeth with the old learning of their fore-elders, nor yet with themselues in sundrie points) yet after a more temperate sort to passe this matter with them, these two things I will and dare boldly affirme, that in this doctrine of the pope now taught in the church of Rome, is neither any consolation of conscience, nor saluation of mans soule. For seing there is no life nor soules health but only in Christ, nor any pramise of saluation or comfort made, but onelie by faith in the sonne of God: that assurance then can there be of perfect peace, life, or saluation, where that which onelie maketh all, is least made of, and other things which make least are most esteemed? For to say the simple truth, what els is the whole course and body of the popes law now set forth, but a doctrine of lawes, a heape of ceremonies, a teaching of traditions, a meditation of merits, a foundation of new religions? all which confer not one iot to the iustification of our soules before the terrible iudgement of God.

No comfort nor saluation in the popes doctrine nowe taught.

And therefore (as it may be truelie said) this doctrine of the pope to be void of all true comfort and saluation: so likewise it semeth that these which addict themselues so deuoutly to the popes learning, were neuer carnestly afflicted in conscience, neuer humbled in spirit nor broken in heart, neuer entred into any serious feeling of Gods iudgement, nor euer felt the strength of the law and of death. For if they had, they should some haue seene their owne weakenesse and be driuen to Christ: then should they haue seene what a horrible thing it is to appeare before God the father, or once to thinke on him (as Luther saith) without Christ. And on the contrarie side, then should they know what a glorie, what a kingdome, what liberti and life it were to be in Christ Iesus by faith, holding their inheritance, not with the bondsonne of Agar, but with the free sonne of Sara: by promise, and not by the law: by grace, and not by workes: by gift, and not by deserving: that God onely might be praised, and not man.

The scope and summe of the popes doctrine whither it rendreth.

Papists neuer rightly afflicted in conscience deeply.

An horrible thing to thinke of God without Christ. Luther.

And thus were the old Romans first taught by S. Paul writing to the Romans. The same did Cornelius the Romane, and first that was baptised of all the gentils, learne of S. Peter when he receiued the holy ghost, not by the deeds of the law, but onely by hearing the faith of Iesus preached. And in the same doctrine, the said church of the Romans many yeeres continued, so long as they were in affliction. And in the same doctrine, the bishop of Rome with his Romans now also should still remaine, if they were such ancient catholikes as they pretend, & would follow the old mother church of Rome, and hold the first liquor wherwith they were first seasoned. But the sweet verdor and sent of that liquor and pleasant mustis now cleane put out through other vnsauorie inuentions of the popes thrusting in: so that almost no taste nor sence remaineth of all that primitiue doctrine, which S. Paul and other apostles first planted among the gentils. And what marueil if the Romans now in so long tract of time haue lost their first sap, seing the church of the Galathians then in the dayes of S. Paul their schoolemaster, he being amongst them, had not so sone turned his backe a little, but they were all turned almost from the doctrine of faith, and had much adoe to be recouered againe?

The right faith of the old Romans. Cornelius, a Roman first baptised of all the gentils.

The church of Rome hath lost the liquor wherewith it was first seasoned.

The Galathians almost gone from faith in S. Pauls time.

Of this defection and falling from faith, S. Paul expressly foretelleth vs in his letters both to the Thessalonians, and also to Timothie, where he sheweth, that a defection shall come, and that certaine shall depart from the faith, attending to spirits of error, &c. 1. Tim. 4. And to know what errors these shall be, the circumstance plainely leadeth vs to vnderstand in the same place, where the said apostle speaketh of marked consciences, forbidding men to marrie, and to eate meates ordained of God to be taken with thanksgiuing, for mans sustenance, most euidently as with his finger, pointeth out vnto vs the church of Rome, which not in these points onely but also in all other conditions almost is vtterly reuolted from the pure originall sincerite of that doctrine, which S. Paul planted in the church of the Romans, and of all other gentils. 1. Tim. 4.

The summe of S. Pauls doctrine
deliuered to the gentiles.

A briefe summe of S. Pauls doctrine deliuered to the gentiles.

1 FIrst, the doctrine of S. Paul ascribeth all our iustification freely and merely to faith onely in Christ as to the only meanes and cause immediat, whereby the merits of Christes passion be applied vnto vs, without any other respect of workes or works of the law, whatsoeuer: and in this doctrine the church of the Romans was first planted.

Saluation by mercie onely, and not by merits.

2 Secondly, the same doctrine of S. Paul cutting off & excluding all cleane of mans deserving, fraieth onely vpon Gods promise and vpon grace, not mans merits: vpon mercie, not mans labouring or running: vpon election and calling, not mans willing, &c.

All flesh concluded vnder sinne.

3 Thirdly, the same doctrine casting downe the strength of man and his integra naturalia (as the schooles doe terme them) concludeth all flesh vnder sinne, and maketh the same destitute of the glorie of God.

Difference betweene the law and the gospell.

4 Item, it maketh manifest difference betweene the law and the gospell, declaring the vse and end of them to be diuers: the one to kill, the other to quicken; the one to condemne, the other to iustifie; the one to haue an end and a time, the other to be perpetuall, &c.

Iustitia Dei. & Iustitia propria.

5 Item, the same doctrine of S. Paul, as it sheweth a difference betweene the law and the gospell; so it maketh no lesse difference betweene Iustitia Dei, & Iustitia propria: that is, the righteousnes of God and the righteousnes of man, abhorring the one, that is, mans owne righteousnes, comming by the law and works; and embracing the other which God imputeth freelie and gratiouslie to vs for Christ his sonnes sake, in whom we beleeue.

The right-iusnesse of God, and the righteousnes of man how they differ in scripture.

6 Item, it wipeth away all traditions, and constitutions of men whatsoeuer, especially from binding of conscience, calling them beggerlie elements of this world.

A true christian knoweth nothing but Christ crucified.

7 Likewise it vtterly wipeth away all curious subtilties, and superstitious speculations, and knoweth nothing else but Christ onely crucified, which is onely the obiect whereunto our faith leaneth.

All men condemned by one. All men saued by one.

8 Furthermore, as the same doctrin of S. Paul defineth all men to be transgressours by disobedience of one Adam, though they neuer touched the apple, comming of his stock by nature; so doth it pronoue all men to be iustified by the obedience of one, though they did not his obedience, being likewise borne of him by spirituall regeneration and faith.

Originall sinne, originall iustice.

9 And therefore as all men comming of Adam be condemned originallie, before they grow vp to commit any sinne against the law: so all men be saued originallie being regenerated by faith in Christ, before they begin to doe any good worke of charitie, or any other good deede.

Rom. 5. Rom. 8.

10 Item, the doctrine of S. Paul perpending the high glorie of a christian mans state in Christ Iesus by faith, first setteth him in a perfect peace with almightie God. Rom. 5. Secondlie, exempteth him from all condemnation. Rom. 8. Thirdlie, it matcheth him with angels, it equalleth him with saints and fellow citizens of heauen, it numbereth him with the houshold of God, and inheriteth him with Iesus Christ himselfe. Ephes. 2. Fourthlie, it adopteth him from the state of a seruant, to the state of the sonne of God, crying Abba father. Gal. 4. Fiftly, it openeth to him a bold accesse and entrance to the high maiestie and throne of grace. Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. Sixtly, it subiecteth all things vnder him, as ministers, yea, the apostles themselues in their highest office, death, life, things present, things to come, with the whole world besides, and assigneth him no spirituall head, but onely Christ, saying, And you are Christs, and Christ is Gods. 1. Cor. 3. Seuenthly, it adiudgeth him in a spirituall libertie of freedome, aboue all terrors of spirit, rising either of Gods law or mans law, aboue all dreadfull feares of sinne, damnation, malediction, reiection, death, hell, or purgatorie: aboue all seruile bondage of ceremonies, mens precepts, traditions, superstitious vices, vokes, customes or whatsoeuer opprelleth & intangleth the spirituall freedome of a conscience which Christ hath set at liberti, & requireth moreouer that we walke and stand stout in that libertie with the free sonne of Sara, whereto we are brought, and not suffer our selues anymore to be clogged with any such seruill bondage: that is to meane, although we must be content to subiect our bodies to al seruice and to all men, yet that we yeeld not our spirituall consciences and soules as slaues and seruants to be subiect to the feare or bondage of any terrene thing in this world, for so much as Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. Gal. 4. Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. 1. Cor. 3. The glorious state of christian liberte and spirituall freedome in Christ Iesu.

Gal. 4. Colos. 2. Dates and times inculcated. Meates indifferent with thanksgiuing. Marriage lawfull for all men. One sacrifice for sinne and no more. Heb. 9 as we are in that part made lords and princes ouer all things whatsoeuer can harme or bind, or terrifie vs. Gal. 4. Col. 2.

11 Item, the right being of S. Pauls doctrine putteth no difference nor obseruation in daies and times. Gal. 4. Col. 2.

12 Item, it leaueth all meats to be indifferent, with thanksgiuing, to serue the necessitie of the bodie, and not the bodie to serue them. Col. 2. 1. Tim. 4.

13 Item, it permitteth marriage without restraint or exception, lawfull and also expedient for all men, hauing need thereof. 1. Cor. 7.

14 Item, it admitteth no sacrifice for sinne but the sacrifice of Christ alone, and that done once for all with blood. For without blood there is no remission of sinne, which only is applied to vs by faith, and by nothing else. Heb. 9.

The vse of the holie communion in the ancient time of the primitiue church.

15 Item, as touching the holy communion, by the letters of S. Paul to the Corinth. 11. we vnderstand, that the vse then amongst them was, to haue the participation of the bread called the Lords bodie, & of the cup called the Lords blood administred not at an altar, but at a plaine boord or table, the congregation there meeting together after the time of their supper, where not the minister alone did receiue and the other looked one; but the whole congregation together did communicate with reuerence and thanksgiuing, not lifting ouer the priests head, nor worshipping, nor kneeling, nor knocking their breasts, but either sitting at the supper, or standing after the supper. According to which forme the apostolits yet to this day following the old rite of the countrie (although being peruerted otherwise in much superstition) vse to receiue it after they bee risen from their dinner standing. Experience whereof was scene here at London the first day of October 1569.

No mo sacraments mentioned in S. Paul but the Lords supper and baptisme.

16 Item, the said apostle, beside the sacramentall supper maketh mention of baptisme, or washing of regeneration, although he himselfe baptised but few: 1. Cor. 1. of the other sacraments he maketh no mention.

Iustification by the gospell.

17 Item by the same doctrine of S. Paul, no tongue is to be vsed in the congregation, which is not knowne and doth not edifie. 1. Cor. 14.

The authoritie and office of the ciuill magistrates.

18 Item, the rule of S. Pauls doctrine subiecteth euerie creature vnder the obedience of kings and princes and ordinarie magistrats, ordained of God to haue the sword and authoritie of publike regiment, to order and dispose in all things not contrarie to God, whatsoeuer pertaineth to the maintenance of the good, or to the correction of the euill: from whose iurisdiction there is no exemption of vocations of persons, whether they be ecclesiasticall or politicall. And therefore to this office appertaineth to preserue peace, to set things in lawfull order, to conserue christian discipline in the church of Christ, to remoue offences, to deuide the obedient, to prouide and procure wholesome and faithfull teachers ouer the people, to maintaine learning and set vp schooles, to haue ouersight not only of the people, but also of all ecclesiasticall ministers, to see to every one to doe his dutie, and to remoue or punish such as be negligent: also to call councels and synods, and to prouide the church goods to be faithfully dispensed by the handes of true dealers, to the sustentation of the church, of true teachers, and to the publike necessitie of the poore, &c.

The office and authoritie of bishops how farre it doth extend.

19 Furthermore, by S. Pauls doctrine, the ministers and superintendents of Christs church haue their authoritie and armour likewise to them limited, which armour is onely spirituall and not carnall, whereby they fight not against flesh and blood, but against the power of darkenes, errour, and sin; against the spirituall seduction and craftinesse in heauenlie things, against the workes and proceedings of satan the prince of this world, in comforting weake consciences against the terrors of the diuell, and desperation, and finally against euerie cogitation lifted vp against Christ, to subdue euery celsitude to the subiection and power of Christ Iesu the sonne of God.

Another breefe recapitulation ### of the same.

Another briefe recapitulation of S. Pauls doctrine reduced to fiue points.

BRiefly and in a compendious sum to reduce the whole doctrine of S. Paul, in these fiue points chiefly it consisteth.

1 First, in setting forth the grace, great loue and good will, and free promises of God the Father in Christ Iesus his sonne to mankind, which so loued the world, that he hath giuen his own sonne, the redemption thereof. 1. Ioh. 3. Which gaue his sonne to die for vs being his enemies. Rom. 5. Which hath quickned vs being dead in sinne, Ephes. 2. Which so mercifullie hath reconciled the world to himselfe by his sonne, and also by his ambassadors besides by vs to be reconciled vnto him. 2. Cor. 5. Who hath giuen his owne sonne to be sinne for vs. 2. Cor. 5. To be accursed for vs. Gal. 2. Which by sirme promise hath assured vs of our inheritance. Rom. 4. Which not by the works of righteousnesse that we haue done, but of his owne mercie hath saued vs by the washing of regeneration. Tit. 3.

The great mercie of God in Christ. Gal. 3. 2. Cor. 5. Rom. 5. Tit. 3.

The glorie and maiestie of Christ Iesus set foorth by saint Paul, Ephes. 4.

2 The second point consisteth in preaching and expressing the glorious and triumphant maiestie of Christ Iesus the sonne of God, and the excellencie of his glorie, who being once dead in the infirmitie of flesh, rose againe with power, ascending vp with maiestie, hath led away captiuitie captiue. Eph. 4. Sitteth and raigneth in glorie on the right hand of God in heauenlie things aboue all principats and potestates, powers and dominations, and aboue euery name that is named, not onely in this world, but also in the world to come. Ephes. 1. In whose name euery knee hath to bend both in heauen and in earth, and vnder the earth, and euery tongue to confesse our Lord Christ Iesus to be of the glorie of God the Father. Phil. 2. In whom and by whom all things are made both in heauen and in earth, things visible and inuisible, whether they be thrones or dominations, or principats, or potestats, all are by him and for him created, and he is before all, and all things consist in him, who is the head of his bodie the church, the beginning and first borne from the dead, in whom dwelleth all fulnesse. Col. 1. To whom the Father hath giuen al iudgement, and vnder him man himselfe any more. Ioh. 5. To whom the Father hath giuen all things in his hands. Ioh. 13. To whom the Father hath giuen power of all flesh. Ioh. 17. To whom all power is giuen in heauen and in earth. Mat. vlt. In whom we all the promises of God be & Amen. 2. Cor. 1.

Phil. 2. Colos. 1. Ioh. 5. Ioh. 13. Ioh. 17. Matth. vlt. 2. Cor. 1.

The third branch.

3 Thirdly, he declareth the vertue of his crosse and passion, and what exceeding benefits procede to vs by the same. By whose blood we haue redemption and remission of our sins. Ephes. 1. By whose stripes we are made whole. Esay 53. By whose crosse all things are pacified, both in heauen and in earth. Col. 1. By whose death we are reconciled. Rom. 5. Who hath destroyed death, and brought life to light. 1. Timot. 1. Who by death hath destroied him which had the power of death, that is, the diuell, and hath deliuered them which liued vnder feare of death all their life in bondage. Heb. 2. By whose obedience we are made iust: by whose righteousnesse we are iustified to life. Rom. 5. By whose curse we are blessed, and deliuered from the malediction of the law. Gal. 3. By whose bloud we that once were far off, are made neere vnto God. Ephes. 5. Who of one bodie hath reconciled both Iewes and Gentils vnto God. Eph. 2. Who by his flesh hath taken away the diuision and separation betweene God and vs, abolishing the law which was set against vs in precepts and decrees. Ephes. 2. Who is our peace, our aduocat, and propitiation for the sinnes of the whole world. 1. Ioh. 2. Who was made accursed, and sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. 2. Cor. 5. Who is made of God for vs, our wisdome and righteousnesse and sanctification, and redemption. 1. Cor. 1. By whom we haue boldnesse and entrance with all confidence through faith in him. Ephes. 3. Who forgaue vs all our sinnes, and hath torne in peeces the obligation or handwriting, which was against vs in the law of commandements, and hath crucified it vpon the crosse, and vtterly hath dispatched and abolished the same, and hath spoiled principats and potestats, as in an open theiu of conquest, triumphing ouer them openly in himselfe. Col. 2. Who iustifieth the wicked by faith. Rom. 4. In whom we are made full and complet. Col. 2. 4c.

The righteousnesse of God, and the righteousnes of man how they differ in scripture.

Rom. 5. 1. Ioh. 2. 2. Cor. 5. 1. Cor. 1. Ephes. 3. Colos. 2. Rom. 4. Colos. 2.

The fourth branch.

4 The fourth branch is, to teach and informe vs (to whom these benefits of Christs passion and victorie doe appertaine) by what meanes the same is applied and redounded into vs: which meanes is onely one, that is, onely faith in Christ Iesu, and no other thing. Which faith it pleaseth almightie God, to accept for righteousnesse. And this righteousnesse it is, which onely standeth before God, and none other, as we are plainelie taught by the scriptures, and especially by the doctrine of S. Paul. Which righteousnesse thus rising of faith in Christ, S. Paul calleth the righteousnesse of God, where he speaketh of himselfe, vtterly refusing the other righteousnesse which is of the law, that they might be found in him, not hauing his owne righteousnesse which is of the law, but the righteousnesse of Christ, which is of faith. Phil. 3. Againe, the said apostle writing of the Iewes, which sought for righteousnesse and found it not; and also of the Gentiles, which sought not for it, and yet found it, he giueth the reason why: Because (saith he) the one sought it as by workes and the law, and came not to it, who not knowing the righteousnesse of God, and seeking to set vp their owne righteousnesse, did not submit themselues to the righteousnesse which is of God. The other, which sought not the Gentils, and sought not for it, obtained righteousnesse, that righteousnesse, which is of faith, &c. Rom. 9. Also in another place, S. Paul in the same epistle writing of this righteousnesse which commeth of faith, calleth it the righteousnesse of God, in these words: Whom God (saith he) hath set vp for a propitiation by faith in his bloud, where by to make manifest of the righteousnes which is of himselfe in tolerating our sins, &c. Rom. 3. By the which righteousnesse it is euident that saint Paul meaneth the righteousnes of faith, which almightie God now reuealeth and maketh manifest by preaching of the gospell. All these be yet more plainely this righteousnesse of God how it is taken in saint Paul, for the righteousnesse of faith, and therefore is called the righteousnesse of God, because it is imputed only of God to faith, and not deserued of man: In the same epistle to the Romans and in the third chapter aforesaid, his words be manifest: The righteousnesse of God (saith he) is by faith of Iesus Christ, in all, and vpon all that doe beleeue, &c.

The righteousnesse of the gospell. Rom. 1. Rom. 3.

A lesson out of saint Pauls doctrine, of all Christians to be obserued.

Wherefore whosoeuer studieth to be accepted with God and to be found righteous in his sight, let him learne diligently by the doctrine of saint Paul to make a difference and a separation, as farre as from heauen and earth, betweene these two; that that is betweene the righteousnesse of workes, and righteousnesse of faith: & in any wise betweene bauing no other meanes for his iustification, or remission of his sinnes, but onely faith apprehending the bodie or person of Christ Iesus crucified. For as there is no way into the house but by the doore, so is there no comming to God but by Christ alone, which is by faith. And as the mortall bodie, without bodily sustenance of bread & drinke can not but perish: so the spirituall soule of man hath no other refreshing but onely by faith in the bodie and blood of Christ, whereby to be saued. To faith this faith the idolatrous gentiles apprehended Iesus Christ, & receiued thereby righteousnes. Cornelius (the first baptised Romane) is knowne as he heard Peter preach Christ, receiued straightway the holy ghost. Peter himselfe confessed, and for his confession had the keies of heauen. Matth. 16. Zacheus receiued the person of Christ into his house, and withall receiued saluation both to him and his whole household. Luk. 19. What a sinner was Marie, which had no lesse in her than seuen diuels, and yet because she set her heart and affection vpon that person, many sinnes were forgiuen her. Luk. 7. The right hand theefe, how farre was he from all workes of the law, and yet by faith entred he iustified into paradise the same day with Christ, Luke. 23. In like manner, although the poore publicane came to the church with lesse holinesse after the law, yet went he home to his house more iustified than the phariseе with all his workes, and al by reason of faith. Luk. 18. The parable of the prodigall sonne which was lost, yet reuiued again; also of the lost groate, and of the lost sheepe which beeing found was found again, what doe these declare but that which is lost by the law, to be recouered by faith and grace? And how oft doe we reade in the gospels: Thy faith hath saued thee, &c. Iesus seeing their beleefe, &c. He that beleeueth in me, I will raise him vp in the last day, &c. Beleeue also in me, &c. He that beleeueth in me hath euerlasting life, &c. Without me ye can doe nothing, &c. He that is in me, &c. He that loueth me, &c. He that heareth me, &c. He that abideth in me, &c. He that receiueth me, &c. Vnlesse ye eat my flesh and drinke my bloud, &c. That they may receiue remission of sinnes by their faith in me, &c. Act. 26. To him all the prophets giue witnes, to haue remission of sinnes, whosoeuer beleeueth in his name, &c. Act. 10. He that beleeueth and is baptised. Matth. 28. He that beleeueth in mee shall doe the workes that I do, and greater than these, &c.

And likewise in the writings of saint Paul, how often doe wee heare the name of Christ, almost in euery third or fourth line, where he still repeateth: In Christo Iesu, per Christum Iesum, per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum, &c. Qui credunt in ipso, &c. Omnes qui credunt in eo, &c. Credentes illo, in eum, credentes illi, in nomen eius, in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, &c. Beleeue (saith saint Paul to the gailer) in the Lord Iesus, and thou shalt be saued & thy wholehouse, &c. Act. 16.

The writings of S. Paul full of the name of Christ Iesus. Beleefe only in Christ Iesus. Acts 16.

Thus then stoode, as the passion of Christ is only the efficient or personall cause immediat of our saluation: so is faith only the instrumentall or meane cause that maketh the merits of Christ to vs available. For as the passion of Christ serueth to none but such as do beleeue: so neither doth faith (as it is onely a bare qualitie or action in mans mind) it selfe auaile, vnlesse it be directed to the bodie of Christ crucified, as to his obiect, of whom it receiueth all his vertue. And therefore these two must alwaies iointlie concurre together, faith, and Christ Iesus crucified. As for example, when the children of Israel were bid of Moses to looke vp to the brasen serpent, neither could the serpent haue helped them, except they had looked vp; nor yet their looking vpward haue profited them, vnlesse they had directed their eies vpon the said serpent, as the onely obiect set vp to the same purpose for them to behold. So our faith in like case directed to the bodie of Iesus our sauiour, is onelie the meanes whereby Christs merits are applied vnto vs, and we now iustified before God, according to the doctrine of saint Paul, who in expresse words, beareth to vs that this faith is, and how it iustifieth, saith: If thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and beleeue with thy hart that God raised him from death, thou shalt be saued, &c. Rom. 10. Besides this, what action or qualitie soeuer is in man, either hope, charitie, or any other kind of faith and beleeuing, be it neuer so true, except it apprehend this obiect, which is, the body of Christ, the sonne of God, it serueth not to iustification. And that is the cause why we adde this particle, onely, to faith, and say that faith onely in Christ iustifieth vs, to exclude all other actions, qualities, gifts, or works of man, from the cause of iustifying: for so much as there is no other knowledge nor gift giuen of God to man, be it neuer so excellent, that can stand before the iudgement of God into iustification, or inherewnto any promise of saluation is annexed; but only this faith looking vp to the brasen serpent, that is, to the bodie of Christ Iesus for vs crucified.

Christ the onelie obiect of faith, before which it standeth. Exemple of the brasen serpent.

Christ is faith is by S. Paul. Rom. 10.

Faith only.

As for example, when the Turke saith, that he beleeueth in one liuing God that made heauen and earth, this beleefe there in is true, yet it iustifieth him not, because it lacketh the right obiect, which is Christ. So when the Iew saith, that he beleeueth in one God maker of heauen and earth, and beleeueth also the same God to be omnipotent, merciful iust, and true of promise, Diuers sorts of beleeuing. The Turkes faith.

The Iewes faith.

and that he hath elected the seed of Abraham: true it is that he beleeueth, and yet all this serueth him not, because Christ the sonne of God is not ioyned withall. And though the said Iew should bee neuer so deuout in his prayers, or charitable in almes, or precise in keeping the lawe, and beleeued neuer so stedfastly that he is elect to be saued: yet he is neuer the neere to saluation for all this, so long as his faith is not grounded vpon the head corner stone, which is the person and bodie of Christ Iesus the true sauiour. After like sort it may bee said of the papist, when he saith that he is baptised, & beleeueth in the father, the sonne, and the holy ghost, three persons and one God, and also confesseth Iesus Christ to be the sonne of God, which died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our righteousnesse, &c: his beleefe therein is true, and indeede would saue him, if he did stay his saluation in this faith, and vpon Christ his sauiour onely, according to the promise and grace of God, and goe no further. But that he doth not: for neither doth he admit Christ only to be his perfect sauiour without the helpe of the patrons, heads, aduocats, and mediatours, nor yet permitteth his faith in Christ onely to be the meanes of his iustification, but setteth vp other by-meanes, as hope, charity, sacrifice of the masse, confession, penance, satisfaction, merits, and pardons, supposing thereby to worke his iustification before God, contrarie to the word of promise, to the gospell of grace, and to the doctrine of saint Paul, whereof we shall see more (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Every truth may be beleeued, but the beleeuing of euery truth fauoreth not. The papists faith.

Only.

Hope and charitie be no parts of our iustification, nor causes to make the merits of Christ ours.

Now this much of the true causes of our iustification after the doctrine of S. Paul. Concerning which causes this distinction furthermore by the way is to be added, that as touching the originall causes of our saluation, which be diuers & sundrie, some are eternall, & without vs: some are internall, & within vs. Of the externall causes which are without vs, the first and principall is the mercie and grace of God. Of this followeth predestination and election. Then commeth vocation. The last and next cause to vs is the death and bloudshed of Christ: whereby we are redeemed, and all these be externall causes, because they are without vs. Of internall causes that be in man through the gift of God, there is but one, & no more in Scripture appointed, that is, our faith in Christ, which is the gift of God in vs. Besides this, there is no gift of God giuen to man, be it vertue, worke, merit, nor any thing else, that is any part or cause of saluation, but onelie this gift of faith, to beleeue in Christ Iesu. And this is the cause why we hold that faith only iustifieth, meaning, that amongst all the works & diuerse actions, labours, and operations, what soeuer man doth, or can do, there is nothing in man that worketh saluation, but onelie his faith giuen to him of God to beleeue in Christ his sonne, following therein the trade of saint Pauls teaching: who in precise words so ascribeth iustification to faith, that he excludeth all other actions of man, and works of the law. And therefore in the same place to the Romanes, Saint Paul treating of the glorie of iustifying, asketh this question, how this glorie is excluded: whether by the law of works? And concludeth, no: ascribing only the glorie thereof to the law of faith, and consequently vpon the same he inferreth: Colligimus enim iustificari hominem per fidem sine operibus legis: We hold that a man is iustified by faith without the deeds of the law.

The causes of our saluation distinguished.

Grace and mercie. Election. Vocation. Christs passion.

Christian faith.

The meaning and cause why faith only iustifieth.

All works of man excluded from the glorie of iustifying.

And vnder this can that be accounted for any part of our iustification, which S. Paul vtterlie debarreth and excludeth in that behalfe? Which like exclusiues & negatiues the whole course of S. Pauls doctrine is full, where he still concludeth: Sine operibus, absque operibus legis, non ex operibus, Dei donum est; secundum misericordiam; non ex operibus, ne quis glorietur. Eph. 2. Non ex operibus iustitiæ quæ fecimus nos, sed secundum propositum suum & gratiam, &c. Tit. 3. Non secundum opera nostra, &c. Tim. 1. That is to say, It is the gift of God, not of works, that no man should glorie, &c. Not of the works of righteousnes, which we haue done, but of his owne mercie, &c. Not after our works, but after his own purpose, and grace which is giuen to vs, &c. Againe, Gal. 2. Non iustificatur homo ex operibus, &c. That is, A man is not iustified by works &c. Item, Ei qui non operatur, credenti autem in eum qui iustificat impium, fides imputatur ad iustitiam, &c. Rom. 4. To him that worketh not, but believeth in him which iustifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed to righteousnesse, &c. By these exclusiues and negatiues in S. Pauls doctrine, what doth he else meane, but vtterlie to exclude all kind of mans merits, and works of the law from the office and dignitie of iustifying? And although he expresseth not the word, Onely: yet vpon his exclusiues & negatiues, this exceptiue must needs be inferred. For in all logike the consequent is necessarie and formall; as. One man is suffered to come into the house, and no person else is suffered but one: Ergo one man only is suffered to enter into the house. And thus much concerning faith in Christ, proued to be the onely meane, or instrumentall, or conditionall cause of our saluation, and no other besides the same alone, by the doctrine of S. Paul taught to the ancient Romans.

5 The fifth branch, which I note in S. Pauls doctrine, is this: that after he hath thus established vs in certaintie of our saluation through faith in Christ, then after that, he exhorteth vs benemertlie and with all instance of good workes, shewing the true vse and end of good workes: which is, first to shew our obedience and dutifull seruice (as we may) vnto God, who hath done so great things for vs. Secondly, to releeue our neighbors with our charitie and kindnes, as God hath been kind to vs his enemies. Thirdly, or rather by others by our example, to praise God, to embrace the same religion, & to doe the like. For requisit it is, that as God hath been so mercifull to vs and gracious in eternall gifts, we should be mercifull likewise to other in temporall commodities. And seeing it hath pleased him of his fatherly goodnesse (of our parts so little deserued) to call vs to so high a vocation, to giue the bloud of his sonne for vs, to forgiue vs all our sinnes, to deliuer vs from this present wicked world, to make vs citizens of heauen, yea his children more than seruants: little then can we doe, and well may we thinke those benefits ill beslowed, if we forgiue not our neighbors, and shew some thing againe worthie that holy calling wherewith he hath called vs, in mortifying our worldly lusts here, and studying after heauenly things: and finallie if we being promoted with such loue and kindnesse, render not againe some loue for loue, some kindnesse for kindnes, seeking how to walke in the steps which he hath prepared for vs to walke in, seeking him (so much as we may) in holines and righteousnes all the daies of our life. And though our obedience shall alwaies be vnperfect, doe the best we can; yet reason would that some obeisance we should shew, as louing children to such a louing father.

Good works iustifie not, but follow the iustified.

Luke 17.

And this is the cause why S. Paul is so vehement and vrgent to cal vpon good works, not that works should iustifie, but that we being iustified so mercifullie and tenderly through his grace, should not abuse his grace in vaine, but endeuour our selues to our vttermost to render our seruice againe to him, in such conuersation of life as may make to his glorie, and profit of our neighbour. And though the words of our sauiour seeme in some places to attribute to our obedience and charitie here in earth, great rewards in heauen, that is of his owne free grace and goodnesse to impute small matters for great deserts, and not for vs to claime any merit thereby, or thanke at his hand, by any worthines of our doings: no more than the seruant, when hee commeth from the plough and seruing the cattell in the field, serueth first his master at home and waiteth vpon his table: the master is not bound (saith Christ) to thanke his seruant therefore, and bid him sit downe: So you (saith he) when you haue done that is commanded you, by yee are vnprofitable seruants: yee haue done but what your bound dutie was to doe. Luke 17.

Againe, here also is to be vnderstood, that where such rewards be ascribed vnto mens deeds, it is not for the worthines of the deed it selfe, but for the faith of the doer, which faith maketh the worke to be good in Gods sight: for else if an infidell should doe the like worke that the christian doth, it is not the thing but mere sinne before God. In that therefore the christian mans worke is accepted be it neuer so small (as to giue a cup of cold water) the same is onely for his faith sake that doth it, and not for the worke which is done. Whereby againe we may learne how faith onely doth iustifie a man, and that three manner of waies.

Faith iustifieth three manner of waies.

First it iustifieth the person in making him accepted, and the child of God by regeneration, before he begin to doe any good worke.

The office of faith, and the office of the law, compared together.

Secondly, it iustifieth a man from sin, in procuring remission and pardon for the same.

Thirdly, it iustifieth the good deeds and works of man, not onelie in bringing forth good fruites, but also in making the same works to be good and acceptable in the sight of God, which otherwise were impure and execrable in his sight.

The office therefore of faith and works is diuers, and must not be confounded. Faith first goeth before, and regenerateth a man to God, & iustifieth him in the sight of God, both in couering his ill deeds, and in making his good deeds acceptable to God, climbing vp to heauen, and there wrestling with God and his iudgement for iustification, for saluation, and for euerlasting life. Works and charitie follow faith, and are exercised here vpon the earth, and glorieth onely before man, but not before God, in shewing forth obedience both to God and to man. Further then this our good works doe not reach, nor haue any thing to doe in the iudgement of God touching saluation. A speciall of our good workes (as S. Paul speaketh, Rom. 7.) is they be ours and imperfect. For else if our workes could be perfect according to the perfection of the law, as Christ wrought them in the perfection of his flesh; that is, if we could perfect them, as it is said: Qui fecerit ea viuet in eis. But no man hauing the imbecillitie of our flesh cannot attaine thereto, it followeth thereof that all glorie of iustifying is taken from works, and transferred onelie to faith.

Rom. 7.

And thus much concerning the principall contents of S. Pauls doctrine. Wherein the church of the ancient Romans first was grounded and planted, and so continued in the same, or at least did not much alter, during the primitiue state of the church. Likewise the same forme of doctrine the latter Romans also that followed should haue maintained, and not haue fallen away for any mans preaching, but hold him accursed, yea if he were an apostle or angell from heauen, teaching any other doctrine besides that institutio which they haue receiued. And lest any should chinke this, that we here protest against the corrupt errours and manifold deformities of this latter church of Rome, to proceed of any rancour or affection, rather than grounded of necessarie causes, and demonstrations evident, my purpose is (by the Lords leave) to take herein some little paine, that as I have collected a little before, the summe and consents of saint Paules doctrine, wherewith the old church of Rome was stirk sealoned and acquainted, so now as in a like summarie table to descrie the particular branches and contents of the popes doctrine now set forth, to the intent that all true christian readers, comparing the one with the other, may discerne what great alteration there is betweene the church of Rome that now is, & the church of Rome that then was, planted by the apostles in the primitive time. Here followeth a summarie collection of the errours, heresies, and absurdities contained in the popes doctrine, contrarie to the rules of God's word, and the first institution of the church of Rome.

Offaith and iustification.

The errours, heresies and absurdities in the popes doctrine.

FIrst, as touching the onely meanes and instrumentall cause of our iustification, whereby the merits of Christs passion be applied to vs and made ours, ye heard before how saint Paul onely ascribeth the same to faith: as appeareth by all his letters, especially to the Romans. Where he excluding all kind of workes, ascribeth all our saluation, iustification, righteousnesse, reconciliation, and peace with God onely vnto faith in Christ. Contrary to which doctrine the pope and his church hath set vp diuers and sundrie other meanes of their own deuising whereby the merits of Christs passion (they say) are applied to vs and made ours, to the putting away of sinnes, and for our iustification, as hope, charitie, sacrifice of the masse, auricular confession, satisfaction, merits of saints, and holie orders, the popes pardons, &c. So that Christs sacrifice, prayes, and suffering, by this teaching doth not heale vs, nor is not beneficiall to vs, though we beleeue neuer so well, vnlesse we adde also these works and merits aboue recited. Which if it be true, then is it false that Esay the prophet doth promise: chap. 53. In his stripes all we are made whole, &c. This errour and heresie of the church of Rome, though it seeme at first sight to the natural reason of man to be but of small importance; yet if it be earnestlie considered, it is in very deed the most pernicious heresie that euer almost crept into the church, vpon the which as the onely foundation, all, or the most part of all the errours, absurdities, and inconueniences of the popes church are grounded. For this being once admitted, that a man is not iustified by his faith in Christ alone, but that other meanes must be sought by our owne working and merits to apply the merits of Christs passion vnto vs, then is there neither any certaintie left of our saluation, nor end in setting vp new meanes and merits of our owne deuising for remission of sinnes. Neither hath there been any heresie that either hath rebelled more presumptuouslie against the high maiestie of God the father, nor more perniciouslie hath iniured the soules of the simple, than this doctrine.

The meanes of applying Christs merites vnto vs by the popes doctrine.

The taking away of this article of faith onely to iustifie, is the roote of great inconuenience in Christs church.

So heresie to be compared to the heresie of papists.

First of all it subuerteth the will and testament of God. For where almightie God of mercie hath giuen vs his sonne to die for vs, and with him hath giuen out his full promise, that whosoeuer beleeueth vpon him should bee saued by their faith, and alligneth none other condition either of the law or any of workes, but onely of faith, to be the meanes betweene his sonne and vs: these men take vpon them to alter this testament that God hath set, and adioyne other conditions, which the Lord in his word neuer appointed nor knew. To whom the words of Hierome may be well applied vpon the epistle to the Galathians, speaking of such: Qui de euangelio Christi faciunt hominis euangelium, vel quod peius est, diaboli, &c. That is, Which make of the gospell of Christ the gospell of men, or rather the gospell of the diuell, &c.

The first inconuenience.

No condition limited of God to man for saluation but one. Hieron. in epist. ad Gal. cap. 1.

Secondlie, whereas the christian reader in the gospell, reading of the great grace and sweet promises of God giuen to mankind in Christ his son, might thereby take much comfort of soule, & be at rest and peace with the Lord his God: commeth in the pestiferous doctrine of these heretikes, wherewith they obscure this free grace of God, to choke the sweete comforts of man in the holie ghost, and oppresse christian libertie, and bring vs into spirituall bondage.

The second inconuenience, what hurt commeth into the church, by taking away the article of iustification.

The third inconuenience.

Thirdly, as in this their impious doctrine they shew themselues manifest enemies to Gods grace: so are they no lesse iniurious to christian men, vpon whom they leaue in a doubtfull distrust of Gods fauour and of their saluation, contrarie to the word and will of God, & right institution of the apostolike doctrine. And whereas our new schoolemen of late, to maintaine the said wicked point of doctrine, doe obiect vnto vs that wee rather leaue merits consciences vncertaine, for somuch as, I like (say they) were not a due reward, if it were vncertaine. And now for somuch as the debt is certaine, and mercie or fauour is vncertaine, therefore (say they) we leauing mens consciences to the mercie of God, doe leaue them in a doubtfull vncertaintie of their saluation. To this I answere, that the debt, if it be paied by the law dulie deserued, it must be certaine. But if the law shall proue it imperfect or vnsufficiently due, then is it not certaine, neither can there be any thing dulie claimed. Now as touching mercie, so long as it remaineth secret in the princes will, and not knowne to his subiects, so long it is vncertaine. But when this mercie shall be openly published by proclamation, ratified by promise, conferred by will & testament, established in blood, and sealed with sacraments, then this mercie remaineth no more doubtfull, but ought firmelie to bee beleeued of euery true faithfull subiect. And therefore S. Paul,

Objection of the papists answered.

The papists doe teach the mercie of God to be vncertaine.

Mercie of God made certaine by his owne promises.

to establish our hearts in this assurance, and to answere to this doubt, in his epistle to the Romans doth teach vs, saying: And therefore of faith, that after grace the promise might be firme and sure to the whole seed of Abraham, &c. Rom.4. Meaning hereby, that workes haue nothing to doe in this cause of iustifying, and noteth the reason why. For then our saluation should stand in a doubtfull wauering, because in working wee are neuer certaine whether our deserts be perfect & sufficient in Gods iudgement or no. And therefore (saith saint Paul) to the intent our saluation should be out of all doubt and certaine, it standeth not of workes in deseruing, but of faith in apprehending, and of Gods free grace in promising.

Saluation standeth sure and certaine by Gods promise. The place of S. Paul, Rom.4. expounded.

The fourth inconuenience.

Fourthly, as in this their sinister doctrine they breake this principle of christian religion, which saith that a man is iustified by faith without workes, so against it breaketh another principle aboue rehearsed. For this rule being granted, that nothing is to be added to Gods word nor taken from it: then haue these men done wickedly in adding (as they doe) to Gods word. For where the word of God limiteth to our iustification no condition but faith: Beleeue (saith he) in the Lord Iesu, and thou shalt be saued, and thy whole house, &c. Act.16. these iusticiaries doe adde thereto diuers and sundrie other conditions besides, and such as the word also precisely excludeth, as hope, charitie, the sacrifice of the masse, the merite of the priest. Ex opere operato, auricular confession, satisfaction, meritorious deeds, &c. And thus much concerning the doctrine of faith and iustification. Whereby it may appeare to what horrible blindnesse and blasphemie the church of Rome is now fallen, where this kind of doctrine is not onely suffered, but also publikelie professed, which speaking against faith, thus blasphemoulie dare say: Fides illa qua quis firmiter credit, & certò statuit propter Christum sibi remissa esse peccata, sed eque possessurum vitam æternam, non fides est, sed temeritas: non spiritus sancti persuasio, sed humanæ audaciæ præsumptio. That is, That faith wherewith a man firmely beleeueth, and certainely assureth himselfe, that for Christs sake his sinnes bee forgiuen him, and that he shall possesse eternall life, is not faith but rashnesse: not the perswasion of the holy ghost, but presumption of a mans boldnesse.

The fifth principle aboue recited, broken.

Ex Lindana in epitome doctrinæ euangelicæ.

Of workes and the law.

The first errour of the papists, teaching good workes.

AS touching the doctrine of good workes & the law, what the teaching of saint Paul was to the Romans, ye heard before. Who although he excluded good works from the office of iustifying, yet excluded he them not from the practise and conuersation of christian life, but most earnestly called vpon all faithfull beleeuers in Christ, to walke worthie their vocation, to lay downe their old conuersation, to giue their members seruants of righteousnesse, to offer their bodies vp to God a liuelie sacrifice, &c. The like example of whose teaching, if the churches now reformed do not follow, let their sermons, their preachings, writings, exhortings, and liues also beare record. Who although they cannot say with Christ, Which of you can blame me of sinne? yet they may say to the aduersaries, Whose soeuer of you is without fault, cast the first stone of reproch as gainst vs. Wherefore Iosius, Pighius, with their fellowes, doe them open wrong, and slaunderously belie them in comparing them in this behalfe to Aetius, Eunomius, and other heretikes called Anomei, who taking the good sentences of saint Paul, did abuse the same to filthie licence of the flesh, and corruption of wicked life, &c.

The diuers opinions of the papists touching how faith iustifieth.

Iosius lo 2. cons. confessionis, cap.2.

But to let these slanders passe, now what the errours be of the church of Rome, touching this part of doctrine, remaineth to be declared. Whose errour first standeth in this, that they misunderstanding the definition of good workes, doe call good workes, not such as properly are commanded by the law of God, but such as are agreeable to the popes law. As building of abbeis and churches, giuing to the high altar, founding of trentals, finding of chanteries, gilding of images, bearing of mattes, going on pilgrimage, fighting for the holy crosse, keeping of vowes, entering to orders, talking of bigils, creeping to the crosse, praying to saints, &c. All which are not onely reputed for good workes, but so preferred also before all other works, that to these is giuen pardon from the pope, double and treble pold more then to any other good worke of charity commanded in the law of almightie God.

The pope his errour in setting vp his owne traditions against the principall scripture.

The second errour of the papists in the doctrine of good workes. Faith the roote and cause of good workes.

An other errour also may be noted in the papists, touching the efficient or formall cause of good workes. For albeit they all confesse in their bookes, that Gratia Dei gratis data is the chiefe and principall cause thereof, and worketh in vs Iustitia primam (as they call it) yet the good workes after regeneration, they referre to other subordinate causes vnder God, as to free will, or to Habitum virtutis, or Ad integra naturalia, and nothing at all to faith, when as faith only next vnder God is the roote & fountaine of all well doings: as in the fruites of a good tree, albeit the planter or the husbandman be the principall agent thereof, and some cause also may be in the good ground, yet the next and immediate cause is the roote that maketh the tree fruitfull. In like maner the grace of God, in a soft and repentant mollified hart planteth the gift of faith. Faith as a good roote cannot lie dead or vnoccupied, but springeth forth and maketh both the tree fruitful, and also the fruite thereof to be good, which otherwise had no acceptation nor goodnesse in them, were it not for the goodnesse of the roote from whence they spring. So Paul, although he had certaine workes in him, such as they were, before his conuersion: yet had he no good workes before the grace of Christ had rooted faith in him. So Sparie Magdalene the sinner and Zacheus the publican. So all the nations of the gentiles began to bring forth fruit, and then they began to be ingrafted in Christ, and to receiue the roote of his faith, whose fruits before that were all damnable and vnfruitfull. As touching the cause therefore of good workes, there is no other in man but faith, whose office as it is to iustifie vs in heauen, so the nature of it is here in earth to worke by loue, as the rot worketh by the sap. For as a man seeth and feeleth by faith, the loue and grace of God toward him in Christ his sonne: so beginneth he to loue againe both God and man, and to doe for his neighbour as God hath done to him. And hereof properly springeth the running fountaine of all good works and deeds of charitie.

Works are not to be called good, but by reason of faith.

The office of faith to iustifie. The effect of faith to bring forth good workes.

Fides per dil. Hieronym operans. Gal. 5.

Thirdly, as they erre in the cause of good works, so do they erre much more in the end of the law, and of good works: for where saint Paul teacheth the law to be giuen to this vse and end, to conuict our transgressions, to prouoke vs sinners, to shew and conuince our infirmitie, and to driue vs to Christ: they take and applie no other end to the law, but to make vs perfect, to keepe vs from wrath, and to make vs iust before God. And likewise where saint Paul proueth all our good works to be imperfect, and vtterlie excludeth them from the end of iustifying: they contrariwise do teach, as though the end of good works were to merit remission of sinnes, to satisfie vnto God, to deserue grace, to redeeme soules from purgatorie, and that by them the person of the regenerate man doth please God, and is made iust before God. For to they teach most wickedlie and horrible, saying: that Christ suffered for originall sinne, & sinnes going before baptisme; but the actuall sinnes, which follow after baptisme, must be done awaie by mens merits. And so they assigne to Christ the beginning of saluation, & obtayning of the first grace (as they call it) but the perfection & consummation of grace they giue to works & our owne strength.

The third errour of the papists touching the end of the law and good workes.

Thom. Aquinas. Hosius in 2. tom confess. cap. 14

The papist his crime against the principall scripture.

Neither can they in ante case abide, that we be iustified freelie by the mercie of God through faith onelie apprehending the merits of Christ. Howbeit neither do all papists in this their error agree in one. For some make distinction and saie, that we are iustified by Christ Principaliter, id est, principallie: Et minus principaliter, id est, lesse principallie, by the dignitie of our owne deeds, contrarie to the eight principle before mentioned. Others hold that we are made righteous before God, not by our works that go before faith: but by our vertues that follow after. Some againe do thus expound the saying of saint Paul: Wee are iustified by faith: that is (say they) by faith, preparing vs & setting vs in a good waie to be iustified. Others expound it by the figure Synecdoche, that is, by faith conioyned together with other vertues. Others thus: By faith, that is, being formed with charitie, &c. Thus all these do derogat from the benefit of Christ, and attribute vnto workes a great or the greatest part of our iustification, directlie against the true veine of saint Paules doctrine, and first institution of the ancient church of Rome, and against all the principles of holie scripture.

Against the principles of scripture.

Furthermore, as touching the said doctrine of the law and good works, they erre in misunderstanding the nature of the law and works. For where saint Paul disputeth that the law is spirituall, and requireth of vs perfect obedience of the whole power of man, which we being carnall are neuer able to accomplish: they affirme otherwise, that the law doth require but onely outward obedience of man, and therewith is contented. And this obedience (they say) man is not onely able to performe, but also to do more and greater things then the law requireth. Whereof riseth the workes of supererogation, contrarie to the firth and eight principles aboue specified. Also there be (say they) among other certaine workes of the law, which pertaine not to all men, but are Consilia, counsels, left for perfecter men, as matter for them to merit by, and these they call Opera perfectionis, or Opera indebita, adding also vnto these new deuices to serue God after their own traditions besides the word of God, as monasticall vowes, as all pouerty, difference of meates and garments, pilgrimage to relikes and saints, worshipping of the dead, superstitious ceremonies, rosaries, &c. with such like, and these they call workes of perfection, which they preferre before the other commanded in the law of God. Insomuch that in comparison of these, the other necessarie duties commanded and commended by the word of God (as to beare office in the common-wealth, to liue in the godly state of matrimonie, to sustaine the office of a seruant in a house) is contemned, and accounted as prophane in comparison of these, contrarie to the tenth principle aboue mentioned.

The fourth error of the papists touching the imperfection of man in fulfilling the perfection of the law.

Precepts and counsels.

Works of supererogation. Mens traditions preferred before the workes of Gods law.

Of sinne.

OF sinne likewise they teach not rightly, nor after the institution of the apostles, and the ancient church of Rome, while Erroneous deceite of the latter church of Rome concerning Sinne.

while they consider not the deepenesse and largenesse of sinne, supposing it still to be nothing else but the inward actions with consent of will, or the outward, such as are against will: whereas the strength of sinne extendeth not onely to these, but also comprehendeth the blindnesse and ignorance of the mind, lacke of knowledge and true feare of God, the unfeawardnesse of mans mind to Godward, the prime rebellion of the heart against the law of God, the wideliting will of man to God and his word. The sense of fleshly saint Paul also calleth an enemie against God, and fleshly in himselfe, that is, in his flesh, nothing dwelling but sinne.

Definition of sinne light of it.

As touching also originall sinne, wherein we are borne, which is the destruction of originall iustice, and of Gods image in vs remaining in vs and bringing forth in vs wicked cogitations, affections, and motions of naughtinesse, against the law of God, and never ceaseth so long as man liueth) this originall sinne the popes doctrine doth not denie, but yet doth much extenuate the same, and holdeth that this inward concupiscence and vitious affections not hurtling out in vs with consent of will, are no mortall nor damnable sinne, but onely Fomes peccati: and say moreouer, that this Concupiscentia in vs, is no depravation of the higher, but onely of the lower parts of man, being a thing ἀδιάφορον, indifferent, and no lesse natural in vs than is the appetite to eate and drinke, and that the same is left to remaine in the saints after baptisme, to be to them occasion of more meritting, &c.

Fomes peccati. Concupiscentia.

Originall sinne extenuated.

Of penance, or repentance.

False doctrine of the latter church of Rome touching penance.

OF penance, this latter Laterane church of Rome, of late hath made a sacrament (contrarie to the fourth principle before) which penance, say they, standeth of three parts, contrition, confession, and satisfaction canonical. Contrition (as they teach) may be had by strength of free will, without the law and the holy Ghost, Per actus elicitos, through mans owne action and endeuour. Which contrition first must be sufficient, and so it meriteth remission of sinne. In confession they require a full rehearsall of all sinnes, whereby the priest knowing the crimes, may minister satisfaction accordingly. And this rehearsing of sinnes, Ex opere operato destroyeth remission, contrarie to the fourteenth principle before. Satisfactions they call Opera indebita, inioyned by the ghostly father. And this satisfaction (say they) taketh away, and changeth eternall punishment into temporall paines, which paines also it doth mitigat. And againe, these satisfactions may bee taken away by the popes indulgence, &c.

Contrition. Confession.

Satisfaction.

This fantastic and heathenish doctrine of penance farre differeth from the true teaching of holy scripture; by the which teaching, repentance properlie containeth these three parts, contrition, faith, and new life. Contrition is called in scripture the sorrow of heart, rising vpon the consideration of sinne committed, and of the anger of God prouoked, which sorrow driueth a man to Christ for succour: whereupon riseth faith. Faith bringeth afterward amendment or newnesse of life, which wee call new obedience, working fruits worthie of repentance.

True doctrine of repentance by the scripture. Parts of repentance. 1. Contrition. 2. Faith. 3. Fruits worthie obedience.

Difference betweene the law and the Gospell.

AS there is nothing more necessarie and comfortable for troubled consciences, than to be well instructed in the difference betweene the law and the Gospell: so is the church of Rome much to blame in this behalfe, because it confoundeth together those two, being in nature so diuers and contrarie one from another: as the threatnings and promises, things temporall with things eternall, sorowful things with glad tidings, death with life, bondage with freedome, &c: teaching the people, that what soeuer the law saith, the gospel confirmeth, and whatsoeuer the gospell saith the same is agreeable to the law, and so make they no difference betweene Moses and Christ, saue onelie that Moses (they say) was the giuer of the old law, Christ is the giuer of the new and a more perfect law. And thus imagine they the gospell to be nothing else but a new law giuen by Christ, binding to the promises thereof the condition of our doings and deseruings, no otherwise than to the old law. And so deuide they the whole law after this distinction, into three parts, to wit, the law of nature, the law of Moyses, and the law of Christ. And as for the gospell (they say) it is reuealed for no other cause, but to shew to the world more perfect precepts and counsels, than were in the old law: to the fulfilling whereof they attribute iustification, and so leaue the poore consciences of men in perpetuall doubt, and induce other manifold errours: bringing the people into a false opinion of Christ, as though he were not a remedie against the law, but came as another Moses, to giue a new law to the world.

A Babylonicall confusion in the popes decrees. Either diuerting the paths for the ruyning Moses and Christ. Papists make the gospell a new law.

Papists deuide the law into three. The law of nature. The law of Moyses, and the law of Christ. Their popish church deuideth also the office of Christ.

Furthermore, as they make no difference betweene the nature of the law and the nature of the gospell, confounding Moses and Christ together: so neither do they distinct or discerne the time of the law, and the time of the gospell alsunder. For where S. Paul bringeth in the law to be a schoolemaster, and limitteth him his time vnto Christ: and saith that Christ is the end of the law, that is, whereas the law ceaseth, there Christ begi-

The time of the law, and time of the gospell distinguished.

gineth, and where Christ beginneth there the law endeth: they contrarie make the law to haue no end nor ceasing, but giue to it immortall life, a kingdom equall with Christ, so that Christ and the law together do raigne ouer the soule and conscience of man. Which is untrue. For either Christ must giue place, and the law stand: or the law (the condemnation and bondage of the law I mean) must end, and Christ reigne. For both these, Christ and the law, grace and malediction, cannot reigne and gouerne together. But Christ the sonne of God which once died, can die no more, but must reigne for euer. Wherefore the law with his strength, sting, and curse, must needs cease and haue an end. And this is it that S. Paul speaking of the triumph of Christ, saith, that he Ascending vp led away captiuitie captiue, & hath set man at libertie, not at libertie to liue as fleshly lusteth, neither hath freed him from the vse and exercise of the law, but from the dominion and power of the law, so that There is now no condemnation to them that be in Christ Iesu, which walke not after the flesh, &c. Rom. 8. And in another place, S. Paul speaking of the same power and dominion of the law, saith, that Christ hath taken the obligation written against vs in decrees, and hath nailed it vpon the crosse, triumphing ouer all, &c. So that as the kingdome of Christ first began vpon the crosse, euen so vpon the same crosse, and at the same time the kingdome of the law expired, and the malediction of the law was to crucified vpon the crosse, that it shall neuer rise againe, to haue any power against them that be in Christ Iesu. For like as if a woman be discharged from her first husband being dead, and hath married another man, the first husband hath no more power ouer her: euen so we now being espoused vnto Christ our second husband, are discharged vtterlie from our first husband the law, and as S. Paul in another place saith) Are no more vnder the law, that is, vnder the dominion and malediction of the law. But vnder grace, that is, vnder perpetuall remission of sinnes, committed not onely before our baptisme, but as well also after baptisme, and during all our life long. For therein properlie consisteth the grace of God, in not imputing sinne vnto vs, so often as the repenting sinner rising vp by faith fleeth vnto Christ, and apprehendeth Gods mercie and remission promised in him, according to the testimonie both of the psalme, Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sinne, &c: and also of all the prophets, Which (as S. Peter saith) giue record to him, that through his name all that beleeue in him shall receiue remission of their sins, &c. Act. 10. Which being so, as it cannot be denied, then that neede these pitiat and extraordinarie remissions to be brought into the church by care confession, by meritorious deeds, and by the popes pardons. For if there be no condemnation, but a free and generall deliuerance for all men, once gotten by the victorie of Christ, from the penalitie of the law: what needeth then any particular remission of sinnes, at sundrie times to be sought at the priests hands or the popes pardons? he that hath a generall pardon needeth no particular. If remedie for sinne be generall and perpetuall once gotten for euer, to all them that be in Christ Iesu, what needeth any other remedie by auricular confession? If it be not generall and perpetuall, how then is it true that S. Paul saith? The law is crucified, and condemnation abolished? or how standeth redemption perpetuall and generall, if remission be not generall? for what is redemption else, but remission of sinnes, or sinnes bought out? Or what else to kill the law, but to discharge vs from condemnation for euer? He that deliuereth his friend for a time out of his enemies hand, doth him a pleasure: but he that killeth the enemie once out of the way, giueth perpetuall safetie. So if remission of sinnes by Christ were for some sinnes and not for all, the law then must needs liue still. But now the killing and crucifying of the law importeth full remission to bee absolute, and our safetie to be perpetuall. But here perase will be obiected of some: How standeth remission of sinnes certaine and perpetuall, seeing new offences being daily committed, doe daily require new remission? Hereto I answere: Albeit sins doe daily grow, whereby we haue need daily to desire God to Forgiue our trespasses, &c: yet notwithstanding the cause of our remission standeth euer one and perpetuall, neither is the same to be repeated any more, nor any other cause to bee sought besides that alone. This cause is the sacrificed bodie of Christ once vpon the crosse for all sins that either haue or shall be committed. Beside this cause there is no other, neither confession, nor mens pardons that remitteth sinnes.

Furthermore, as the cause is one and euer perpetuall, which worketh remission of sinnes vnto vs: so is the promise of God euer one, once made and standeth perpetuall, that offereth the same to the faith of the repenting sinner. And because the said promise of God is alwaies sure and cannot faile, which offereth remission to all them that beleeue in Christ, being limited neither to time nor number, therefore we may boldlie conclude, that what time soeuer a repenting sinner beleeueth and by faith applieth to him the sacrifice of Christ, he hath by Gods owne promise remission of his sinnes, whether they were done before or after baptisme.

And

The meanes whereby remission is promised to onely faith.

And moreouer, for so much as the said promise of God offereth remission to the repentant sinner, by no other meanes nor condition, but onely one, that is, by faith in Christ: therefore excluding all other meanes and conditions of mans working, we saie, that what repenting sinner soeuer beleeueth in Christ, hath alreadie in himselfe (and needeth not to seeke to anie priest) perpetuall assurance of remission, not for this time or that time onelie, but for euer and a daie. For the promise saith not, He that beleeueth in Christ shall be pardoned this time, so he sinne no more: neither doth it say, that the law is staid, or the sentence reprieued, but saith plainlie, that the law with his condemnation and sentence hir selfe is condemned and hanged vp, and shall neuer rise againe to them that be in Christ Iesu: and promiseth indeterminatlie, without limitation, remission of sinnes. To all that beleeue in his name, &c. Act. 10. And likewise in another place the scripture speaking absolutelie, saith, Sinne shall not preuaile ouer you, and addeth the reason why: saying: Because ye are not vnder the law but vnder grace. Rom. 6. Adding this lesson withall (as followeth in the same place) Not that sinners should sin more therefore, because they are vnder grace, but onelie that weake infirmities might be releeued, broken consciences comforted, and repenting sinners holpen from desperation, to the praise of Gods glorie. For as God forgiueth not sinners because they should sinne, so neither doth infirmitie of falling diminish the grace of Christ, but rather doth illustrat the same, as it is written: My strength is made perfect in infirmitie. 2. Corin. 12. And againe: Where sinne aboundeth, there superaboundeth also grace.

Mans infirmitie imparteth not the grace of Christ, but augmenteth it. 2. Cor. 12. Rom. 5.

For the causes of remission of sinnes.

To be vnder the law, and vnder grace expounded.

In remission of sinnes therefore, these foure things must concurre together; first the cause that worketh (which is the sacrifice of Christs bodie) secondlie the promise that offereth, thirdlie faith that apprehendeth, fourthly the repenting sinner that receiueth. And although sinnes dailie do grow, which dailie prouoke vs to craue remission: yet as touching the cause that worketh remission of our dailie sinnes, and the meanes which apprehend and applie the said cause vnto vs, they remaine alwayes one and perpetuall: besides which no other cause nor meanes is to be sought of man. So that to them that be repenting sinners, and be in Christ Iesu, there is no law to condemne them, though they haue deserued condemnation: but they are vnder a perpetuall kingdome & a beaten full of grace and remission to couer their sinnes, and not to impute their iniquities, through the promise of God in Christ Iesu our Lord.

What to be vnder grace. Psalm. 32. Act. 10.

One remedie for remission of sinnes and no more.

Particular confession no remedie for remission of sinnes.

The popes errours touching remission of sins directed.

And therefore wicked and impious is the doctrine of them, first which seeke anie other cause of remission then onelie the blond of our Sauiour: secondly, which assigne any other meanes to applie the bloudshedding of Christ vnto vs, besides onelie faith: thirdlie and especiallie, which so limit and restraine the eternall priuilege of Christs passion, as though it serued but onely for sinnes done without and before faith, and that the rest after baptisme committed must be done awaie by confession, pardons, and satisfactorie deeds. And all this rebellion, to the true nature of the law and the gospell is not vnknowne, nor the difference rightlie considered betweene the times of the one and of the other. Neither againe do they make anie distinction betweene the maledication of the law and ble of the law. And therefore whensoeuer they heare vs speake of the law (meaning the maledication of the law) to be abolished, thereupon they maliciously slander vs, as though we spake against the good exercises of the law and giue liberty of flesh to carnall men to liue as they list. Whereof more shall be said (by the Lords grace) as place & time shal hereafter require.

What inconuenience riseth for lacke of distinction betweene the law and the Gospell.

Of free will.

COncerning free will, as it may peraduenture in some case be admitted, that men without grace maie do some outward functions of the law, and keepe some outward obseruances or traditions: so as touching things spirituall and appertaining to saluation, the strength of man being not regenerate by grace, is so infirme & impotent, that he can performe nothing, neither in doing well nor willing well. Who after he be regenerated by grace may worke and do well, but yet in such sort, that still remaineth not withstanding a great imperfection of flesh, and a perpetuall repugnance betweene the flesh and spirit. And thus was the originall church of the ancient Romans first instituted. From whom se now do we fare this latter church of Rome hath degenerated, which he doth not affirmeth, that men without grace may performe the obedience of the law, and prepare themselues to grace by working, so that those works maie be meritorious, and of congruitie or condigne grace. Which grace once obteined then men may (say they) perfectlie performe the full obedience of the law, and accomplish those spirituall actions and works which God requireth, and to those works of condignitie deserue euerlasting life. As for the infirmitie which still remaineth in nature, that they nothing regard nor once speake of.

Meritum de congruo.

Meritum de condigno.

Of inuocation and adoration.

False doctrine concerning inuocation.

OTher and besides these vncatholike and almost vnchristian absurdities and defections from the apostolical faith aboue specified, let vs consider the maner of their inuocation, not to God alone, as they should, but to dead men, saying: that saints are to be called vpon, Tanquam mediatores intercessionis, As mediators of intercession: Christum verò tanquam mediatorem salutis, And Christ as the mediator of saluation. And affirme moreouer, that Christ was a mediator onelie in time of his passion. Which is repugnant to the words of saint Paul inuiting to the old Romans, chapter eight, where he speaking of the intercession of Christ: Which is (saith he) on the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for vs, &c. And if Christ be a mediator of saluation, what needeth then anie other intercession of the saints for our sakes? For saluation being once had what can we require more? Or what lacketh he more to be obteined of the saint's which is sure to be saued onelie by Christ? And yet in their catholike deuotions, why do they teach vs thus to praie to the blessed virgine: Salua omnes quite glorificant, that is, Saue all them that glorifie thee, &c.: if saluation onelie belong to Christ: rules they studie of purpose to leame contrarie to themselues.

Mediator of intercession. Obiect. a certeine mediator by the doctrine of S. Paul. 1. Tim. 2. Christ onelie being our mediator of saluation: why mediation of saints? Satisfaction falselie attributed to the blessed virgin.

Hitherto also pertineth the worshipping of reliues, and the false adoration of sacraments, that is, the outward signes of the things signified, contrarie to the seuenth principle before. Adde to this also the prophanation of the Lords supper, contrarie to the vse for which it was ordeined, in reserving it after the communion ministred, in setting it to sale for money, and falslie perswading both themselues and others, that the priest doth merit both to himselfe that saith, and to him that heareth. Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis, &c: that is, Onelie by the meere doing of the worke, though the partie that eateth the same hath no motion in him.

Idolatrous adoration of reliues and sacraments. Prophanation of the Lords supper. False meritting by massing.

Of sacraments, baptisme and the Lords Supper.

AS touching sacraments, their doctrine likewise is corrupt and erroneous.

False doctrine touching Sacraments. The number.

First they erre falslie in the number. For where the institution of Christ ordeineth but two, they (contrarie to the fourth principle aboue prefixed) haue added to the prescription of the Lords word, fiue other sacraments.

Cause finall.

2 Secondlie, in the cause finall they erre. For where the word hath ordeined those sacraments to excite our faith, and to giue vs admonitions of spirituall things: they contrarilie do teach that the sacraments do not onelie stirre vp faith, but also that they availe and are effectuall without faith, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis, &c. As is to be found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Catharinus, and others more.

The operation.

3 Thirdlie, in the operation & effect of the sacraments they faile, where they contrarie to the mind of the scriptures, do saie, that they giue grace, and not onelie so do signifie, but also conteine and exhibit that which they signifie, to wit, grace and saluation.

The application of sacraments.

4 Fourthlie, they erre also in application, applying their sacraments both to the quicke and the dead, to them also that be absent, to remission of sinnes, and releasing of paine, &c.

Errors and abuses in baptisme.

In the sacrament of baptisme they are to be reproued, not onelie for adding to the simple words of Christs institution diuers other new found rites and phantisies of men: but also where the vse of the old church of Rome was onelie to baptise men, they baptise also bels, and applie the words of baptisme to water, fire, candels, stocks, and stones, &c.

Baptising of bells.

But especiallie in the supper of the Lord their doctrine most filthilie swarueth from the right mind of the scripture, all order, reason, and fashion, most worthie to be exploded out of all christian churches. Touching the which sacrament, the first errour is their idolatrous abuse by worshipping, adoring, censing, knocking and kneeling vnto it, in reseruing also and carrying the same about in pompe & procession in townes and fields. Secondlie also in the substance thereof their teaching is monstrous, leauing there no substance of bread and wine to remaine, but onelie the reall bodie and blond of Christ, putting no difference betweene calling and making. Because Christ called bread his bodie, therefore, saie they, he made it his bodie, and so of a wholesome sacrament, make a perilous idoll and that which the old church of Rome did euer take to be a mysterie, they turne into a blind mist of meere accidences to bleare the peoples eies, making them to beleeue they see that they see not and not to see that which they see, and to worship a thing made, for their maker, a creature for their creator: and that was inclosed out of a wheaten sheafe they set vp in the church, and worship for a sauiour: and when they haue worshipped him, then they offer him to his father: and when they haue offered him, then they eat him vp, or else close him fast in a pix, where if he be corrupt and putrifie before he be eaten, then they burne him to powder and ashes. And notwithstanding they know well by scriptures, that the bodie of Christ can neuer corrupt and putrifie: yet for all this corruption will they needs make it the bodie of Christ, and burne all them which beleeue not that which is against true christian beleefe.

The sacrament turned to an idoll.

Changing, worshipping, offering, eating, burning the bodie of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

Of matrimonie

WHat order and rule saint Paul hath set for marriage in his epistle to the Corinthians it is manifest: whereas he preferreth single life in such as haue the gift of continence, before the married state: so against in such as haue not the gift, he preferreth the coupled life before the other: willing euerie such one to haue his wife: Because of fornication. Furthermore, how the said apostle alloweth a bishop to bee the husband of one wife: so he erected not to the manner of the Iewes, which were permitted to haue many: and how vehemently hee reproueth them that restraine marriage, his letters to Timothie do record. Moreouer, what degrees be permitted by the law of God to marrie, in the booke of Leuiticus is to bee seene, chapter eighteene. Also how children ought not to marrie without consent of their parents, by manifest examples of the scriptures it is notorious.

Abhominable and lewde decrees of the popes church touching marriage. 1. Cor. 7.

Single life bringeth more pollution then mariage. Mariage honorable. The church pretendeth some reuerence to the holy state of mariage. The popes decree against mariage and single life. The third part of the yeare exempted from mariage. Mariage within the fifth degree by the popes law. Without infidelitie it is not lawfull to marrie by the popes lawe. Great inconueniences come by restraining of mariage.

Contrarie to these ordinances of the scripture, the new catholikes of the popes church, first doe repute and call mariage a state of imperfection, and preferre single life, be it neuer so impure, before the same, pretending that where the one replenisheth the earth, the other filleth heauen. Furthermore, as god as the third part of christendome, if it be no more, both men and women, they keepe through coated bowes from mariage, hauing no respect whether they haue the gift or no. Ministers and priests, such as are found to haue wiues, not onely they remoue out of place, but also pronounce sentence of death vpon them, and account their children for bastards and illegitimate: Againe, as god as the third part of the yeare they exempt and suspend from libertie of marriage. Degrees of copulation forbidden they extend further then euer did the law of God, euen to the fifth or sixth degree. Which degree notwithstanding they release againe when they list for money. Dare and besides all this, they haue added a new found prohibition of spirituall kindred, that is, that such as haue been gossips, or godfathers and godmothers together in christening an other mans childe, must not by their lawe marrie together. Briefly and finally in this doctrine and cases of matrimonie, they gaine and rake to themselues much money from the people, they augment horrible sodomitrie, they nourish wicked aduiterie and much fornication, they fill the world with offensions and bastards, and giue great occasion of murthering infants.

Of magistrates and ciuil gouernement.

The corrupt doctrine of the popes church concerning ciuil rulers and magistrates. Rom. 13.

YE heard before what rules and lessons saint Paul gaue to the old Romans concerning magistrats, to whose authoritie he would all humane creatures to be subiected, and how they are the ministers of God, hauing the sword giuen vnto them, wherewith they ought to repaire false dearine and idolatrie, and maintaine that which is true and right, Rom. 13. Now let vs survey a little the popes proceedings, and marke how farre he transgresseth in this, as he doth in all other points almost from true christianitie.

1 First, the pope with all his clergie exempt themselues from all obedience ciuill.

2 They arrogate to themselues authority to ordaine and constitute, without all leaue or knowledge of the ordinarie magistrate.

3 Yea they take vpon them to depose and set vp rulers and magistrates, whom they list.

Of purgatorie.

The fantasies and anticdes of the popes church concerning purgatorie.

THE paradoxes, or rather the fantasies of the latter church of Rome concerning purgatorie, be monstrous, neither old nor apostolicall.

1 First (say they) there is a purgatorie, where soules do burne in fire after this life.

2 The paine of purgatorie differeth nothing from the paines of hell, but onely that it hath an end; the paines of hell haue none.

3 The painefull suffering of this fire fretteth and scoureth away the sinnes before committed in the bodie.

Ex Thom. Mora & alijs.

4 The time in these paines indureth in some longer, in some lesse, according as their sinnes deserue.

5 After which time of their paines being expired, then the mercie of God doth translate them to heauenly blisse, which the bodie of Christ hath bought for them.

6 The paines of purgatorie bee so great, that if all the beggers of the world were seene on the one side, and but one soule of purgatorie on the other side, the whole world would pite more that one, then all the others.

7 The whole time of punishment in this purgatorie must continue so long, till the fire haue cleane fretted and scoured away the rustie spots of euery sinfull soule there burning, vnlesse there come some release.

8 Helpes and releases that may shorten the time of their purgation, be the popes pardons and indulgences, sacrifice of the altar, dirges, and trentals, prayer, fasting, meritorious deeds out of the treasure house of the church, almes and charitable deeds of the liuing, in satisfying Gods iustice for them, &c.

Manifest defection of the popes church from the old faith of Rome.

9 Lacke of beliefe of purgatorie bringeth to hell.

Many other false errors and great deformities, heresies, absurdities, banities, and follies, besides their blasphemous railings & contumelies, may be noted in the said latter church of Rome, wherein they haue made manifest desection from the old faith of Rome, as in depriuing the church of one kind of the sacrament, in taking from the people the knowledge and reading of Gods word, in praying and speaking to the people, and administring sacraments in a tongue vnknowne, in mistaking the authoritie of the keyes, in their vnwritten verities, in making the authoritie of the scripture insufficient, in vntrue iudgement of the church and the wrong notes of the same, in the supremacie of the see of Rome, in their wrong opinions of antichrist.

But because these, with all other parts of doctrine, are more copiously and at large comprehended in other bookes both in Latine and English, let faith in these our daies; I shall not nede further herein to trauell, especially seeing the contrarie betweene the popes church and the church of Christ, betweene the doctrine of the one and the doctrine of the other, is so euident that he is blind that seeth it not, and hath no hands almost that feeleth it not.

Contrarietie betweene the religion of Christ and of the pope briefly noted.

For (briefly in one note to comprehend, which may suffice for all) whereas the doctrine of Christ is altogether spirituall, consisting wholie in spirit and veritie, and requireth no outward thing to make a true christian man but onely baptisme (which is the outward profession of faith) and receiuing the Lords supper: let vs now examine the whole religion of this latter church of Rome, and we shall find it from top to toe, to consist in nothing else but altogether in outward and ceremoniall exercises; as outward confession, absolution at the priests hand, outward sacrifice of the masse, buying of pardons, purchasing of obits, externe worshipping of images and reliques, pilgrimage to this place or that, building of churches, founding of monasteries, outward workes of the law, outward gestures, garments, colours, choice of meates, difference of times and places, peculiar rites, and obseruances, set prayers, and number of prayers prescribed, fasting of vigils, keeping of holydaies, conuning to church, hearing of seruice, externe succession of bishops, and of Peters see, externe forme and notes of the church, &c. So that by this religion to make a true christian and a good catholike, there is no working of the holy ghost almost required. As by example, to make this matter more demonstrable, let vs here define a christian man after the popes making: whereby we may see the better what is to be iudged of the scope of his doctrine.

No outward thing to be required in Christs doctrine to make a christian man but onely baptisme and the Lords supper. All doctrine of the popes standeth onely in outward things.

A christian man after the popes making defined.

A christian man defined after the popes doctrine.

AFter the popes catholike religion, a true christian man is thus defined: first, to be baptised in the Latin tongue where the godfathers profesie they cannot tell what) then confirmed by the bishop: the mother of the child to be purified, after he bee growen in yeares, then to come to the church, to keepe his fasting daies, to fast the Lent, to come vnder benedicite, that is to be confessed of the priest, to do his penance, at Easter to take his rites, to heare masse and diuine seruice, to set vp candles before images, to crepe to the crosse, to take holy bread and holy water, to go on procession, to carie his palmes and candle, and to take ashes, to fast the ember daies, rogation daies, and vigils, to keepe the holy daies, to pay his tithes and offering daies, to go on pilgrimage, to buy pardons, to worship his maker ouer the priests head, to receiue the pope for his supreme head, and to obey his lawes, to receiue S. Nicholas clerks, to hane his beads, and to giue to the high altar, to take orders if he will be a priest, to say his mattens, to sing his masse, to lift vp faire, to keepe his vow, and not to marrie, when he is sicke to bee anneled, and take the rites of the holy church, to be buried in the churchyard, to be rung for, to bee sung for, to be buried in a friers cole, to find a soule priest, &c.

All which points being obserued, who can denie but this is a decent man and a perfect christian catholike, and fure to be saued, as a true faithfull child of the holy mother church?

Now loke vpon this definition, and tell me (good reader) what faith or spirit, or what working of y Holy ghost in at this doctrine is to be required. The grace of our Lord Iesu giue the true light of his gospell to shine in our hearts. Amen.

Two things in this historie chiefly to be noted.

The king dome of Christ in this world.

The visible church. The church of Christ diuided in two sorts of people.

The first Booke of the Acts and Monuments, containing the three hundred yeeres next after Christ, with the ten persecutions of the primitiue Church.

THese things before premised, hauing thus hitherto prepared the way vnto our storie, let vs now (by the grace and speed of Christ our Lord) enter into the matter: that as we haue heretofore set forth in a generall description the whole state as well of the primitiue as of the latter times of this church of Rome: so now consequently to discourse in particular sort the acts and doings of euery age, by it selfe, in such order as is afore prefixed.

1 Firſt, to declare of the suffering time of the church, which containeth about the time of three hundred yeeres after Christ.

2 Secondly, the flourishing and growing time of the same, containing other three hundred yeeres.

3 Thirdly, the declining time of the church, and of true religion, other three hundred yeeres.

4 Fourthly, of the time of antichrist, raigning and raging in the church, since the losing of Satan.

5 Lastlie, of the reforming time of Christs church in these latter three hundred yeeres.

In the tractation of all which things our chiefe purpose and endeuor shall be (so neere as the Lord will giue vs grace) not so much to intermeddle with outward affaires of princes, or matters ciuill (except sometime for example of life) as peculiarlie minding (by the helpe of the Lord) to prosecute such things, which to the ecclesiasticall estate of the church are appertaining: as first to intreat of the stablishing of christian faith, then of the persecutions of tyrants, the constancie and patience of Gods saints, the first conuersion of christian realmes to the faith of Christ, namely of this realme of England and Scotland: first beginning with king Lucius, and so forward following the order of our English kings here in this land, to declare the maintenance of true doctrine, the false practise of prelats, the creeping in of superstition and hypocrisie, the manifold assaults, warres and tumults of the princes of this world, against the people of God. Wherein may appeare the wonderfull operation of Christs mighty hand euer working in his church, and neuer ceasing to defend the same against his enemies, according to the veritie of his own word, promising to be with his church vntill the world shall stand, so as by the processe of this storie may well be proued, and be testified in the sequell thereof.

In the tractation of all which things two speciall points I chiefly commend to the reader, as most requisit and necessarie of euery christian man to obserue and to note for his owne experience and profit, as first the disposition and nature of this world: secondly the nature and condition of the kingdome of Christ: the sanctie of the one, and stablishment of the other: the prosperous and vniquiet state of the one, ruled by mans violence and wisdome, and the happie successe of the other euer ruled by Gods blessing and prouidence: the wrath and reuenging hand of God in the one, and his mercie vpon the other. The world I call all such as be without or against Christ, either by ignorance not knowing him, or by heathenish life not following him, or by violence resisting him. On the other side, the kingdome of Christ in this world I take to be all them which belong to the faith of Christ, & here take his part in this world against the world: the number of whom although it be much smaller than the other, and alwaies lightly is hated and molested of the world, yet it is the number, which the Lord peculiarlie doth bless and prosper, and euer will. And this number of Christs subiects is it, which we call the visible church here in earth. Which visible church, hauing in it selfe a difference of two sorts of people, so is it to be diuided in two parts, of which the one standeth of such as be of outward profession onlie, the other which by election inwardly are ioyned to Christ: the first in words and lips seeme to honour Christ, and are in the visible church onely, but not in the church inuisible, and partake the outward sacraments of Christ, but not the inward blessing of Christ. The other are both in the visible and also in the inuisible church of Christ, which not in words onely and outward profession, but also in heart doe truly serue and honor Christ, partaking not onely the sacraments, but also the heauenly blessings and grace of Christ.

And many times it hapneth, that as betweene the world and the kingdome of Christ there is a continuall repugnance: so betweene these two parts of this visible church also (as said) oft times groweth great variance and mortall persecution, insomuch that sometime the true church of Christ hath no greater enemies then of their owne profession and compantie, as happened not onely in the time of Christ and his apostles, but also from time to time almost continually: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1: but especiallie in these latter daies of the church vnder the persecution of antichrist and his retinue, as by the reading of this volume more manifestly hereafter may appeare. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1.

At the first preaching of Christ, and comming of the gospell, who should rather haue knowne and receiued him, then the Pharisies and Scribes of that people, which had his law? And yet who persecuted and reiected him more then they themselues? What followed? They in refusing Christ to be their king, and choosing rather to be subiect vnto Cesar, were by the said their owne Cesar at length destroyed: when as Christs subiects the same time escaped the danger. Whereby it is to be learned, that a dangerous thing it is to refuse the gospell of God, when it is so gently offered. Gods punishment for refusing the gospell.

The like example of Gods wrathfull punishment is to be noted no lesse in the Romans also themselues. For when Tiberius Cesar, hauing receiued by letters from Pontius Pilat of the doings of Christ, of his miracles, resurrection, and ascension into heauen, and how he was receiued as God of many, was himselfe also moued with beliefe of the same, and did confer therof with the whole senat of Rome, to haue Christ adored as God: but they not agreeing thereunto refused him, because that contrarie to the law of the Romans, he was consecrated (said they) for God, before the senat of Rome had so decreed and approued him, &c. Tertul. Apol. cap. 5. Thus the vaine senat following rather the lawe of man then of God, and which were contented with the emperour to reigne ouer them, were not contented with the meeke king of glorie the sonne of God to be their king: and therefore after much like sort to the Iewes were scourged and intrapped for their vniust refusing, by the same way which they themselues did prefer. For as they preferred the emperor, and reiected Christ: so the iust permission of God did stir vp their owne emperors against them in such sort, that both the senators themselues were almost all deuoured, and the whole citie most horrible afflicted the space almost of three hundred yeeres together. For first the same Tiberius, which for a great part of his raigne was a moderate and a tolerable prince, afterward was to them a sharpe and beaute tyrant, who neither fauoured his owne mother, nor spared his owne nephues, nor the princes of the citie, such as were his owne counsellors, of whom to the number of twentie he left not past two or three aliue: so cruell was he to the citie, that as the storie recordeth, Nullus à pœna hominem cessabat diespræterquam religiosus quisque ac sacer. Suetonius reporteth him to be so ferne of nature & tyrannicall, that in time of his reigne, hee many were accused and condemned with their wiues and children, maids also first defloured, then put to death. In one day he recordeth twentie persons to be drawne to the place of execution. By whom also, through the iust punishment of God, Pilat, vnder whom Christ was crucified, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed, then banished to the towne of Lions, and at length did slay himselfe. Neither did Herod and Caiphas long escape, of whose falloweth hereafter Agrippa also by him was cast into prison, albeit afterward he was restored. In the reigne of Tiberius, the Lord Iesus the son of God, in the foure and thirtith yeere of his age, which was the fruententh of this emperor, by the malice of the Iewes suffered his blessed passion for the conquering of sinne, death, and satan the prince of this world, and rose againe the third day. After whose blessed passion and resurrection, this foresaid Tiberius Nero (otherwise called Biberius Nero) liued five yeeres, during which time no persecution was yet stirring in Rome against the christians, through the commandement of the emperour. Ex Suet. in Vita Tiberij. Christ risen again. {Anno. 34}

Saint Paul conuerted.

Anno 35 Anno 39 Cæsar Caligula.

In the raigne also of this emperor, and vere which was the next after the passion of our Sauiour, or somewhat more, saint Paul was conuerted to the faith. After the death of Tiberius, when he had raigned three & twentie yeeres, succeded C. Cæsar Caligula, Claudius Nero, & Domitius Neroclobych three were likewise such scourges to the senat and people of Rome, that the first not only take other mens liues violently from them, but also defloured three of his owne sisters, and afterward banished them. So wicked he was, that he commanded himselfe to be worshipped as god, and temples to be erected in his name, and vsed to sit in the temple among the gods, requiring his images to be set vp in all temples, and also in the temple of Hierusalem, which caused great disturbance among the Iews, and then began the abomination of desolation to be set vp in the holy place, spoken of in the gospell. His cruell condition, or else displeasure was such toward the Romans, that he wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he at his pleasure might destroy such a multitude. Vp this said Caligula, Herod the murtherer of Iohn Baptist, and cundemner of Christ, was condemned to perpetuall banishment, where hee died miserable. Caiphas also, which wickedly sat vpon Christ, was the same time removed from the high priests rome, and Ionathan set in his place. The raging fiercenes of this Caligula incensed against the Romans, had not thus ceased, had not he been cut off by the hands of a tribune and other gentlemen, which slue him in the fourth yeere of his raigne. After whose death was found in his closet two little libels, one called a sword, the other the dagger: in the which libels were contained the names of those senators and noblemen of Rome, whom he had purposed to put to death. Besides this sword and dagger, there was found also a coffer, wherein diuers kindes of poison were kept in glasses and bottels for the purpose, to destroy a wonderfull number of people; which poisons afterward being throwne into the sea, destroyed a great number of fish. But what which this Caligula had only conceiued, the same did the other two which came after hime to passe. Claudius Nero, who raigned thirteene yeeres with no little cruelties, but especially the third of these Neroes called Domitius Nero, which succeeding after Claudius, reigned fourteene yeeres, with such furie and tyrannie, that he slue the most part of the senators, he destroyed the whole order of knighthood in Rome. So prodigious a monster of nature was he, that he slue a beast, yea rather a diuel then a man, that he seemed to be borne to the destruction of men. Such was his monstrous vncleannesse, that he abstained not from his own mother, his natural sister, nor from any degree of kindred. Such was his wretched cruelty, that he caused to be put to death his mother, his brother in law, his sister, his wife great with child, also his instructor Seneca and Lucane, with diuers more of his owne kindred and consanguinitie. Moreouer, he commanded Rome to be set on fire in twelue places, and so continued it fire daies and seuen nights in burning, while that he ta sate the example how Troy buried, sang the verses of Homer. And to auoid the infamie thereof, he laid the fault vpon the christian men, and caused them to be persecuted. And so continued this miserable emperour in his reigne fourteene yeeres, till at last the senat proclaiming him a publike enemie vnto mankind, condemned him to be drawne through the citie, and to be whipped to death. For the feare whereof, he tiping the hands of his enemies, in the night fled to a manor of his seruants in the countrie, where he was forced to slay himselfe, complaining that he had then neither friend nor enemie left that would doe so much for him. In the latter end of this Domitius Nero, Peter and Paul were put to death for the testimony & faith of Christ. Anno 1. the nine.

Peter and Paul suffered for Christ.

Anno 69

Thus ye se, which is worthie to be marked, how the ill seruice and heauie indignation of God from time to time euer followeth there, and how all things there go to ruine, neither doth any thing well prosper, where Christ Iesus the sonne of God is contemned & not receiued, as by these examples may appeare, both of Romans which not only were thus consumed and plagued by their owne emperors, but also by ciuill wars, wherof three were fought in two yeres at Rome after the death of Nero, and other casualties (as in Sueton is testified) so that in the daies of Cibertius aforesaid, fiue thousand Romans were hurt and slaine at one time by fall of a theatre. And also most especially by the destruction of the Iewes, which about this same time, in the yere three score and thirteene, and fortie yeeres after the passion of Christ, and the third yere after the suffering of S. Peter and Paul, were destroyed by Titus and Vespasian his father (who succeded after Nero in the empire) to the number of eleuen hundred thousand, besides them which Vespasian slue in subduing the countrie of Galile, ouer and beside them also which were sold and sent into Egypt and other prouinces to vile slauery, to the number of seuenteene thousand. Two thousand were brought with Titus in his triumph, of which, part he caue to be deuoured of the wild beasts, part otherwise most cruelly were slaine. By whose case all nations & realmes may take example, what it is to reiect the visitation of Gods seruite being sent, and much more to persecute them which be sent of God for their saluation.

Vespasian emperor and Titus his sonne. The destruction of the Iewes

A note for all Realmes to marke.

The Romans for contemning

And as this wrathfull vengeance of God thus hath been shewed vpon this rebellious people, both of the Iewes and of the Romans, for their contempt of Christ, whom God so punished by their owne emperors: so neither the emperors themselues, for persecuting Christ in his members, escaped without their iust reward. For amongst so many emperors which put so many christian martyrs to death, during the space of these first three hundred yeeres, few or none of them scaped either not slaine themselues, or by some miserable end or other worthily reuenged. First of the poisoning of Tiberius, and of the slaughter of the other three Neroes after him, sufficiently is declared before. After Nero, Domitius Galba within seuen monethes was slaine by Otho. And so did Otho afterward slay himself, being ouercome by Vitellius. And was not Vitellius shortly after driuen through the citie of Rome, and after he was tormented was throwne into Tiber? Titus a good emperor is thought to be poisoned of Domitian his brother. The said Domitian after he had been a persecutor of the christians, was slaine in his chamber, not without the consent of his wife. Likewise Commodus was murdered of Narcidius. The like end was of Pertinax and Iulianus. Moreouer, after that Seuerus was slaine here in England, and lieth at Yorke, did not his sonne Bassianus slay his brother Geta, and for after slaine of Martialis? Macrinus with his sonne Diadumenus were both slaine of their owne souldiers. After whom Heliogabalus that monstrous bellipanch, was of his owne people slaine, and driuen through the citie and cast into Tiber. Alexander Severus that worthie & learned emperor, which said hee would not feed his seruants doing nothing, with the boinels of the common wealth, although in life and vertues was much vnlike other emperors, yet prooued the like end, being slaine at Mentz with his godly mother Mammea, by Maximinus, whom the emperor before & a murderer had aduanced to great dignities. The third Maximinus also after three yeeres was slaine himselfe of his souldiers. What thould I speake of Martinus and Balbinus in like sort both slaine in Rome? Of Gordian slaine by Philip? Philip the first christened emperor, slaine or rather martyred for the same cause: of wicked Decius drowned, and his sonne slaine the same time in battell: of Gallus and Volusianus his sonne, emperors after Decius, both slaine by conspiracie of Aemilianus, who rose against them both in warre, and within three moneths after was slaine himselfe. Next to Aemilianus succeded Valerianus and Galienus his son, of whom Valerianus (who was a persecutor of the christians) was taken prisoner of the Persians, and there made a riding sole of Sapores their king, who vsed him for a stole to leape vpon his horse, while his sonne Galienus sleeping at Rome, either knewe not, or could not once profer to reuenge his fathers ignominie. For after the taking of Valerian, to many emperors rose vp as were prouinces in the Roman monarchie. At length Galienus also was killed by Aureolus who warred against him. It were too long here to speak of Aurelianus another persecutor, slaine of his secretarie; of Tacitus and Florinus his brother, of whom the first raigned fiue monethes and was slaine at Pontus, the other raigned two monethes & was murthered at Tarsis: of Probus, who although a good ciuill emperor, yet was he destroyed by his souldiers. After whom Carus the next emperor was slaine by lightning. Next to Carus followed the impious and wicked persecutor Diocletian, with his fellowes Maximian, Valerius, Maximinus, Sarentius, and Licinius, under whom all at one time (during the time of Diocletian) the greatest and most grieuous persecution was moued against the christian ten yeeres together. Of which Diocletian and Maximian deposed themselues from the empire. Galerius the chiefe minister of the persecution, after his terrible persecutions, fell into a wonderfull sickneste, hauing such a froe risen in the nether part of his belly, which consumed his priuie members, and so did swarme with wormes, that being not curable neither by surgerie nor physicke, he confessed that it happened for his cruelty toward the Christians, and so called in his proclamations against them. Notwithstanding, he not able to finish (as some say) the stinke of his froe slue himselfe. Maximinus in his warre, being tormented with paine in his guts, there died. Sarentius was vanquished by Constantine, and drowned in Tiber. Licinius likewise being ouercome by the said Constantine the great, was deposed from his empire, and afterward slaine of his souldiers. But on the other side, after the time of Constantine, when as the faith of Christ was receiued into the imperiall seat, we read of no emperor after the like sort destroyed or molested, except it were Iulianus or Basilius which epelled one Zeno, and was afterward expelled himselfe, or Valens. Beside these we reade of no emperor to come to vtter and decay, as the others before mentioned. Ex lib. hist. tripart.

And thus haue we in these summe collected out of the chronicles, the vnquiet & miserable state of the emperors of Rome, vntill the time of christian Constantine, with the examples no lesse terrible then manifest, of Gods seuere iustice vpon them, for their contemptuous refusing and persecuting the faith and name of Christ their Lord.

Moreouer, in much like sort and condition, if leasure of time or haste of matter would suffer me a little to digresse into more lower times, and to come more nere home, the like examples

I could also infer of this our countrie of England, concerning the terrible plagues of God against the churlish and vnthankfull refusing or abusing the benefit of his truth. First, we reade how that God stirred vp Gildas to preach to the old Britains, and to exhort them vnto repentance & amendment of life, and afore to warne them of plagues to come if they repented not. What auailed it? Gildas was laughed to scorne, and vnrepentant harts went forth to sin, and to offend the Lord their God. What followed? God sent in their enemies on euery side and destroyed them, & gaue the land to other nations. Not many yeeres past, God seeing idolatrie, superstition, hypocrisie, & wicked liuing vsed in this realme, called vp that godly learned man Iohn Wickliffe, to preach vnto our fathers repentance, and to exhort them to amend their liues, to forsake their papistrie and idolatrie, their hypocrisie, superstition, and to walke in the feare of God. His exhortations were not regarded, he with his sermons was despised, his bookes and he himselfe after his death were burnt. What followed? They slue their right king, and set vp three twong kings on a row, vnder whom all the noble bloud was slaine vp, and halfe the commons there to, that in France, and with their owne sword in fighting among themselues for the crowne, and the cities and townes decaied, and the land brought halfe to a wildernesse, in respect of that it was before. O dreadfull plagues of Gods vengeance! Since that time, euen of late yeeres, God once againe hauing pitie of this realme of England, raised vp his prophets, namely William Tindall, Thomas Bilney, Iohn Frith, doctor Barnes, Ierome Garret, Anthonie Person, with diuers others, which both with their writings and sermons earnestly laboured to call vs vnto repentance, that by this meanes the fierce wrath of God might be turned away from vs. But how were they intreated? How were their painefull labours regarded? They themselues were condemned and burnt as heretikes, and their bookes condemned and burnt as heresies. The time shall come, saith Christ, that whosoeuer killeth you, will thinke that he doth God high good seruice. Whether any thing since that time hath chanced to this realme worthie the name of a plague, let the godly iudge. If God hath deferred his punishment, or forgiuen vs these our wicked deeds, as I trust he hath, let vs not therefore be proud and high minded, but most humble thanke him for his tender mercies, and beware of the like vnthankfull and superstition, and made it a glorious church, if it be compared to the old forme and state. And now how gratefull receiuers we be, with what heart, studie and reuerence wee embrace that which he hath giuen, that I referre either to them that see our fruits, or to the sequele, which perchance time will declare. But this by the way of digression. Now to regresse againe to the state of the first former times. It remaineth, that as I haue set forth the iustice of God vpon these Roman persecutors: so now wee declare their persecutions raised vp against the people and seruants of Christ, within the space of three hundred yeeres after Christ. Which persecutions in number commonly are counted to bee tenne, besides the persecutions stirred vp by the Iewes in Hierusalem and other places against the apostles. In the which, first Saint Stephan the deacon was put to death, with diuers others mo, in the same rage of tyme either slaine, or cast into prison. At the doing whereof, Saul the same time plaied the boughtie Pharisie, being not yet conuerted, to the faith of Christ, whereof the history is plaine in the Acts of the apostles set forth at large by S. Luke.

Saint Stephan the first ringleader of al Christs martyrs.

After the martyrdome of this blessed Stephan, suffered next Iames the holy apostle of Christ, and brother of Iohn. Of which Iames, mention is made in the Acts of the apostles the twelfth chapter. Where is declared, how that not long after the stoning of Stephan, king Herod stretched forth his hand, to take and afflict certaine of the congregation: among whom Iames was one, whom he slue with the sword, &c. Of this Iames, Eusebius also inferreth mention, alleaging Clement, thus writing a memorable storie of him. This Iames (saith Clement) when he was brought to the tribunall seat, he that brought him (and was the cause of his trouble) seeing him to be condemned, and that he should suffer death: as he went to the execution, he being moued therewith in heart and conscience, confessed himselfe also of his owne accord to be a christian. And so were they led forth together, where in the way he desired of Iames to forgiue him that he had done. After that Iames had a little paused with him vpon the matter, turning to him; Peace (saith he) be to thee brother, and kissed him, and both were beheaded together, in the yere of our Lord thirtie and five.

Iudas brother of Iames, called also Thaddeus, and Lebeus, preached to the Edessens, and to all Mesopotamia, he was slaine vnder Augarus, king of the Edessens in Berito.

Thaddeus the apostle slaine.

Simon called Cananeus, which was brother to Iude aboue mentioned, & to Iames the younger, which all were the sonnes of Mary Cleopha, and of Alpheus, was bishop of Hierusalem after Iames, and was crucified in a citie of Egypt in the time of Traianus emperour, as Dorotheus recobeth. Sat Abdias writeth, that hee with his brother Iude, were both slaine by a tumult of the people in Suanir a citie of Parthis.

Simon Cananeus crucified.

Marke the euangelist, and first bishop of Alexandria, preached the gospell in Egypt, and there drawne with ropes vnto the fire, was burned, and afterward buried in a place called there Bucolus, vnder the raigne of Traianus emperour.

Marke the euangelist burned.

Bartholomeus is said also to preach to the Indians, and to haue conuerted the gospell of saint Matthew into their tongue, where he continued a great space doing many miracles. At last in Silvania a citie of greater Armenia, after diuers persecutions, he was beaten to bone with staues, then crucified, and after being excoriat, he was at length beheaded. Of Andrew the apostle and brother to Peter thus writeth Hierome in his book De catalogo scriptorum ecclesi. Andrew the brother of Peter (in the time & reigne of Vespasianus, as our ancestors haue reported) did preach in the foursceore yeere of our Lord Iesu Christ to the Scythians, Sogdians, to the Sarons: and in a citie which is called Angustia, where the Ethiopians doe now inhabit. He was buried in Patris a citie of Achaia, being crucified of Egeas the gouernour of the Epistle, for his preaching. Hitherto writeth Hierome, although in the number of yeres he seemeth a little to misse: for Vespasianus reached not to the foursceore yeere after Christ. But Bernard in his second sermon, and saint Cyprian in his booke De duplici martyrio, doe make mention of the confession and martyrdome of this blessed apostle, whereof partly out of these, partly out of other credible writers we haue collected after this manner: that, When as Andrew being conuertant in a citie of Achaia called Patris, through his diligent preaching had brought many to the faith of Christ: Egeas the gouernour hauing this, resorted thither, to the intent he might constraine as many as did not follow Christ to be God, by the whole consent of the senat, to doe sacrifice vnto the idols, and so giue diuine honor vnto them. Andrew thinking good at the beginning to resist the wicked counsell, and the doings of Egeas, went vnto him, saying in this effect vnto him: that, It behoued him which was iudge of men, first to know his iudge which dwelleth in heauen, and then to worship him being knowne, and so in worshipping the true God, to reuoke his mind from false gods and blind idols. These words spake Andrew to the counsell.

The words of Andrew to the counsell.

But he greatly therewith discontented, demanded of him whether he was the same Andrew that did ouerthrow the temple of the gods, and perswaded men of that superstitious sect, which the Romans of late had commanded to be abolished and reiected. Andrew did plainly affirme that the princes of the Romans did not vnderstand the truth, and that the sonne of God comming from heauen into the world for mans sake, hath taught and declared how those idols, whom they so honoured as gods, were not onely not gods, but also most cruell diuels, enemies to mankind, teaching the people nothing else but wherewith God is offended, and being offended turneth away and regardeth them not, and so by the wicked seruice of the diuell doe fall headlong into all wickednesse, and after their departing, nothing remaineth vnto them, but their euill deeds.

The reuerence of Andrew against idolatry.

But the proconsull esteeming these things to be as vaine, especially seeing the Iewes (as he said) had crucified Christ before, therefore charged and commanded Andrew not to teach and preach such things any more: or if he did, that hee should be fastened to the crosse with all speed.

Andrew abiding in his former mind very constant, answered thus concerning the punishment which he threatned: He would not haue preached the honour and glorie of the crosse, if hee had feared the death of the crosse. Wherevpon sentence of condemnation was pronounced, that Andrew teaching and enterprising a new sect, and taking away the religion of their gods, ought to be crucified. Andrew comming to the place, and seeing a crosse of the crosse prepared, did change neither countenance nor colour, as the vnbecillitie of mortall men is wont to doe, neither did his bloud shrinke, neither did he faile in his speech, his bodie fainted not, neither was his mind molested, his vnderstanding did not faile him, as it is the maner of men to do, but out of the abundance of his heart his mouth did speake; and feruent charitie did appeare in his words as kindled sparkes: he said, O crosse most welcome and long looked for; with a willing mind, toptully and destrouslie I come to thee, being the scholer of him which did hang on thee: because I haue been alwaies thy louer, and haue coueted to embrace thee. So being crucified, he perished by the ghost and fell on sleepe, the day before the kalends of December.

Matthew, otherwise named Leui, first of a publicane made an apostle, wrote his gospel to the Iewes in the Hebrue tongue, as recordeth Eusebius, lib. 3. 24. 39. lib. 5. ca. 8. ca. 10. Also Irænæus. lib. 3. cap. 1. Item Hieronymus in catalogo scrip. Ecclesiast. Concerning the doings and decrements of this blessed apostle and euangelist, diuers things be recorded by Julius Africanus, vnder the protected name of Abdias, also of Vincentius, Pertontius, and others, but in such sort, as by the contents may greatly be suspected, the matter not to lacke some craftie sorgerie, for the more establishment of latter decretals, and Romish doctrine, as touching meates, consecration of nunnes, the superstitious prescription of Lent fast, not only in abstaining from all flesh meats, but also from all matrimonial copulation betweene man and wife, during the said time of holy Lent. Philippus the holy apostle, after he had much laboured among the barbarous nations in preaching the word of saluation to them, at length he suffered as the other apostles did, in Hierapolis a citie of Phrygia, being there crucified and stoned to death, where also he was buried, and his daughters also with him. ## Of Iames the brother of the Lord thus we reade in the storie of Clement and Egesippus.

After that Festus had sent the apostle Paul to Rome after his appellation made at Cæsaria, and that the Iewes by the meanes thereof had lost their hope of perfourming their malitious vow against him conceiued, they fell vpon Iames the brother of our Lord, who was bishop at Jerusalem, against whom they being bent with like malice, brought him forth before them, and required him to denie before all the people the faith of Christ. But he otherwise then they all looked for, fréelie and with a greater constancie before all the multitude confessed Jesus to be the sonne of God, our Sauiour, and our Lord. Whereupon, they not being able to abide the testimony of this man any longer, because he was thought to be the wisest among them all, for the highnelle of diuine wisdome and godlinesse, which in liuing he declared, they killed him, finding the more opportunitie to accomplish their mischiefe, because the kingdome the same time was vacant. For Festus being dead in Iewry, the administration of that prouince was destitute of a ruler, and a deputie. But after that manner Iames was killed, the words of Clement doe declare, which writeth that he was cast downe from the pinacle of the temple, and being smitten with the instrument of a fuller, was slaine: but Egesippus which liued in the time next after the apostles, describeth the cause diligently in his fifth commentarie, after this maner as followeth.

Ex Clemente. Ex Egesippo in commentariis.

Iames the brother of our Lord toke in hand to gouerne the church after the apostles, being counted of all men from the time of our Lord to be a iust and perfect man. Many & diuers other Iameses there were besides him, but this was borne holy from his mothers wombe, he drunke no wine nor any strong drinke, neither did he eat any liuing creature, the rasor neuer came vpon his head, he was not anointed with oile, neither did he vse bath, to him onely was it lawfull to enter into the holie place, neither was he clothed with woollen cloth, but with linke, and hee onlie entred into the temple, falling vpon his knees, asking remission for the people, so that his knees by oft kneeling left the sense of feeling, being benummed and hardened like the knees of a camell. He was (for worshipping God and craning forgiuenesse for the people) called iust, and for the excellencie of his iust life named Oblias, which (if you doe interpret it) is the safegard and iustice of the people, as the prophets declare of him: therefore when as many of the heretikes which were among the people asked him what maner of doze Jesus should be, he answered that he was the Sauior. Wherof some do beleeue him to be Jesus Christ, but the afore said heretikes neither beleeue the resurrection, neither that any shall come, which shall render vnto euery man according to his works, but as many as beleeue, they beleeued for Iames his cause. When as many therefore of the princes did beleeue, there was a tumult made of the Scribes, Iewes and Pharisies, saying: It is dangerous lest that all the people doe looke for this Jesus, as for Christ. Therefore they gathered themselues together, and said to Iames: We beseech thee refraine the people, for they beleeue in Jesus as though he were Christ, we pray thee perswade them all which come vnto the feast of the passeouer of Jesus, for we are all obedient vnto thee, and all the people do testifie of thee that thou art iust, neither that thou doest accept the person of any man, therefore perswade the people that they be not deceiued in Jesus, and all the people and we will obay thee: therefore stand vpon the pillar of the temple, that thou maiest be seene from aboue, and that thy words may be perceiued of all the people, for to this passeouer all the tribes do come with all the countrie. And thus the forenamed Scribes and Pharisies did set Iames vpon the battlements of the church, and they cried vnto him & said: Thou iust man whom all we ought to obey, because this people is led after Jesus, which is crucified, tell vnto vs what is the doze of Jesus crucified. And he answered with a great voice, What do you aske me of Jesus the sonne of man, seeing that he sitteth on the right hand of God in heauen, and shall come in the clouds of the skie: But when many were perswaded of this, they glorified God vpon the witnesse of Iames, and said: Osanna in the highest to the sonne of Dauid. Then the Scribes & the Pharisies said among themselues, We haue done euil that we haue caused such a testimonie of Jesus, but let vs goe vp and let vs take him, that they being compelled with feare, may denie that faith. And they cried out, saying: O, O, this iust man also is seduced, and they fulfilled that scripture which is spoken of in Esay: Let vs take away the iust man, because he is not profitable for vs, wherefore let them eat the fruits of their works. Therefore they went vp to throw downe the iust man, and said among themselues: Let vs stone this iust man Iames, and they take him to smite him with stones, for he was not yet dead when he was cast downe. But he turning, fell bowne vpon his knees, saying: O Lord God, father, I beseech thee to forgiue them, for they know not what they doe.

Esay 3.

But when they had smitten him with stones, one of the priests of the children of Rechas, the sonne of Charobim spake to them the testimonie which is in Jeremie the prophet: Leaue off, what doe ye? The iust man praieth for you. And one of those which were present tooke a fullers instrument, wherewith they did vse to beat and purge cloth, and smote the iust man on his head, and so he finished his martyrdome, and they buried him in the same place, and his pillar abideth yet by the temple. He was a true testimonie to the Iewes and the Gentiles. And shortly after, Vespasianus the emperour destroying the land of Iewrie, brought them into captiuitie. These things being thus written at large of Egesippus, do well agree to those which Clement did write of him. This Iames was so notable a man, that for his iustice he was had in honour of all men, in so much that the wise men of the Iewes, shortly after his martyrdom, did impute the cause of the besieging of Jerusalem & other calamities which hapned vnto them, to no other cause, but vnto the violence and iniury done to this man. Also Josephus hath not left this out of his historie, where he speaketh of him after this manner: These things so chanced vnto the Iewes for a vengeance, because of that iust man Iames which was the brother of Jesus, whom they called Christ, for the Iewes killed him, although he was a righteous man.

Luke 23.

The same Josephus declareth his death in the same booke and chapter, saying: Cesar hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus the lieutenant into Jury: but Ananus the younger being bishop, and of the sect of the Sadduces, trusting that he had obtained a conuenient time, seeing that Festus was dead, and Albinus entred on his iourne, he called a councell, and calling many vnto him, among whom was Iames by name the brother of Jesu which is called Christ, he stoned them, accusing them as breakers of the law.

Whereby it appeareth, that many other besides Iames also at the same time were martyred and put to death among the Iewes, for the faith of Christ.

Martyrs.

A description of the ten first persecutions in the primitiue church, with a liuely portraiture of the variety of their torments.

These things being thus declared for the martyrdome of the apostles, and the persecution of the Iewes: now let vs (by the grace of Christ our Lord) comprehend with like breuitie, the persecutions raised by the Romans against the christians in the primitiue age of the church during the space of three hundred yeeres, till the comming of godly Constantine, which persecutions are reckoned of Eusebius, and by the most part of writers, to the number of tenne most specially.

The first tenne persecutions in the primitiue church.

Wherein marueilous it is to see and read the numbers incredible of christian innocents that were slaine and confounded, some one way, some another, as Rabanus saith, and saith truelie, Alij ferro perepti. Alij flammis exusti. Alij flagris verberati. Alij

Alij fame cruciati. Alij truncatis manibus, alijsque cæsis membris, spectaculum cõmunciæ nudi propter nomen Domini portantes, &c: that is, Some slaine with sword. Some burnt with fire. Some with whips scourged. Some stabbed in with forkes of iron. Some fastened to the crosse or gibbet. Some drowned in the sea. Some their shins plucht off. Some their tongues cut off. Some stoned to death. Some killed with cold. Some starued with hunger. Some their hands cut off, or otherwise dismembred, haue been so left naked to the open shame of the world, &c. Tellherof Augustine also in his booke De ciuit. 22. cap. 6. thus saith: Ligabantur, includebantur, cædebantur, torquebantur, verebantur, laniabantur, trucidabantur, multiplicabantur, nõ pugnantes pro salute, sed salutẽ contemnẽtes pro seruatore. Whose kinds of punishments although they were diuers, yet the maner of constancie in all these martyrs was one. And yet notwithstanding the sharpnesse of these so many and sundrie torments, and like cruelties of the tormentors, yet such was the number of these constant saints that suffered, or rather such was the power of the Lord in his saints, that as Hierom in his epistle to Cromatius & Heliodorus saith: Nullus esset dies qui nõ vltra quinque millium numerũ martyrum reperiri posset adscriptus, excepto die calẽdarũ Januarij: that is, There is no day in the whole yere, vnto which the number of fiue thousand martyrs can not be ascribed, except only the first day of Januarie.

The first persecution.

The first persecution.

Anno 67 Histor. eccle. lib. 2. cap. 24. 25. 2.

The first persecution was stirred vp by Nero Domitius, the sixth emperor before mentioned, about the yeare of our Lord thirtie six & seuen. The tyrannous rage of which emperor was so fierce against the christians (as Eusebius recordeth) Vsque adeò vt videres repletas humanis corporibus ciuitates, iacentes mortuos simul cum paruulis senes, fœminasque absque vlla sexus reuerentia nudata in publico reiectaque starent cadauera: that is, Insomuch that a man might then see cities lie full of mens bodies, theold there lying together with the yong, and the dead bodies of women cast out naked, without all reuerence of that sex in the open streets, &c. Likewise Dosius writing of the said Nero saith: that he was the first which in Rome did raise vp persecution against the christians, and not onely in Rome, but also through all the prouinces thereof, thinking to abolish and to destroy the whole name of christians in all places, &c. Whereunto accordeth moreouer the testimonie of Hieronie vpon Daniel, saying: that Many there were of the christians in those daies, which seeing the filthie abominations, and intollerable cruelties of Nero, thought that he should be antichrist, &c.

Oroſius. lib. 7.

Nero thought to be antichrist.

Saint Peter the apostle crucified at Rome.

In this persecution, among many other saints, the blessed apostle Peter was condemned to death, and crucified as some do write at Rome; albeit others denie, and not without cause, do doubt therof: comparing whole life and historie, because it is sufficiently described in the text of the gospell, and in the acts of saint Luke, chapter 4. 5. 12. I need not here to make any great repetition therof. As touching the cause & maner of his death, diuers there be which make relation, as Hierome, Egesippus, Eusebius, Abdias, & others, although they doe not all precisely agree in the time. The words of Hierome be these: Simon Peter the sonne of Jona, of the prouince of Galile, & of the towne of Bethsaida, the brother of Andrew, &c: after hee had been bishop of the church of Antioch, and had preached to the dispertion of them that beleeued, of the circumcision in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithinia, in the second yere of Claudius the emperor, (which was about the yeare of our Lord fortie and foure) came to Rome to withstand Simon Magus, and there kept the priestly chaire the space of fiue and twentie yeares, vntill the last yeare of the foresaid Nero, which was the fourteenth yeare of his reigne, of whom he was crucified, his head being bowne, and his feete vpward, himselfe so requiring, because he was (he said) vnworthie to be crucified after the same forme and maner as the Lord was, &c. Egesippus prosecuting this matter something more at large, and Abdias also (if any authoritie is to be giuen to his booke, who following not onely the sense, but also the very sonne of wordes of Egesippus in this historie, seemeth to be extracted out of him, & of other authors) saith, that Simon Magus being then a great man with Nero, and his president and keeper of his life, was required vpon a time to be present at the raising vp of a certaine noble yong man in Rome of Neroes kindred lately departed: whereas Peter also was desired to come to the reuiuing of the said personage. But when Magus in the presence of Peter could not do it, then Peter calling vpon the name of the Lord Jesus did raise him vp, and restored him to his mother, thereby the estimation of Simon Magus began greatly to decay, and to bee detested in Rome. Not long after the said Magus threatned the Romans that he would leaue the citie, and in their sight flie away from them into heauen. So the day being appointed Magus taking his wings in the mount Capitolinus, began to flie in the aire: but Peter by the power of the Lord Jesus brought him downe with his wings headlong to the ground, by the which fall his legs and ioints were broken, and hee there vpon died. Then Nero sorrowing for the death of him, sought matter against Peter to put him to death. Which when y people perceiued, they intreated Peter with much adoe that hee would flie the citie. Peter through their importunitie at length perswaded, prepared himselfe to auoid. But comming to the gate he saw the Lord Christ come to meete him, to whom he worshipping said: Lord whither dost thou go? To whom he answered and said, I am come againe to be crucified. By this Peter perceiuing his suffering to be vnderstanded, returned backe into the city againe, and so was he crucified in maner as is before declared. And this out of Egesippus.

Hieron. lib. de viris illustrib.

Peter hearing his wife going to his martyrdome (belike as he was pet hanging vpon the crosse) was greatly ioyous and glad thereof, who crying vnto him with a loud voice, and calling her by his name, bad her remember the Lord Jesus. Such was then (saith Eusebius) the blessed bond of marriage among the saints of God. And thus much of Peter.

Euseb. lib. 3. hist. eccle. cap. 30. Peters wife go to death for Christ. The wonder of Peter to his wife, going to death.

Paul the apostle.

Paul the apostle, which before was called Saul, after his great trauell and vnspeakeable labours in promoting the gospell of Christ, suffred also in this first persecution vnder Nero, and was beheaded. Of whom thus writeth Hieronie in his booke De viris illustribus. Paul, otherwise called Saul, one of the apostles, yet out of the number of twelue, was of the tribe of Beniamin, and of a towne of Jewrie called Giscalis, which towne being taken of the Romans, he with his parents fled to Tharsus a towne of Cilicia, afterward was sent by his parents to Jerusalem, and there brought vp in the knowledge of the law, at the feet of Gamaliel, and was at the death of Stephan a doer. And when he had received letters from the high priest to persecute the christians, by the way going to Damascus he was stricken downe of the Lords glorie, and of a persecutor was made a professor, an apostle, a martyr, a witnesse of the gospell, and a vessell of election.

Ex Hieronymo lib. de viris illustribꝰ.

Saul wrought by vnder Gamaliel. Saul a persecutor. Saul conuerted.

Among his other manifold labors and trauels in spreading the doctrine of Christ, he wan Sergius Paulus the proconsull of Cyprus to the faith of Christ, whereupon he take his name, as some suppose, turned from Saulus to Paulus. After he had passed through diuers places and countries in his laborious peregrinations, he toke to him Barnabas, and went vp to Jerusalem to Peter, James, and John, where he was ordained and sent out with Barnabas to preach vnto the Gentiles.

Saulus turned to Paulus.

Paul sent to the Gentiles.

And because it is in the acts of the apostles sufficiently comprehended, concerning the admirable conuersion, and consecration of this most worthie apostle, that which remaineth of the rest of his historie, I will here adde, how the said apostle Paul the 25. yeare after the passion of the Lord in the second yeare of Nero, at what time Festus ruled in Jewrie, was sent vp in bonds to Rome, where he remaining in his free hoskerie two yeares together, disputed daily against the Iewes, proouing Christ to be come. And here is to be noted, that after his first answere or purgation there made at Rome, the emperor Nero not yet fully confirmed in his empire, and yet not burthned out into those mischiefes which historyes report of him, hee was at that time by Nero discharged, and dismissed to preach the gospell in the west parts and about the coast of Italie, as he himselfe writing vnto Timothie, afterward in his second appreheision, in his second epistle witnesseth, saying: In my first purgation no man stood with me, but did all forsake me, the Lord lay it not to their charge. but the Lord stood with me and did comfort me, that the preaching of his word might proceed by me, and that all the Gentiles might heare and be taught, and I was deliuered out of the lions mouth, &c. In which place by the lion he plainly meaneth Nero. And afterward likewise saith: I was deliuered from the mouth of the lion, &c. And againe, The Lord hath deliuered me out from all euil workes, and hath saued me vnto his heauenly kingdome, &c: speaking this, because he perceiued then the time of his martyrdome to bee neare at hand. For in the same epistle before, he saith: I am now offered vp, and the time of my dissolution is aweth on.

Act. 28.

2. Tim. 4.

Thus then, this worthy preacher and messenger of the Lord, in the fourteenth yeare of Nero, and the same day in which Peter was crucified (although not in the same yeare as some write, but in the next yeare following) was beheaded at Rome for the testimonie of Christ, and was buried in the way of Ostia, the seuen and thirtith yeare after the passion of the Lord. He wrote nine epistles to seuen churches, to the Romans one, to the Corinthians two, to the Galathians one, to the Ephesians one, to the Philippians one, to the Colossians one, to the Thessalonians two. Moreouer he wrote to his disciples, to Timothie two, to Titus one, to Philemon one.

The epistles of saint Paul to seuen churches.

The epistle to the Hebrues.

The epistle which beareth the title to the Hebrues, is not thought to be his, for the difference of the stile and phrase, but either indged to be written of Barnabie, as Tertullian supposeth, or of saint Luke as others do thinke: or else of Clement afterward bishop of Rome, who as they say, was admonished with Paul, and compiling together his sayings and sentences, did phrase them in his stile and maner. Or else, as some do iudge, because S. Paul wrote vnto the Hebrues, for the obiections of his name among that people, therefore he dissembled, and concelled selled his name in the first entrie of his salutation, contrarie to his accustomed condition. And as he wrote to the Hebrues he being an Hebrue, so hee wrote in Hebrue, that is, his owne tongue more eloquently. And that is thought to bee the cause why it differeth from his other epistles, and is after a more eloquient manner translated into the Greeke then his other epistles be. Some also read the epistle written to Laodicea, but that is cryseled of all men. Thus much Hierome.

The epistle to Laodicea.

As touching the time and order of the death and martyrdome of S. Paul, as Eusebius, Hierome, Sabinus and other authors do but briefly passe ouer: so Abdias (if this booke be of any substantiall authoritie) speaking more largely of the same, doth say: that after the crucifying of Peter, and the ruine of Simon Magus, Paul yet remaining in free custodie, was dimitted and deliuered at that time from martyrdome by Gods permission, that all the Gentiles might be replenished with preaching of the gospell by him.

Abdias de vitis, lib. 2.

And the same Abdias proceeding in his storie, declareth moreouer, that as Paul was thus occupied at Rome, he was accused to the emperor, not onely for teaching new doctrine, but also for stirring up sedition against the empire. For this he being called before Nero, and demanded to shew the order and maner of his doctrine, there declared what his doctrine was. To teach all men peace & charitie, how to loue one another, how to prevent one another in honor; Rich men not to be puft in pride, nor to put their trust in their treasures, but in the liuing God; Poore men to be contented with food and rayment, and with their present state, Poore men to reioice in their povertie with hope; Fathers to bring vp their children in the feare of God, Children to obey their parents, Husbands to loue their wiues, Wiues to be subiect to their husbands, Citizens and subiects to giue their tribute vnto Cesar and to bee subiect to their magistrates, Maisters to be courteous not cruell to their seruants, Seruants to deale faithfully with their maisters: and this to be the sum of his teaching. Which his doctrine he received not of men nor by men, but by Iesus Christ, and the father of glorie, which spake to him from heauen, the Lord Iesus saying to him, that he should go and preach in his name, and that he should be with him, and would be the spirit of life to all that beleeued in him, and that whatsoeuer he did or said, he would iustifie it, &c. After that Paul had thus declared vnto the emperor, shortly after sentence of death was pronounced against him, that he should be beheaded. Vnto which execution then Nero sent two of his squiers, Ferega and Parthemius, to bring him word of his death. They coming to Paul, instructing them the people, desired him to pray for them that they might beleeue. Who told them y shortly after they should beleeue, and bee baptized at his sepulchre (as Abdias writeth.) This done, the souldiers came and led him out of the citie to the place of execution, where hee after his prayers made, gaue his necke to the sworde. Abdias reporteth, that as his head was stroken off, in stead of blood there did issue out white milke, and that at laying downe his head hee signed himselfe with the signe of a crosse in his forehead: which being found in no other historie, Abdias seemeth either to adde of his owne, or else to borrow out of the legend, as he doth many other things beside, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Although the same miracle of milke flowing out of his necke, is referred also vnto Ambrose, who in his sermon vpon Festo Petri & Pauli, (if it be not counterfeited) seemeth to affirme the same. Of the time and yeare when the blessed apostles did suffer, historie do not all agree. They that follow the common opinion, and the popes decrees say, that both Peter and Paul suffred both in one day and in one yeare: which opinion seemeth to be taken out of Dionysius bishop of Corinth. Hierom in his booke De viris illustr. affirmeth that they both suffred in one day, but he expresselly not the yeare. So doth Eusebius & Eutychius. Simon Metaphrastes bringeth in the opinion of some, which thinke that Paul suffred not with Peter, but after. Peter. Prudentius in his Peristephano, noteth that they both were put to death vpon the same day, but not in the same yeare, and saith that Paul followed Peter a yeare after.

A legend miracle.

The storie of Abdias suspected.

Abdias no barre about the time of their martyrdome.

Of this he trust Prudentius reporteth of Paul to suffer vnder Nero, and the yeare after Peter, then is it false which Hierome before testifieth. Peter to suffer in the last yeare of Nero.

Abdias mentioned, recordeth that Paul suffred two yeares after Peter. Moreouer, tht bee trew which Abdias saith, that after the crucifying of Peter, Paul remained in his free custodie at Rome, mentioned in the acts of the apostles, which was as Hierome witnesseth the third or fourth yeare of Nero, then must it be ten yeares betwixt the martyrdome of Peter and of Paul. for as much as it is by all writers confessed, that Paul suffred the fourteenth yeare, which was the last yeare of Nero. And so Abdias seemeth neither to agree with other authors, nor with himselfe. And thus much of the first persecution.

The second persecution.

The second persecution.

THe first Romane persecution beginning vnder Nero, as is aforesaid, ceased vnder Vespasianus, who gaue some rest to the pore christians. After whose raigne was moued not long after the second persecution, by the emperor Domitian brother of Titus. Of whom Eutropius and Orosius so write, that he first beginning mildly, afterward did so fierce outrage in pride intolerable, that he commanded himselfe to be worshipped as God, and that images of gold and siluer in his honour should be set vp in Capitolio. The chiefest nobles of the senators, either vpon enuie, or for their gods, he caused to be put to death, some openly, and some hee sent into banishment, there causing them to be slaine priuily.

Orosius lib. 7.

The tyrannie and intemperance of Domitian.

And as his tyranny was vnmerciable, so the intemperancie of his life was no lesse. He put to death all the nephews of Iuda, called the Lords brother, and caused to be forgot out, and to be slaine all that could be found of the flocke of Dauid (as Vespasian also did before him) for feare lest he were yet to come of the house of Dauid, which should enioy the kingdome.

Simeon bishop of Ierusalem crucified.

In the time of this persecutor, Simeon bishop of Ierusalem after other torments was crucified to death, whom Iustus afterward succeded in that bishoprike.

In this persecution Iohn the apostle an euangelist was exiled by the said Domitianus into Pathmos. Of whom diuers and sundrie memorable acts be reported in sundrie chronicles. As first how he was put in a vessell of boiling oile, by the proconsull of Ephesus. The legend and Beriander say, it was done at Rome. Isidorus also writing of him and comprehending many things in few words, declareth that hee turned certaine pieces of wood into gold, and stones by the sea side into margarits, to satisfie the desire of two, whom he had before perswaded to renounce their riches: and afterward they repenting that for worldly treasure they had lost heauen, for their sakes againe he changed the same into their former substance. Also how he raised vp a widow & certaine young man from death to life. Item how he dranke poison and it hurt him not, raising also to life two which had drunke the same before. These and such other miracles, although they may be true, and are found in Isidorus and other writers more, yet because they are no articles of our christian beleefe, I let them passe, and onely content my selfe with that which I read in Eusebius, declaring of him in this wise: that in the fourteenth yeare after Nero, in the second persecution, in the daies of Domitian, Iohn was banished into Pathmos for the testimonie of the word, in the yeare fourscore and seuenteene. And after the death of the said Domitian being slaine, and his acts repealed by the senate, Iohn was againe released vnder Nerua the emperor, and came to Ephesus the yeare ensuing. Where he continued vntill the time of Traianus, and there gouerned the churches in Asia, where also he wrote his gospell, and so lined till the yeare after the passion of our Lord the fiftie and eight, which was the yeare of his age one hundred and twentie.

Anno 97. Iohn banished. Iohn released out of banishment.

Moreouer, in the foresaid ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius, we reade that Iohn the apostle and euangelist, whom the Lord did loue, was in Asia, where he being returned out of Pathmos after the death of Domitian, gouerned the churches and congregations. Ireneus in his second booke thus writeth: And of him all the elders do witnesse, which were with Iohn the disciple of the Lord in Asia, that he spake and wrote these things, &c: for there he continued with them vnto the time of Traianus, &c. Also the said Ireneus, lib. 3. Hypothes. in like words declareth, saying: The church of the Ephesians being first founded by Paul, afterward beeing confirmed of Iohn (who continued in the same citie vnto the time of Traianus the emperor) is a true witnesse of this apostolicall tradition, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus moreouer noteth, both the time of this holy apostle, and also addeth to the same a certaine historie of him, not vnworthie to be remembred of such which delight in things honest and profitable. Of the which historie Sozomenus also in his commentaries maketh mention, the words of the author setting forth this historie be these: Heare a fable, and not a fable, but a true report which is told vs of Iohn the apostle, delivered and commended to our remembrance. After the death of the tyrant, when Iohn was returned to Ephesus, from the Ile of Pathmos, he was desired to resort to the places bordering nere vnto him, partly to constitute bishops, partly to dispose the causes and matters of the church, partly to ordaine and set such of the clergie in office, whom the Holy-ghost should elect. Whereupon, when he was come to a certaine citie not far off, the name of which also many bee yet remember, and had among other things commended the brethren, he looking more earnestly vpon him which was the chiefe bishop among them, beheld a young man mightie in bodie, and of beautifull countenance, and of a feruent mind: I commend this man (saith hee) to thee with great diligence, in the witnesse heere of Christ and of the church.

Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 23.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

A notable historie of Iohn the euangelist.

When the bishop had received of him this charge, and had promised his faithfull diligence therein against the second time, Iohn spake vnto him, and desired him in like maner and correlation as before. This done, Iohn returned againe to Ephesus. The bishop receiuing the yong man, commended and committed to his charge, brought him home, kept him & nourished him, and at length also did illuminate (that is) he baptized him, and in that time through his diligence, brought him into such order and towardnesse, that he committed vnto him the ouersight of a certaine cure in the Lords behalfe. The yong man thus hauing more his libertie, it chanced that certaine of his companions and old familiars being vile, dissolute and accustomed of old time to wickednesse, did ioyne in companie with him, him, who first brought him to sumptuous and riotous banquets, then inticed him forth with them in the night to rob and steale, after that, he was allured by them vnto greater mischiefes and wickednesse. Wherein by custome of time by little and little, he being more practised, and being of a good wit, and a stout courage, like vnto a wild or an vnbroken horse, leauing the right way and running at large without bridle, was caried headlong to the pitchmidste of all mischiefe and outrage. And thus being past all hope of grace, vtterly forgetting and reiecting the wholesome doctrine of saluation, which hee had learned before, began to set his mind vpon no small matters. And forasmuch as he was entred to farre in the way of perdition, hee feared not how further he proceeded in the same. And so allociating vnto him the companie of his companions, and felloin theeues, tooke vpon him to bee as head and captaine among them, in committing all kind of murther and felonie.

Let that wicked companie perish.

In the meane time it chanced that of necessitie Iohn was sent for to those quarters againe, and came. The causes being decided, and his businesse ended for, the which hee came, by the way meeting with the bishop afore specified, requireth of him the pledge, which in the witnesse of Christ and of the congregation then present he left in his hands to keepe. The bishop something amazed at the words of Iohn, supposing hee had meant of some money committed to his custodie, which he had not receiued, and yet durst not mistrust Iohn nor contrarie his knowledge, could not tell what to answere. Then Iohn perceiuing his doubting, and bitterly his mind more plainly: The yong man (saith hee) and the soule of our brother committed to your custodie, I doe require. Then the bishop with a loud voice sorrowing and weeping said, Hee is dead. To whom Iohn said, How and by what death? The other said, He is dead to God, for hee is become an euill man and pernicious, to bee briefe, a theefe: and now he doth frequent this mountaine with a companie of villaines and theeues like vnto himselfe against the church. But the apostle rent his garments, and with great lamentation said, I haue left a good keeper of my brothers soule, get me a horse, and let me haue a guide with me. Which being done, his horse and man procured, hasted from the church as much as he could, and comming to the same place was taken of theeues that watched. But hee neither flying nor refusing, said: I came for this same cause hither, lead me, laid he, to your captaine. So he being brought, the captaine all armed, fiercely began to looke vpon him: and eftsones comming to the knowledge of him, was stroken with confusion and shame, and began to fly. But the old man followed him as much as he might, forgetting his age and crying: My son why dost thou flie from thy father? an armed man from one naked, a young man from an old man? haue pitie on me my son and feare not, for there is yet hope of saluation. I will make an accompt for thee vnto Christ. I will die for thee if need bee, as Christ hath died for vs. I will giue my life for thee, beleeue me, Christ hath sent me. Hee hearing these things, first as in a maze stood still, and therewith his courage was abated. After that he had cast downe his weapons, by and by he trembled pea and wept bitterly: and comming to the old man embraced him, and spake vnto him with weeping (as well as he could) being euen then baptized afresh with teares, onely his right hand being hid and couered. Then the apostle, after that he had promised and firmely ascertained him that he should obtaine remission of our Saniour, and also prayed, laide his hands vpon his knees, and kissed his murthering right hand, which for shame hee durst not shew before, as now purged through repentance, brought him to the congregation. And then he had prayed for him with continuall praier and daily fastings, and had comforted and confirmed his mind with many sentences, went not from him (as the author reporteth) before hee had restored him to the congregation againe, and made him a great example and triall of regeneration, and a token of the visible resurrection.

Moreouer, the foresaid Irenæus in lib. 3. cap. 3. and Eusebius lib. 3. cap. 2. and lib. 4. cap. 14. 4. professing the historie of Iohn, beside those in these words, saying: That there were certaine which heard Polycarpus say, that Iohn the disciple of our Lord going into Ephesus to be washed, seeing Cerinthus within, hee leaped out of the bath vnbathed, because hee feared the bath should haue fallen, seeing that Cerinthus an enemie to the truth was within. Such feare had the apostles (saith Irenæus) that they would not communicate a word with them that adulterate the truth.

An example of the apostle to flie the companie of the wicked.

And forasmuch as we are here in hand with the storie of Iohn the blessed euangelist, commeth in matter & occasion not giuen by him, but taken of others, of a great doubt and difficultie, such as hath occupied all the catholike, subtill, illuminate, and seraphicall doctors of the popes catholike church, these fiue hundred yeares. The difficultie is this: That for so much as auricular confession hath been, and is set necessarie in the popes catholike church for an holy and necessarie sacrament, extending vniuersally to all and singular creatures christian: here then riseth a question, Who was our ladies confessor, or ghostly father? But that is decreed and confessed with full consent of all the catholikes to bee S. Iohn. Whosoeuer therefore doubteth of this, is straight waies ipso facto an heretike. This then to determined, ariseth another question of doubt, that S. Iohn our Ladie was without al originall sinne, and also actuall or mortall: that need then had he of any confessor? Or what should the confessor vnto him? For if hee had confessed any sinne, then the had none: then had the made him a false a liar, and so had sinned indeed. Here therefore (gentle reader) in this perplexitie these our illuminate doctors stand in need of thine aid to helpe at a pinch. Magnus Albertus the great Diuine, denieth not, but that she indeed, although most pure, yet was confessed to his ghostly father, to keepe the obseruance of the law appointed for: such as had that need, which she had not. And therefore (saith hee) necessarie it was that shee should confesse with mouth. But then here is to bee asked, What did she say in her confession, when she had nothing to confesse? To this Albertus answereth againe, and telleth vs plainly what she said in her confession, which was this: That she had receiued that great grace, not Ex condigno, that is, Not of any dignitie of hir owne, but yet notwithstanding of congruitie. And this was it (saith Albert) that shee said in her confession. Albert. cap. 74. super euang. Missus est, &c.

A catholike question concerning auricular confession.

Solution.

Albert. Abidens cap. 17.

Moreouer, to helpe this case out of all doubt, commeth in famous Thomas of Watring, and thus leseth the knot, much after like effect, saying: that As Christ, although he did owe nothing to the law, yet notwithstanding receiued circumcision, to giue to others example of humilitie and obedience: in like maner would our Ladie (hee) her selfe obeient to the obseruance of the law, albeit there was no cause why shee had any need thereof. And thus hast thou (gentle reader) this doubtful question moued and solued, to the intent I would reueale to thee some part of the deepe diuinitie of our catholike maisters, that haue ruled and gouerned the church in these their late papish daies.

S. Thomas par. 3. quæst 37. art. 5.

But breaking off this matter, to returne againe where we left, that is, to this foresaid second persecution vnder Domitianus. In which persecution, besides these afore mentioned, and many other innumerable godly martyrs, suffering for the like testimony of the Lord Iesus, was Flauia the daughter of Flauius Clemens, one of the Romane consuls, which Flauia with many others was banished out of Rome into the Ile Pontia, for the testimonie of the Lord Iesus, by the emperor Domitianus. Eusch. lib. 3.

Flauia the daughter of Flauius Clemens, banished for the testimonie of Christ. Ex Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 19.

This Domitianus feared the comming of Christ as Herod did, and therefore commanded them to be killed which were of the flocke of Dauid in Iewrie. There were remaining aliue at that time certaine of the Lords kindred, which were the nephues of Iude, that was called the Lords brother after the flesh. These when the lieutenant of Iewrie had brought vp to Domitian to be slaine, the emperor demanded of them, whether they were of the flocke of Dauid. Which when they had granted, he asked againe, what possessions, and what substance they had. They answered, that they both had no more betweene them in all, but nine and thirtie acres of ground, and how they gat their liuing, & sustained their families with the hard labors of their hands, shewing forth their hands vnto the emperor, being hard and rough, worne with labors, to witnesse that to bee true which they had spoken. Then the emperor inquiring of them concerning the kingdome of Christ, what maner of kingdome it was, how and when it should appeare: They answered that his kingdome was no worldly nor terren thing, but an heauenly and angelicall kingdome, and that it should appeare in the consummation and end of the world, what time he comming in glorie, should iudge the quicke and the dead, and render to euery one according to his deseruings. Domitian the emperor, hearing this (as the saying is) did not condemne them, but despising them as vile persons let them goe, and also staied the persecution then moued against the christians. They being thus discharged and dismissed, afterward had the gouernment of churches, being taken for martyrs, and as of the Lords flocke, and so continued in good peace till the time of Traianus. Hæc Egesip. & Eusch. lib. 3. cap. 20.

The kingdome of Christ not of this world.

By this those here recited may appeare, what were the causes why the emperors of the Romane monarchie did so persecute the christians: which causes were chiefly these: feare and hatred. First, feare for that the emperors and senate of blind ignorance, not knowing the maner of Christs kingdome, feared & misdoubted lest the same would subuert their emperie, (like as the pope thinketh now that the gospel will ouerthrow his kingdome of maiestie) and therefore sought they all meanes possible, how by death and all kinds of torments vtterly to extinguish the name and memorie of the christians. And thereupon seemeth to spring the old law of the Romane senate: Non debere dimitti christianos, qui semel ad tribunal venissent, nisi propter eum merit: that is, that the christians should not bee let goe, which were once brought to the iudgment seate, except they changed their purpose, &c. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 21. Secondly, hatred, partly for that this world of his owne naturall condition hath euer hated and maliced the people of God, from the first beginning of the world. Partly againe, for that the christians being of a contrarie nature and religion, seruing onely the true liuing God, despised their false gods, shake against their idolatrous woolshippings, and many times stopped the power of Satan, working in their idols. And therefore Satan the spirite of this world, stirred vp the Romane princes and blind idolaters to beare the more hatred and spite against them.

Upon these causes, and such like, rose up these malicious slanders, false surmises, infamous lies, and slanderous accusations of the heathen idolaters against the christian seruants of God, which incited the princes of this world the more to persecute them: for what crimes soeuer malice could inuent, or rash suspition could minister, that was imputed to the christians, as that they were a people incestuous, that in the night in their conuentikes, putting out their candels, they ran together in all filthie manner, that they killed their owne children, that they vsed to eate mans flesh, that they were seditious and rebellious, that they would not sweare by the fortune and prosperitie of Cesar, that they would not adore the image of Cesar in the market place, that they were pernicious to the emperie of Rome. Briefly, whatsoeuer mishappened to the citie or prouinces of Rome, either famine, pestilence, earthquake, warres, wonders, vnseasonableneste of weather, or what other euils so euer happened, it was imputed to the christians, as Iustinus recordeth. Duer and beside all these, a great occasion that thirred vp the emperors against the christian, came by one Publius Tarquinius the chiefe prelate of the idolatrous sacrifices, and Damertinus the chiefe gouernour of the citie, in the time of Traianus, who partly with monie, partly with sinister and pestilent counsell, partly with infamous accusations (as witnesseth Sauclerus) incensed the minde of the emperor so much against Gods people.

Dublius Tarquinius & Damertinus persecutors.

Also among these other causes aboue said, crept in some peece of couetousneste withall (as in all other things it doth) in that the wicked promoters and accusers for lucre sake, to haue the possessions of the christians, were the more readie to accuse them to haue the spoile of their goods.

Ex Iust. Mart. in 2. Apolog. The forme of inquisition against the christians in the old time.

Thus hast thou christian reader, first the causes declared of these persecutions; secondly, the cruell lais of their condemnation; thirdly, now heare more what was the forme of inquisition, which was (as is witnessed in the second apologie of Iustinus) to this effect, that they should sweare to declare the truth, whether they were in deede christians or not: and if they confessed, then by the law the sentence of death proceeded. Iust. apol. 2.

The crueltie of tyrants in killing of christians in mein.

Neither yet were these tyrants and organs of Satan thus contented with death onely, to bereaue the life from the bodie. The kinds of death were diuers, and no lesse horrible than diuers. Whatsoeuer the crueltie of mans inuention could deuise for the punishment of mans body, was practised against the christians, as partly I haue mentioned before, and more appeareth by the epistle sent from the brethren of France, hereafter following. Traitie traines, outcries of enemies, imprisonments, stripes & scourgings, drawings, tearings, stonings, plates of iron laid vnto them burning hot, deepe dungeons, racks, strangling in prisons, the teeth of wild beasts, gridirons, gibbets and gallowes, tolling vpon the hornes of bulls: moreuer, when they were thus killed, their bodies laid in heapes and dogs there left to keepe them, that no man might come to burie them, neither would any prayer obtaine them to be interred and buried. Ex epistola fratrum Viennensium ac Lugdunensium, &c.

Ex epist. fratrum Viennensium & Lugdunensium, ad fratres per Asiam & Phrygiam scripta.

And yet notwithstanding, for all these continuall persecutions, and horrible punishments, the church of the christians daily increased, deeply rooted in the doctrine of the apostles, and of men apostolicall, and watered plentifully with the blood of saints, as saith Niceph. lib. 3. Whereof let vs heare the worthy testimony of Iustinus Martyr in his dialogue with Tryphon. And that none saith he can terrifie or remoue vs which beleeue in Iesus, by this it daily appeareth: for when we are slaine, crucified, cast to wilde beasts, into the fire, or giuen to other torments, yet we go not from our confession: but contrarie, the more crueltie and slaughter is wrought against vs, the more they be that come to pietie and faith by the name of Iesus: no otherwise then if a man cut the vine tree, the better the branches grow. For the vine tree planted by God & Christ our sauiour, is his people. Hæc Iust.

Ex Nicephoro. lib. 3. cap. 22.

Ex Iustin. Martyr. in dialogo cum Tryphon.

The church increaseth by persecution.

¶ To comprehend the names and number of all the martyrs that suffered in all these ten persecutions (which are innumerable) as it is impossible, so it is hard in such barietie and diuersitie of matter to keepe such a perfect order and course of yeares and times, that either some be not left out, or that euery one be reduced into his right place, especially seeing the authours themselues, whom in this present worke we follow, do diuersitie dissagree both in the times, in the names and also in the kind of martyrdome of them that suffered. As for example, where the common reading and opinion of the church, and the epistles decretall do take Anacletus to succeed after Clement, next before Euaristus: contrarie Eusebius lib. 3. & lib. 5. cap. 6. making no mention of Cletus but of Anacletus, saith that Euaristus succeeded next to Clement. Likewise Rufinus and Epiphanius speaking nothing of Anacletus, make mention of Linus and of Cletus, next before Clement, but say nothing of Anacletus: whereby it may appeare that Cletus and Anacletus were both one. Sabellicus Aenead. 7. lib. 2. speaketh of Linus and of Cletus, and saith that they were ordeined helpers vnder Peter, while he laboured in his apostleship abrode, and so Linus bishop of Rome.

Cletus and Anacletus both one.

faith also Marianus Scotus: contrarie Irenæus, lib. 3. contra hæref. speaketh of Anacletus, making no mention of Cletus. Whereby it may appeare by the way, what credit is to be giuen to the decretall epistles, whom all the latter histories of the pope his church do follow in this behalfe, as Platina, Antoninus, Vincentius, Iacobus in supplemento, Simoneta, Iustinus, with others, declare of Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, Euaristus, Alexander, bishops of Rome, that they died martyrs: Eusebius in his ecclesiasticall historie writing of them, maketh thereof no mention.

Clement a bishop counted a martyr.

And first as touching Clement (whom Marianus Scotus calleth the first bishop of Rome after Peter) they say that hee was sent out in banishment of Traianus, beyond Pontus, with two thousand christians, where he opened to them a liuelyuing, which in the wilderneste were condemned to the mines. Afterward being accused to the emperor, he was throwne into the sea with a millstone fastened about his neck, and that not long after his body was cast vp and buried (as Platina saith) at the place where the well was made. Some say it was found full in the daies of pope Nicholas the first: Faciol. tempor. But so soone as I find or this martyrdome no sure relation in the ancient authors, but onely in such new writers of latter times, which are wont to paint out the liues and histories of good men, with fained additions of forged miracles, therefore I count the fame of lesse credit, as I do also certaine decretall epistles, falsely (as may seeme) ascribed and attributed to his name. Eusebius in his third booke, writing of Clement, giueth no more of him, but thus: After he had gouerned the church of Rome nine yeares, the said Clement left the succession thereof to Euaristus.

The lies of martyrs painted out with fained miracles.

Euaristus bishop of Rome and martyr.

Of which Euaristus next bishop of Rome, thus we find in Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Peter and Paul (saith hee) committed the charge of that church to Linus: after whom came Anacletus, then succeeded Clemens, next to Clemens followed Euaristus, after whom came Alexander, and then Sixtus the sixth bishop of Rome after y apostles: after Sixtus sat Telesphorus, then Higinus, then Pius, then Aniceius. And lohen Soter tolde the place after him, then the twelfth bishop of Rome was Eleutherius. Thus after Clement followed (as is said) Euaristus in the second or third yeare of Traianus, as saith Eusebius: or as Nicephorus saith, the fourth yeare of the said emperor. But howsoeuer the count of yeares standeth, little or nothing remaineth of the acts and monuments either of this, or of other bishops of Rome in those daies. Whereby it may appeare that no great account was then made of Romane bishops in those daies, whose acts & deeds were then either so lightly reputed, or so slenderly committed to histoie. Notwithstanding, certaine decretall epistles are remaining, or rather thrust vpon vs in their names, containing in them little substance of any doctrine, but altogether stuffed with lawes, inhibitions, and stately decrees, little to the purpose, and lesse sauoring of the nature of that time then present. Amongst whom also are numbred the two epistles of this Euaristus.

The decretall epistles.

And when hee had giuen these orders, and had made six priests, two deacons, and fiue bishops, for sundrie places (saith the storie) he suffered martyrdome. But what kind of death, or what cause he suffered, what constancie hee shewed, what was the order or conuersation of his life, is nothing touched, and seemeth therefore the more to be doubted that which our new histories doe say: because the old ancient writers haue no remembrance thereof, which otherwise would not haue passed such things ouer in silence, if they had been true. Againe, neither do the authors fully agree in the time of his martyrdome, which Sauclerus writeth to be in the last yeare of Traianus: but Platina thinketh rather that hee suffered vnder Hadrianus. Faciol. temporum referreth it to the third yeare of Hadrian, Volaterranus to the beginning of the reigne of Hadrian. Contrarie, Eusebius comming neare to the simple truth (as seemeth) doth affirme that Euaristus decreed Clement in the third yeare of Traianus, so giuing to him nine yeares, it should follow thereby that Euaristus deceased the twelfth yeare of Traianus.

Naucle. ge. 1. Platina. Volaterran. Antropo. lib. 22. Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 24.

Alexander bishop of Rome and martyr.

After whom succeeded next Alexander in the gouernance of that church, of whose time and death the like discrepance is among the writers. Marianus Scotus saith he was the fourth bishop from Peter: but that could not be. Some say hee was the sixt & some the seuenth: but they likewise were deceiued, for the matt part all doe grant Sixtus to be the first: Damasus affirmeth that he was in the reigne of Traian. And how can that be, when the said Damasus affirmed before that Euaristus his predecessor suffred in the last yeare of Traian, and then the bishoppike stood at least a moneth void, except hee meane that the said Alexander succeeded Euaristus in the last yeare of Traianus. But then how can that stand with Beda and Rufinus Scotus, which say that he suffered vnder Traianus, or with Otho Frisingensis, which saith he suffred the fourth yeare of Hadrian, when he had been bishop ten yeares, by the generall consent of most writers.

Authors disagree.

They which write of the deeds and doings of this blessed bishop, as Bergomensis Antonius, Equelinus, and such as follow them, declare that he had conuerted a great part of the senators to the faith of Christ, amongst whom was Hermes a great great man in Rome, whose sonne being dead, Alexander raised againe to life, and likewise restored sight to his maid being blind. Hadrian the emperor then absent hearing this, sent word to Aurelianus gouernour of Rome, to appehend Alexander, with Euentius and Theodulus, otherwise called Theodorus, as Platina saith, his two deacons, & Hermes, and to commit them to ward with Quirinus the tribune: which being done, as their storie recordeth, Alexander, inclosed in a diuers prison from Hermes: notwithstanding, by the guiding of an angell though three doores with three locks a peece, was brought with candle light to the lodging of Hermes; and so returning to the prison againe, cured the daughter of Quirinus his keeper, named Balbina, by reason whereof the said Quirinus, with his whole houshold were all baptised, and suffered also for the faith of Christ.

Alexander, Eleutherius, Sixtus, Hyginus with Pius and Aniceius lawfully but sometime liued, martyrs.

Ex Platina in vita Alexandri.

Thus then (saith the storie) about the second yeare of Hadrian, Aurelianus the ruler tooke Alexander the bishop, with Hermes, his wife, children, and his whole houshold, to the number of one thousand two hundred and fiftie, & threw them in prison. And not long after the said Alexander, with Euentius his deacon, and Hermes and the rest were burned in a furnace. The diuersities an other deacon of Alexander, seeing and rebuking the cruelte of the tyrant, suffered also the same martyrdome.

Quirinus also the same time (as saith Antoninus) hauing first his tongue cut out, then his hands and feet, afterward was beheaded and cast to the dogs: Quintinus saith that he was beheaded and cast into Tiber in the raigne of the emperor Claudius: but that cannot bee, albeit Platina maketh relation but onely of Alexander with his two deacons aforesaid, declaring moreouer, that in the time of this bishop, Saphira of Antioch, and Sabina a Romane suffered martyrdome.

Saphira and Sabina martyrs. Ex Florileg.

Plinius secundus wrote to Traian to stop the persecution.

Flosilegius, the author of Flores historiarum, affirmeth that Alexander bishop of Rome was beheaded seuen miles out of Rome, where he lieth buried, in the yeare one hundred and fiue: but that it agreeth not with the chronicles aboue recited. Eusebius recordeth of him no more, but that in the third yeare of Hadrian, he ended his life and office, after he had been bishop ten yeares.

Diuers miracles are reported of this Alexander, in the canon legends, and lines of saints; which as I denie not but may be true, so because I cannot auouch them by any graue testimonie of ancient writers, therefore I dare not affirme them, but doe refer them to the authors and patrons thereof, where they are found. Notwithstanding, what soeuer is to be thought of his miracles, this is to bee affirmed and not doubted, but that he was a godly and vertuous bishop.

The ordinances of Euaristus. Dist. 3. cap. Diaconi.

And as I say of his miracles, the like iudgement also I haue of the ordinances both of him and of Euaristus his predecessor, testified in the popes decrees by Gratianus, as Dist. 93. cap. Diaconi, where is said that Euaristus diuided diuers titles in the citie of Rome to the priests, also ordained in euerie citie seuen deacons to associate and assist the bishop in his preaching, both for his defence, and for the witnesse of truth. Notwithstanding, sp probable coniectures might stand against the authoritie of Gratianus and his decrees, here might be doubted whether this absolute ordination of priests was first forbidden by Euaristus, and whether the institution of priests was first by him brought in or not: wherein an instance may be giuen to the contrarie, that this institution seemeth to take his first beginning at the councell of Chalcedon, and of pope Telesphorus the councell of Placentia. In the which councell of Chalcedon the words of the canon (making no mention of Euaristus at all) doe expresse forth, that any ecclesiasticall person either priest or deacon should be ordained absolutely, otherwise the imposition of hands without some proper title of the partie ordained, to stand voide and frustrate, &c. And likewise Urbanus in the councell of Placentia doth decree the same, alleaging no name of Euaristus, but the statutes of former councels.

Ex dist. 90. cap. Neminem.

Ibidem, cap. Sanctorum.

Moreouer in the time of Euaristus, the church then being vnder terrible persecutions, was diuided into no peculiar parishes or cures, whereby any title might rise, but was scattered rather in corners and deserts, where they could best hide themselues. And as the church of Rome in those daies was not diuided into seuerall parishes or cures (as I suppose) so neither was then any such open or solemne preaching in churches, that the assistance or testimonie of seuen deacons either could auaile among the multitude of the heathen, or else needed amongst the christian secret congregations. Againe, the constitution of seuen deacons seemeth rather to spring out of the counsel of Neocesaria long after Euaristus, where it was appointed that in euery citie there it neuer so small, there should bee seuen deacons after the rule. And this rule the said councel taketh out of the booke of the acts of the apostles, making no word or mention of Euaristus at all. Dist. 93. But these (as is said) bee but onely coniectures, not denying that which is commonly received, but onely shewing what may be doubted in their epistles decretall.

Ex dist. 93. cap. Diaconi.

The institution of Archpriests first instituted. De consecrat. Dist. 3.

Now whether it seemeth to be true that is recorded and reported of Alexander, wherof we read De consecr. dist. 3: that he should be the first founder and finder of holy water mixt with salt, to purge and sanctifie them vpon whom it is sprinkled. The words of the dist. be these: Aquam sale conspersam in populis benedicimus, vt ea cuncti aspersi sanctificentur & purificentur, quod omnibus sacerdotibus faciendum esse mandamus, &c: that is, We bleste water mixt with salt among the people, that all men being sprinkled therewith may be sanctified and purified: and this we command all priests to doe, &c.

The mixing of water with the wine in the chalice.

The opinion is also, but how true I haue not to affirme, that by him first was ordained water to be mixt with wine in the chalice.

Item, that by him was brought in the piece of the masse canon, beginning: Qui pridie, &c. And thus much of these forenamed bishops of Rome, martyred in the daies of Traian and Hadrian.

Qui pridie put in the masse canon.

The third persecution.

The third persecution of the church. Anno 100

Betweene the second Romane persecution and the third, was but one peare, vnder the emperor Nerua, after whom succeeded Traianus: and after him followed the third persecution. So the second and the third are noted of some to bee both one, hauing no more difference but one peare betweene them. This Traianus, if we take well vpon his politike and ciuill gouernance, might seeme (in comparison of others) a right worthie and commendable prince, much familiar with inferiors, and so behauing himselfe toward his subiects, as hee himselfe would haue the prince to be to him, if he himselfe were a subiect. Also he was noted to be a great obseruer of iustice, in so much that when hee ordained any pretor, giuing to him the sword hee would bid him vse the sword against his enemies in iust causes: and if he himselfe did otherwise then iustice, to vse then his power against him also. But for all these vertues toward christian religion he was impious and cruell, who caused the third persecution of the church. In the which persecution Plinie the second, a man learned and famous, seeing the intollerable slaughter of christians, and moued therewith to pitie, spake to Traianus of the pitifull persecution: certifying him that there were many thousands of them daily put to death, of which none did any thing contrarie to the Romane lawes worthie persecution: fauning that they vsed to gather together in the morning before day, and sing hymnes to a certaine God whom they worshipped, called Christ. In all other their ordinances they were godly and honest. Wherby the persecution by commandement of the emperor was greatly staied and diminished. The forme and copie of which epistle of Plinie I thought here not inconuenient to set downe, as followeth.

The tell mouse of the heathen of the christians.

The epistle of Plinie, an heathen philosopher, to Traian the emperor.

The epistle of Plinie to Traianus.

IT is my propertie and maner (my soueraigne) to make relation of all those things vnto you wherein I doubt. For who can better, either correct my slacknesse, or instruct mine ignorance then you? I was neuer yet present my selfe at the examination and execution of these christians; and therefore what punishment is to be administred, and how farre, or how to proceed in such inquisitions, I am plaine ignorant, not able to resolue in the matter whether any difference is to be had in age and person, whether the yong and tender ought to be with like cruelty intreated as the elder and stronger, whether repentance may haue any pardon, or whether it may profit him or not, to denie which hath been a christian, whether the name onely of christians without other offenses, or whether the offenses ioyned with the name of a christia ought to be punished. In the meane season, as touching such christians as haue been presented vnto me, I haue kept this order. I haue inquired the second and third time of the, whether they were christians, menacing the with feare of punishment; and such as did perseuere, I commanded to execution. For thus I thought, that what soeuer their profession was, yet their stubbornesse and obstinacie ought to be punished. Whether they were also of the same madneste, whom because they were citizens of Rome, I thought to send them backe againe to the citie. Afterward, in further processe & handling of this matter, as the sect did further spread, so the more cases did thereof ensue.

There was a libel offred to me bearing no name, wherein was contained the names of many which denied themselues to bee christians, contented to do sacrifice with incense & wine to the gods, and to your image (which image I for that purpose caused to be brought) & to blaspheme Christ: whereunto none such as were true christians indeed could be compelled, and those I did discharge and let goe. Othersome confessed that they had been christians, but afterward denied the same, &c: affirming vnto me the whole summe of that sect or error to consist in this, that they were wont at certaine times appointed, to conuent before day, and to sing certaine hymnes to one Christ their God, and to confederate among themselues to abstaine from al theft, murther, and aduulterie, to keepe their faith and to defraud no man: which done, then to depart for that time, and afterward to resort againe to take meate in companies together both men and women one with another. and yet without any act of euill.

In the truth whereof to be further certified whether it were so or

or not, I caused two maidens to be laid on the racke, and with torments to bee examined of the same. But finding no other thing in them, but onelie leaud and immoderat superstition, I thought to forbeare of further inquire, till time that I might be further aduertised in the matter from you, for so the matter seemed vnto me worthie and needfull of aduisement, especiallie for the great number of those that were in danger of your statute. For verie manie there were of all ages and states, both men and women, which then were and more are like hereafter to incur the same perill of condemnation. For that infection hath crept not onelie in cities, but villages also and burroughs about, which seeneth that it may be staied and reformed. For as much as we see in manie places that the temples of our gods which were wont to be desolate, begin now to be frequented, and that they bring sacrifices from euerie part to be sold, which before verie few were found willing to buie them. Whereby it maie easilie be coniectured, what multitudes of men may be amended, if space and time be giuen them, wherein they may be reclamed.

The answere of Traian to Plinies letter.

THe act and statute, my Secundus, concerning the causes of the christians which yee ought to follow, ye haue rightly executed. For no such generall law can be enacted, wherein all speciall cases particularlie can be comprehended. Let them not be sought for, but if they be brought and conuicted, then let them suffer execution: so notwithstanding, that whosoeuer shall denie himselfe to be a christian, and that he do it vnfainedlie in open audience, & do sacrifice to our gods, howsoeuer he hath beene suspected before, let him be released vpon promise of amendment. Such libels as haue no names, suffice not to anie iust crime or accusation, for that should giue both an euill president, neither doth it agree with the example of our time.

Tertullian writing vpon this letter of Traianus aboue prefixed, thus saith: O sentence of a confused necessitie. He would not haue them to be sought for, as men innocent, and yet causeth them to be punished as persons guilty. And thus the rage of that persecution ceased for a time, although not withstanding many naughtie disposed men and cruell officers there were, which vpon false pretense to accomplish their wicked minds, ceased not to afflict the christians in diuers prouinces; and especially if any occasion were giuen neuer so little for the enemies to take hold, or if any commotion were raised in the prouinces abroade, by and by the fault was laid vpon the christians. As in Hierusalem after that the Emperor Traianus had sent downe his commandement, that whosoeuer could be found of the stocke of Dauid, he should be inquired out and put to death. Vpon this diligence was vniting, saith, that certaine sectaries there were of the Iewish nation, who accused Simeon the bishop then of Hierusalem and some of Cleophas to come of the stocke of Dauid, and that he was a christian. Of the which his accusers it happied also (saith the said Egesippus) that certaine of them likewise were apprehended and taken to be of the stocke of Dauid, and so right rustlie were put to execution themselues, which sought the destruction of others. As concerning Simeon the blessed bishop, the foresaid Egesippus thus writeth, that Simeon the lords nephue, then he was accused to Attalus the proconsull, by the malicious sect of the Iewes, to be of the line of Dauid, and to be a christian, was scourged, during the space of many daies together, being of the age of an hundred and twenty yeares. In which his martyrdome he indured so constant, that both the consull and all the multitude did marueil to see him of that age so constantlie to suffer, and so at last being crucified, finished his course in the Lord, for whom he suffered, as partly before also is recorded.

The death and martyrdome of Symeon.

In this persecution of Traianus aboue specified (which Traianus next followed after Nerua) besides the other afore mentioned, also suffered Phocas bishop of Pontus, whom Traianus, because he would not doe sacrifice to Neptunus, caused to be cast into a hot limeskine, and afterward to be put into a scalding bath, where the constant godly martyr, in the testimony of Christ, ended his life, or rather entered into life. In the same persecution suffered also Sulpitius and Severinianus, two Romans; whose wiues are said to be Euphrosina and Theodora, whom Sabina did conuert to the faith of Christ, and after were also martyred. Of which Sabina Iacobus Philippus author of the booke called Supplementum, reporteth that in the mount of Auentine in Rome, she was beheaded of Clepidus the gouernour, in the daies of Hadrian. Vnder whom also suffered Seraphia a virgin of Antioch, as Hermannus witnesseth.

The fourteined authors Antonius and Equilius make mention moreouer of Nereus and Achilleus, who in this persecution of Traiane, had the crowne of martyrdome, being put to death at Rome. Eusebius in his fourth booke, cap. 26. maketh mention of one Saggaris, who about the same time suffered martyrdome in Asia, Seruilius Paulus being then proconsull in that prouince.

Saggaris martyr.

In this persecution, beside many others, suffred the blessed martyr of Christ Ignatius, who vnto this date is had in famous reuerence among verie manie. This Ignatius was appointed to the bishoppike of Antioch next after Peter in succession. Some do saie, that he being sent from Syria to Rome, because he preached Christ, was giuen to the wild beasts to be deuoured. It is also said of him, that when he passed through Asia, being vnder the most strict custode of his gardeners, he strengthned and confirmed the parishes through all the cities as he went, both with his exhortations and preaching of the word of God: and admonished them especiallie and before all other things, to beware and shun those heresies risen vp, and springing newlie among them, and that they should cleaue and sticke fast to the tradition of the apostles, which he for their better safegard, being about to denounce or put in writing, thought it a thing verie necessarie to trauell in. And thus when he came to Smyrna, where Polycarpus was, he wrote one epistle to the congregation of Ephesus, wherein he made mention of Onesimus their pastor, and an other he wrote to the congregation of Magnesia, being at Smyrne, wherein also he forgetteth not Dama their bishop. Also another he wrote to the congregation of Tralles, the gouernor of which citie at that time he noteth to be one Polybius. Unto which congregation he made an exhortation, lest they refusing martyrdome, should lose the hope that they desired.

Yet it shall be verie requisit that I allege somewhat thereof to the declaration of this matter. He wrote therefore as the words lie, in this sort. From Syria (saith he) euen till I came to Rome, had I a battell with beasts, as well by sea as land, both date and night, being bound in the midest of ten cruell libards (that is, the companie or band of the souldiers) which the more benefits that they receiued at my handes became to much the worse vnto me. But I being exercised and now well acquainted with their iniuries, am taught euerie daie more and more: but hereby am I not yet iustified. And would to God I were once come to the beasts, which are prepared for me, which also I wish with gaping mouths were readie to come vpo me, whom also I will prouoke that they without delaie make deuoure me, and forbeare me nothing at all, as those whom before they haue not touched or hurt for feare! And if they will not tarie, if they be prouoked, I will then inforce them against my selfe. Pardon me I praie you. How much beneficiall it is to me, I know. Now begin I to be a scholer, I force or esteeme no liuelie things, nor yet inuisible things, so that I maie get or obtain Christ Iesu. Let the fire, the gallowses, the deuouring of wild beasts, the breaking of bones, the pulling asunder of my members, the bruising or prestling of my whole bodie, and the torments of the diuell of hell it selfe come vpon me, so that I maie win Christ Iesus.

The wordes of Ignatius. The strict handling of Ignatius.

The notable constancie and burning zeale to Christ in this blessed martyr, to be marked.

And these things wrote he from the foresaid citie vnto the congregations which he haue recited. And when he was euen now iudged to be throwne to the beasts, hee spake for the burning desire that he had to suffer, that time he heard the lions roaring: I am the wheat of God, saith he, of Christ, I shall be ground with the teeth of wilde beasts, that I may be found pure bread. He suffered in the eleuenth yeare of Traian the Emperor. Hæc Eusebius & Hieronym.

Ex Hier. lib. de viris illustr.

Besides this godlie Ignatius, manie Christians also were put to death in the same persecution, as appeareth by the letter of Plinius Secundus aboue recited, written vnto the emperour. Hierome in his booke intituled De viris illustribus maketh mention of one Publius bishop of Athens, who for the faith of Christ, the same time during this persecution was put to death and martyred.

NExt after this Traianus succeded Hadrian the emperor, vnder whom suffered Alexander the bishop of Rome, with his two deacons Eucntius and Theodorus: also Hermes and Quirinus with their families, as late before was declared.

Alexander bishop of Rome martyr. Eucntius and Theodorus deacons. Hermes. Quirinus.

It is signified moreouer in the histories, that in the time of this Hadrian, Zenon a noble man of Rome with ten thousand two hundred and three were slaine for Christ. Henricus de Erfordia, and Bergomensis, lib. 8. make mention of ten thousand in the dales of this Hadrian to be crucified in the mount Ararath, crowned with crosiones of thorne and thrust into the sides with sharpe darts, after the example of the Lords passion, whose captains (as Antoninus and Vincentius in spec. histor. declare) were Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, and Carcerius, &c. Whether this Zozie be the same with the other aboue of Zenon or not, it is doubted. As touching the miracles done, and the speaking of the angell, I refer the certaintie thereof to Vincentius, and such other like authors, where more things seeme to be told then to be true.

Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, Carcerius, with ten thousand martyrs.

There was one Eustachius a captaine, whom Traianus in time past had sent out to warre against the Barbarians. After he had by Gods grace ballantlie subdued his enemies, and now was returning home with victorie; Hadrianus by meeting him in his iourney to bring him home with triumph, by the way first would do sacrifice to Apollo for the victorie gotten, willing also Eustachius to do the same with him. But when Eustachius could by no meanes thereto be enforced, being Eustachius with his wife and children: martyred for Christ.

ing brought to Rome, there with his wife and children, suffred martyrdome vnder the foresaid Adrian. It were a long processe here to recite all the miracles contained or rather suspected in this storie of this Eustachius concerning his conuersion and death. How the crucifix appeared to him betweene the hornes of an hart. Of the sauing of his wife from the shipmen. Of one of his sonnes saued from the lion, the other saued from the wolfe. Of their miraculous preseruation from the wild beasts, from the torments of fire mentioned in Bergomensis, Vincentius, and others. All which as I find them in no ancient records, so I leaue them to their authors, and compilers of the legends.

We read also of Faustinus and Iobita, citizens of the citie of Isyria, which suffred martyrdome with like grieuous torments. At the sight whereof one Calocerius seeing their so great patience in so great torments, cried out with these words: Verè magnus Deus christianorum: that is, Verily great is the God of christians. Which words being heard, forthwith he was apprehended, and being brought to the place of their execution, was made partaker of their martyrdome. Ex Ant. Equilin.

The storie of Nicephorus maketh mention of Anthia a godly woman, who committed her sonne Eleutherius to Anicetus bishop of Rome, to be brought vp in the doctrine of christian faith, who afterwards being bishop in Apulia, was there beheaded with his foresaid mother Anthia, Onomast.

Likewise Symphorosa the wife of Getulus the martyr, with her seuen children, is said about the same time to suffer: who first was much and often beaten and scourged, afterwards was hanged vp by the haire of her head; last hauing an huge stone fastened vnto her, was throwne headlong into the riuer, and after that her seuen children in like manner, with sundrie and diuers kinds of punishment diuerslie martyred by the tyrant.

The storie of S. Hermannus and Antoninus, and others, report of Sophia, with her three children also; also of Seraphia and Sabina, to suffer vnder the said emperor, about the peace of our Lord one hundred and thirtie.

Sophia with her three children martyred.

As concerning Alexander bishop of Rome, with his two deacons, also with Hermes, Quirinus, Saphira, and Sabina, some writers, as Bede, and Marianus Scotus record, that they suffered vnder Traianus. Others againe, as Onuph. Frising. with like more, repoit that they suffered in the fourth yeare of this emperor Adrian, but of these martyrs sufficiently hath been said before.

While Adrian the emperor was at Athens, hee purposed to visit the countrie of Elusina, and so did: where he sacrificing to the Gentiles gods, after the maner of the Grecians, had giuen free leaue and libertie, whosoeuer would, to persecute the christians. Whereupon Quadratus a man of no lesse zeale excellent, as of famous learning, being then bishop of Athens, and disciple of the apostles, or at least succeeding incontinent the age of the apostles, and following after Publius (who a little before was martyred for the testimonie of Christ) did offer vp and exhibit vnto Adrian the emperor a learned and excellent apologie in the defence of the christian religion. Wherein hee declared the christians, without all iust cause or desert, to bee so cruelly intreated and persecuted, &c. The like also did Aristides another no lesse excellent philosopher in Athens, who for his singular learning and eloquence being notified to the emperor, and comming to his presence, there made before him an eloquent oration. Moreouer, he did exhibit vnto the said emperor a memorable apologie for the christians, so full of learning and eloquence, that as Hierome saith, it was a spectacle and admiration to men in his time, that loued so fine wit and learning. Diuers and beldes these, there was also another named Serenus Granius a man of great nobilitie, who likewise did write verie pithie and graue letters to Adrian the emperor, shewing and declaring therein to be consonant with no right nor reason, for the blood of innocents to bee giuen to the rage and furie of the people, and so to bee condemned for no fault, onely for the name and seat that they followed.

Quadratus bishop of Athens offereth an apologie of christian doctrine.

Aristides a philosopher of Athens, defendeth before the emperor the religion of Christ.

Thus the godwisdo of God being moued with the prayers and constant labour of these so excellent men, so turned the heart of the emperor, that he being better informed concerning the order and profession of the christians, became more fauourable vnto them. And immediatly vpon the same directed his letters to Minutius Fundanus (as is partly before mentioned) proconsull of Asia, willing him from henceforth to exercise no more such extremitie against the christians, as to condemne any of them, hauing no other crime obiected against them but only their name. The copie of which his letter, because that Iustin in his apologie doth alleage it: I thought therefore to expresse the same in his owne words as followeth.

The emperor writeth for the christians.

The letter of Adrian the emperor to Minutius Fundanus.

IHaue receiued an epistle written vnto mee from Serenus Granius, our right worthie and welbeloued, whose office you doe now execute. Therefore I thinke it not good to leaue this matter without further aduisement and circumspection to passe, lest our subiects be molested, and malicious sycophants boldned and supported in their euill. Wherefore if the subiects of our prouinces doe bring forth any accusation before the iudge against the christians, and can proue the thing they obiect against them, let them doe the same, and no more, and other wise for the name onely, not to inpeach them, nor to crie out against them. For so, more conuenient it is, that if any man will be an accuser, you to take the accusation quietly, and iudge vpon the same. Therefore, if any shall accuse the christians, and complaine of them as malefactors, doing contrarie to the law, then giue you iudgement according to the quality of the crime. But notwithstanding whosoeuer vpon spite and malicious suggestions shall commenie or enuill against them, see you correct and punish that man for his vnordinat and malicious dealing.

The letter of Adrian to the emperor Antoninus Pius to the commons of Asia.

Thus by the mercifull prouidence of God, some more quiet and rest was giuen to the church, although Hermannus thinketh these Adrian dates did not verie long continue, but that the emperor changing his edict, began to renue againe persecution against Gods people, albeit this sound eth not to bee so by the words of Melito in his apologie to Antoninus hereafter ensuing. In the meane time this is certaine, that in the dates of this Adrian, the Iewes rebelled againe and spoiled the countrie of Palestina. Against whom the emperor sent Iulius Severus, who ouerthrew in Iurie fiftie castles, and burnt and destroyed nine hundred and fourescore villages and townes, and slue of the Iewes fiftie thousand: with famine, sickenesse, sword, and fire, Iurie was almost desolate. But at length Adrian the emperor, which otherwise was named Aelius, repared and enlarged the citie againe of Ierusalem, which was called after his name Aeliopolis, or Aelia Capitolina, the inabitance whereof he granted onely to the Gentiles, and to the christians, forbidding the Iewes vtterly to enter into the citie.

Rebit from persecution.

The second destruction of the Iewes. Ierusalem rebuilded and inlarged. Some write that the place where Christ was crucified, was taken into the walls. Ierusalem called by a new name Aelia Capitolina.

After the death of Adrian, who died by bleeding at the nose, succeeded Antoninus Pius, about the yere of our Lord, one hundred and fourtie, and raigned twentie and three yeares, who for his clemencie and modest behauiour, had the name of Pius, and is for the same in histories commended. His saying was, that he had rather saue one citizen, then destroy a thousand of his aduersaries. At the beginning of his raigne, such was the state of the church, as Adrian his predecessor had left it, as in which, although there was no edict set forth to persecute the christians: yet the tumultuous rage of the heathen multitude for the causes aboue specified, did not cease to disquiet and afflict the quiet people of God, imputing and ascribing to the christians whatsoeuer misfortune happened contrarie vnto their desires: moreouer inuenting against them all falle crimes and contumelies whereof to accuse them. Wherefore whereof, diuers there were in sundrie places much molested, and some put to death: albeit, as it is to be supposed, not by the consent of the emperor, who of nature was so mild and gentle, that either hee raised vp no persecution against the christians, or else he some staied the same being moued. As well may appeare by his letter sent downe to the countries of Asia, the tenor whereof here insueth.

Antoninus Pius an emperor. Anno 140

The epistle of Antoninus Pius to the commons of Asia.

EMperor and Cæsar, Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune eleuen times, consull three, vnto the commons of Asia greeting. I am very certaine that the gods haue a care of this, that they which be such, shal be knowne, and not lie hid. For they doe punish them that will not worship them more then you, which so sore vex and trouble them, confirming therby the opinion which they haue conceiued, and doe conceiue of you, that is, to be wicked men. For this is their ioy and desire, that when they are accused, rather they couet to die for their God, then to liue. Whereby they are victorers, and doe ouercome you, giuing rather their liues, then to be obedient to you, in doing that which you require of them. And here it shall not be inconuenient to aduertise you of the earthquakes, which haue and do happen among vs, that when as the sight of them you tremble and are afraid, then conferre your case with them. For they vpon a sure confidence of their God, are bold and feareless, much more then you: who in all the time of this your ignorance, both doe worship other gods, and neglect the religion of immortalitie, & such christians as worship him, thy you do driue out, and persecute them vnto death. Of these and such like matters many presidents of our prouinces did write to our father of famous memorie heretofore. To whom hee directed his answere againe, willing them in no case to molest the christians, except they were found in some trespasse preiudicial against the empire of Rome. And to me also many there be, which write, signifying their mind in like manner. To whom I haue answered again, to the same effect and manner as my father did. Wherefore, if any hereafter shall offer any vexation or trouble, to such, hauing no other cause, but onely for that they are such, let him that is appeached, be released and discharged free, yea although he be found to be such (that is a christian) and let the accuser sustaine the punishment, &c.

This godly edict of the emperor was proclamed at Ephesus, in the publike assemblie of al Asia, whereof Melito also bishop of Sardis, who flourished in the same time, maketh mention in his apologie written in defence of our doctrine to M. Antoninus Verus, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall appeare. By this meanes then the tempest of persecuti on in those daies began to bee appeased, through the mercifull providence of God, which would not haue his church vtterly to bee ouerthrowne, though hardly yet to grow.

The fourth persecution.

M. Antonius Verus emperor. Anno 162

After the decease of the foresaid quiet and mild prince Aurelius Antonius Pius (who among all other emperors of that time make the most quiet end) followed his sonne M. Antoninus Verus, with Lucius his brother, about the yeare of our Lord one hundred threescore and three, a man of nature more fierce and seuere. And although in studie of philosophie, and in ciuill gouernment no lesse commendable: yet toward the christians sharpe and fierce, by whom was moued the fourth persecution of the Nero. In whose time a great number of them which truely professed Christ, suffred most cruell torments and punishments, both in Asia and France. In the number of whom was Polycarpus, the worthie bishop of Smyrna, who in the great rage of this persecution in Asia, seuering many other most constant saints was also martyred. Of whose end and martyrdome I thought it there not conuenient to commit to histosie, so much as Eusebius declareth to be taken out of a certaine letter or epistle, written by them of his owne church to the brethren of Pontus: the tenor of which epistle here followeth.

Polycarpus, the blessed martyr bishop of Smyrna.

Ex euseb. lib. Eccles. hist. cap. 15. Hieron. in catalogo.

The congregation which is at Smyrna, to the congregation which is at Philemilium, and to all the congregations throughout Pontus, mercie to you, peace and the loue of God our father, and of our Lord Iesu Christ, be multiplied. Amen. We haue written vnto you brethren of those men which haue suffred martyrdome, and of blessed Polycarpus, which hath ended and appealed this persecution as it were by the shedding of his owne blood. And in the same epistle, before they enter into further matter of Polycarpus, they discourse of other martyrs, describing what patience they abode and shewed in suffering their torments: which was so great and admirable, saith the epistle, that the lokers on were amazed seeing and beholding how they were so scourged & whipped, that the inward veines and arteries appeared, yea euen so much that the verie intrailes of their bodies, their bowels and members were seene, and after that, were set vpon sharpe shels taken out of the sea, egged, and sharpe, and certaine nailes and thornes for the martyrs to go vpon, which were sharpened and pointed, called Obelisci. Thus suffered they all kind of punishment and torment that might be deuised: and lastly, were throwne vnto the wilde beasts to be deuoured. But especially in the foresaid epistle mention is made of one Germanicus, how hee most worthilie perseuered and ouercame by the grace of God, that feare of death which is ingraffed in the common nature of all men, whose notable patience and sufferance was so notable that the whole multitude wondering at them bewed marry of God, for this his so bold constancie, and also for the singular strength and vertue proceeding of the whole multitude of the christians. began suddenly to cry with a loud voice, saying: Destroy the wicked men, let Polycarpus be sought for. And whilest a great vproze and tumult began thus to be raised vpon those cries, a certaine Phrygian named Quintus, lately come out of Phrygia, who seeing and abhorring the wild beasts, and the fierce rage of them, of an ouer light mind betraied his own safetie. For to the same letter of him both report, that hee, not reuerently, but more maliciously then was requisite, together with others rushed into the iudgement place, and so being taken, was made a manifest example to all the beholders, that no man ought rashly and vnreuerently with such boldnesse to thrust in himselfe, to intermeddle in matters wherewith hee hath not to doe.

Germanicus a most constant martyr.

Quintus a Phrygian too hardie & bold.

But now we will surceasse to speake more of them, and return to Polycarpus, of whom the foresaid letter consequently declareth as followeth: How that in the beginning, when hee heard of these things, was nothing at all afraid nor disquieted in mind, but purposed to haue taried still in the citie, till being persuaded by the intreatie of them that were about him (which desired him instantly that he would conuey himselfe away) bid himselfe in a grange or village not farre off from the city, & there abiding with a few more in his companie, did nothing else (night nor day) but abode in supplication, wherein he made his humble petition for the preseruing of peace into all the congregations throughout the world. For that was his accustomed manner so to doe. And as he was thus making his praiers three daies before he was apprehended, in a vision by night he saw the bed set on fire vnder his head, and suddenly to be consumed. And when he awaked, he told by and by and expounded vnto them that were present his vision, and told them before what thing should come to passe, that is, how that in the fire hee should lose his life for Christs cause. It is further mentioned, that when they were hard at hand, which so narrowly sought for him, that he was inforced for the affection and loue of his brethren to flie into another village, to which place notwithstanding within a little while after the pursuers came, and when they had taken a couple of children that dwelt thereabouts, they so beat one of them with whips, that by the bewraying or confession of him they were brought into the same where Polycarpus was. And they say that the pursuers making no great haste to enter, found him in the vppermost place of the house, from whence hee might haue escaped into other houses, if hee would; but this hee would not doe, saying: The will of God bee done. Furthermore, when hee knew that they were come, as the said historie theweth, hee came downe, and spake vnto them with a cheerfull and pleasant countenance, so that it was a wonder to see those which a while agone knew not the man, now beholding and viewing his comelie age, and his graue and constant countenance, lamented that they had so much employed their labour, that so aged a man should be apprehended. To conclude, hee commanded that straight way without any delay the table should be laid for them, and perswaded them that they would eate and dine well, and required of them boldly, that he might haue an houres respit to make his prayers. Which thing after it was granted, he arose and went to pray, so being replenished with the grace of God, that they which were present, and hearing the prayers that he made, were astonied at it, and now many of them were sorie that so honest an godly an aged man should be put to death.

After this, the foresaid epistle or letter, proceeding the history, addeth more as followeth: After hee had made an end of his prayers, & had called to his remembrance all those things which euer happened vnto him, and to the vniuersall catholike church throughout all the world (whether they were small or great, glorious or else inglorious) and that the houre was now come in which they ought to set forward, they set him vpon an asse, and brought him to the citie vpon a solemne feast day. And there met him Herarchus Herodes, and his father Nicetes, which causing him to come by into the chariot where they sat, perswaded him and said: What hurt I pray thee shall come thereof to thee, if thou say (by the way of satisfaction) My lord Cesar, and do sacrifice, and thus to saue thy selfe? But he at the beginning made them none answere, till that when they inforced him to speake, he said: I will not doe as ye counsell me I should. When as they saw he could not be perswaded, they gaue him very rough language, and of purpose molested him, that in going downe the chariot from them, he might hurt or breake his legs. But he forcing nothing light of the matter, as though he had felt no hurt, went merie and diligently forward, making haste vnto the place appointed. And when there was such noyse in the place of execution, that he could not be heard but of fewe, there came a voice from heauen to Polycarpus, as he was going into the stage or appointed place of iudgement, saying: Be of good cheere Polycarpus and play the man. No man there was, which saw him that spake, but very many of vs heard his voice. And when he was brought in, there was a great noise made by them which understood that Polycarpus was apprehended. The proconsul asked him then that he was come, whether his name was Polycarpus or not: And when he said, yea it was, he gaue him counsel to deny his name, & said vnto him: We good vnto thy selfe, and fauour thine old age: and many other such like words spake he vnto him, as is their vse and maner. Perswade, saith he, by the emperors good fortune, take pentance matter for thou with vs: Destroy these naughtie men. Then Polycarpus looking with constant countenance the whole multitude which was in the place appointed, and giuing a great sigh, looked vp to heauen, saying: Thou, then it is that wilt destroy these wicked naughtie men. And the proconsul thus being earnestly in hand with him, said: Take thine oth, and I will discharge thee, defie Christ. Polycarpus answered: Fourescore and six yeares haue I been his seruant, yet in all this time hath hee not so much as once hurt me: how then may I speake euill of my king and sauiour my Lord, which hath thus preserued me? Then the proconsul againe inforced him and said: Sweare thou I aduise thee by Cesars prosperitie. Polycarpus replied: If thou require of me this fond word of vaine boasting, feining not to know (as thou saiest) who I am, I doe thee to wit that I am a christian: and if thou desire to know the doctrine of christianitie, appoint a day, and thou shalt heare. Perswade the people vnto this, said the proconsul. Truely, saith Polycarpus, I haue thought it my part thus to say vnto you, for so much as we are commanded to giue vnto the gouernors and powers ordained of God, the honour meete and due to them, and not hurtfull vnto vs: but as for those, I doe iudge them vnworthie to purge my selfe vnto them. Hereupon the proconsul stod vp: I haue, saith hee, wilde beasts to whom I will throw thee, vnlesse thou take a better waie. Whereunto Polycarpus answered: Let them come, we haue determined with our selues that wee will not by repentance turne vs from the better way to the worse: but rather rather conuenient it is, that a man turne from things that be euill, vnto that which is good and iust. Against saith the proconsull, I will tame thee with fire, if that thou set not by the wilde beasts, nor yet repent. Then said Polycarpus; You threaten me with fire which shall burne for the space of an houre, and shall be within a little while after put out and extinguished; but thou knowest not the fire of the iudgement that is to come and of euerlasting punishment, which is reserued for the wicked and vngodly. But why make you all these delaies? giue me what death soeuer ye list. These and many other such like things being by him spoken, he was replenished with ioy and boldnesse, and his countenance appeared so full of grace and fauour, that not only he was not troubled with those things which the proconsull spake vnto him, but contrarily the proconsull himselfe began to be amazed and sent his crier, which in the middle of the stage was commanded to crie thrie times; Polycarpus hath confessed himselfe to bee a christian: which words of the crier were no sooner spoken, but that all the whole multitude both of the Gentiles and Iewes inhabitting at Smyrna, with a vehement rage and loud voice cried; This is that doctor or teacher of Asia, the father of the christians, and the destroyer of our gods, which hath instructed a great number, that our gods are not to be worshipped: and after this they cried vnto Philip the gouernour of Asia, and required him that he would let loose the lion to Polycarpus. To whom he made answere that he might not so do, because he had alreadie his prey. Then they cried againe all together with one voice that hee would burne Polycarpus aliue. For it was requisite that the lyon which he fain'd concerning his pillow or bolster should be fulfilled: which when he had some burnt, as he was in his prayer, hee turned himselfe vnto the faithfull sort which were with him, saying by the way of prophesie, It will so come, that I shall bee burned aliue. And the proconsull had no sooner spoken, but it was out of hand performed. For why? the multitude by and by brought out of their shops, workehouses, and barns, wood and other like matter for that purpole, and specially the Iewes were most seruiceable for that matter, after their wonted manner.

And thus the pile being laid, and that he had now put off his gaunts and vndons his girdle, and was about to pull off his shoes, which he had not done before, for that all the faithfull sort among themselues strued (as it were) who should first touch his bodie at their farewell, because for the good conuersation of his life, yea, from his yonger age, hee was had in great estimation of all men. Therefore straight way those instruments which are requisite to such a bonefire, were brought vnto him, and when they would haue nailed him to the stake with iron hoopes, hee said, let me alone as I am, for he that hath given me strength to suffer and abide the fire, shall also giue power, that without this your prouision of nailes, I shall abide, and stirre not in the middest of this fire ov pile of wood. Which thing when they heard, they did not naile him, but bound him. Therefore when his hands were bound behind him, euen as the chiefest ram taken out of the flocke, hee was sacrificed as an acceptable burnt offering to God, saying: O Father of thy welbeloued and blessed Sonne Iesus Christ, by whom we haue attained the knowledge of thee, the God of Angels and powers, and of euerie creature, and of all iust men which liue before thee, I giue thee thankes, that thou hast vouchsafed to grant me this day that I may haue my part amongst the number of the martyrs in the cup of Christ, vnto the resurrection of eternall life both of bodie and soule, through the operation of the holy Spirit; among whom I shall be this day received into thy sight for an acceptable sacrifice: and as thou hast prepared, and reuealed the same before this time, so thou hast accomplished the same, which cannot lie, O thou most true God. Wherefore I in like case for all things praise thee, bleste thee, and glorifie thee by our euerlasting bishop Iesus Christ, to whom be glorie euermore. Amen.

And as soone as he had ended this word Amen, and finished his prayer, the tormentors began to kindle the fire, and as the flame flashed out vehemently, we to whom it was giuen to discerne the same, saw a marueilous matter, which were also to this purpose preserued, that we might shew the same to others. For the fire being made like to a rose or vaut of a house, and after the manner of a shipmans saile, filled with winde, compassed about the bodie of the martyr as with a certaine wall, and hee in the middle of the same, not as flesh that burned, but as gold and siluer when it is tried in the fire. And surely we smelt a sauour so sweet as if myrrhe or some other pretious balme had giuen a sent. At the last, when those wicked persons saw that his bodie could not be consumed by fire, they commanded one of the tormentors to come to him, and thrust him thorow with his sword. Which being done, so great a quantitie of blood ranne out of his bodie, that the fire was quenched therewith, and the whole multitude marueiled that there was so much diuersitie betweene the infidels and the elect of whom this Polycarpus was one, being a disciple of the apostles, and a prophetical instructor of our times, and bishop of the catholike church of Smyrna: for what word soeuer he spake, both it was and shall be accomplished. But the subtill and enuious aduersarie, when he saw the worthinesse of his martyrdome, and that his conuersation euen from his yonger yeares could not be reproued, and that he was adorned with the crowne of martyrdome, and had now obtained that incomparable benefit, gaue in charge, that we should not take and diuide his bodie, for feare lest the remnants of the dead corps should be taken away, and so worshipped of the people. Whereupon diuers whispered Nicetas the father of Herod, and his brother Alces in the eare, to admonish the proconsull, that in no case he should deliuer his bodie, lest (saith he) they leaue Christ and begin to worship him. And this spake they because the Iewes had giuen them secret warning, and prouoked them thereunto, who also watched vs that we should not take him out of the fire: not being ignorant how that we neuer at no time to forsake Christ, which gaue his life for the saluation of the whole world (as many I meane as are elected to saluation by him) neither yet that we could worship any other. For why? him we worship as the Sonne of God, but the martyrs do we loue as disciples of the Lord (and that worthilie) for their abundant loue towards their king and master, of whom we also desire and wish to be companions, and to be made his disciples. Which therefore the centurion saw and perceiued the labour of the Iewes, the corps being laid abroad, they burnt the same, as was their manner to do.

Thus good Polycarpus with twelue others that came from Philadelphia suffered martyrdom at Smyrna: which Polycarpus specially aboue the rest is had in memorie, so that he in all places among the Gentiles is most famous. And this was the end of this worthie disciple of the apostles, whose historie the brethren of the congregation at Smyrna haue written in this their epistle as is aboue recited.

Irenæus in his third booke against heresies, the third chapter, and Eusebius in his fourth booke and fourteenth chapter of his ecclesiasticall historie reporteth this worthie saying of Polycarpus: This Polycarpus (saith he) meeting at a certaine time Marcion the heretike, who said to him; Doest thou not know me? made answere; I know that thou art the first begotten of Satan. So great feare what euill might ensue thereof had the disciples of the apostles, that they would not speake to them whom they knew to be the deuisers of the verity, euen as Paul saith: The heretike after the first and second admonition, shun and auoid, knowing that he which is such one, is peruerte or froward, and damneth himselfe. This most holy confessour and martyr of Christ Polycarpus suffered death in the fourth perfecution after Nero, when Marcus Antoninus, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus reigned, in the yeare of our Lord, one hundred threescore and seuen, as Vrspergensis writeth, in the yeare one hundred threescore and ten, as Eusebius witnesseth in his chronicles, the seuenth before the kalends of Februarie.

Of Germanicus mention is made aboue in the 15 chapter of Polycarpus, of whom writeth Eusebius lib. 4. cap. 15. noting him to be a yong man, and most constantly to persuere in the profession of Christs doctrine, whom when the proconsull went to perswade to remember his age, and to fauour himselfe, being in the flower of his age, he would not be allured; but constantly and boldly, and of his owne accord incited and prouoked the wilde beast to come vpon him, and to deuour him, to be deliuered more speedily out of this wretched life. Hæc Euseb. an. 170.

Thus haue you heard out of the epistle of the brethren of Smyrna, the whole order and life of Polycarpus: wherby it may appeare that he was a verie aged man, who had serued Christ fourescore and six yeares since the first knowledge of him, and serued also in the ministerie about the space of threescore and ten yeares. This Polycarpus was the scholler and hearer of Iohn the euangelist, and was placed by the said Iohn in Smyrna. Of him also Ignatius maketh mention in his epistle which he wrote in his iourney to Rome, going toward his martyrdome, and commended to him the gouernment of his church at Antioch, whereby it appeareth that Polycarpus then was in the ministerie. Likewise Irenæus writeth of the said Polycarpus after this manner: He alwaies taught (said he) those things which he learned of the apostles, leauing them to the church, and are onely true. Wherevnto also all the churches that be in Asia, and all they which succeded after Polycarpus to this day beare witnesse. And the same Irenæus witnesseth also that the said Polycarpus wrote an epistle to the Philippians, which whether it be the same that is now extant and read in the name of Polycarpus, it is doubted of some: notwithstanding in the said epistle diuers things are found very holesome and apostolike: as where he teacheth of Christ, of iudgement, and of the resurrection. Also he writeth of faith very worthily, thus declaring that by grace we are saued, and not by workes, but in the will of God by Iesus Christ.

In Eusebius we reade in like manner a part of an epistle written by Irenæus to Florinus, wherein is declared how that the said Irenæus being yet yong, was with Polycarpus in Asia; at what time he saith I well remember, what Polycarpus did, and the place where he sate teaching, his whole order of life and proportion of his bodie, with the seruinus and woyds which he said to the people. And furthermore hee perfectly remembreth how that the said Polycarpus often times reported vnto him, those things which he learned and heard them speake of the Lord, his doings, power, and doctrine, who heard the word of life with their owne eares, all which were more constant and agreeable to the holy scripture. This with much more hath Irenæus concerning Polycarpus.

This authority of Polycarpus in the churches of Asia.

Hierome also writing of the same Polycarpus, hath how he was in great estimation throughout all Asia, for that he was scholler to the apostles, and to them which did see and were conversant with Christ himselfe: whereby it is to be conceived his authoritie to be much not only with them of his owne church, but with all other churches about him.

Polycarpus came to Rome. Polycarpus conferreth with Anicetus. The rest church and Romane church is at one about Easter day.

Out and besides, it is witnessed by the said Irenæus, that Polycarpus came to Rome in the time of Anicetus bishop of Rome, about the yeare of our Lord one hundred fiftie and seuen in the reigne of Antoninus Pius, whose cause of his coming thither appeareth to be about the controuersie of Easter day: wherein the Asians and the Romans some thing disagreed among themselues. And therefore the said Polycarpus in the behalfe of the brethren and church of Asia, take his long iourney thither, to come and confer with Anicetus. Whereof writeth also Nicephorus, lib. 4. declaring that Polycarpus and Anicetus something varied in opinions and iudgement about that matter, and that notwithstanding, yet both friendly communicated either with the other, in so much that Anicetus in his church gaue place to Polycarpus to minister the communion and sacrament of the Lords supper for honor sake. Which may be a notable testimonie now to vs, that the doctrine concerning the free vse and libertie of ceremonies, was at that time retained in the church without any offence of stomacke, or breach of christian peace in the church.

Ex Niceph. lib. 4. cap. 29.

Difference of ceremonies reputed no breach of charitie in the primitive church.

This Polycarpus (as is aboue mentioned) suffered his martyrdome euen in his owne church at Smyrna, where hee had laboured so many yeares in planting of the Gospell of Christ, which was about the yeare of our Lord one hundred threescore and ten, as Eusebius reckoneth in his chronicle, and in the seuenth yeare of Antoninus Verus his reigne: wherein it appeareth that Socrates in Historia tripartita was much deceiued, saying that Polycarpus suffered in the time of Gordianus.

Socrates deceiued in his Tripartit. Hist.

In this fourth persecution beside Polycarpus and others mentioned before, we reade also in Eusebius of diuers others, who at the same time likewise did suffer at Smyrna.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

Quer and besides in the same persecution suffered moreouer Metrodorus a minister, who was giuen to the fire, and so consumed. Another was warthie Pionius, which after much boldnesse of speech, with his apologies exhibited, and his sermons made to the people in the defence of christian faith, and after much reteining and comforting of such as were in prisons, and otherwise discomforted, at last was put to cruell toments and afflictions, then giuen likewise to the fire, and so finished his blessed martyrdome.

Metrodorus, Pionius.

After these also suffered Carpus, Papilus, and Agathonica, a woman, who after their most constant and worthie confessions were put to death at Pergamopolis in Asia, witnessing Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 7.

Carpus, Papylus, Agathonice, martyrs.

And as these suffered in Asia, so in Rome suffered Felicitas with her seuen children, who vnder this Sr. Antoninus Verus disclaimed also the cruelties of this persecution. The names of whose children Bergomensis and other histories doe thus recite: Januarius, Felix, Philip, Siluanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis. Of whom her first and eldest sonne Januarius, after he was whipped and scourged with rods, was prest to death with leaden weights. Felix and Philip had their braines beaten out with maules. Siluanus was cast downe headlong, and had his necke broken. Furthermore Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis were beheaded. Last of all Felicitas the mother (otherwise then the accustomed manner was for such as had borne children) was slaine with the sword. Ex Supplem.

Felicitas with her seuen children, Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Siluanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, martyrs.

In the rage of this fourth persecution, vnder the raigne of Antoninus Pius, suffered also good Iustinus, a man in learning and philosophie excellent, and a great defender of christian religion, who first exhibited vnto the emperour and to the senat, a booke or apologie in the defence of the christians, and afterward himselfe also died a martyr. Of whom in the historie of Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 16. it is thus recorded: that about that time, or a little before that Polycarpus with diuers other saints suffered martyrdome in Pergamopolis a citie of Asia, this Iustinus (as is aforesaid) presented a booke in defence of our doctrine to the emperour, to wit, vnto Antoninus, and to the senat. After which he was also crowned with like martyrdome vnto those, whom he in his booke had defended, through the malicious meanes and crafty circumuention of Crescens.

Iustinus Martyr. Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16.

Crescens a philosopher procurer of the death of Iustinus.

This Crescens was a philosopher conforming his life and manners to the Cynicall sect, whom for because this Iustinus had reproued in open audience, and had boone away the victory of the truth which he defended, he therefore as much as in him lay, did worke and procure vnto him this crowne of martyrdome. And this did also Iustine himselfe a philosopher no lesse famous by his profession foresee and declare in his foresaid apologie, telling almost all those things before hand which should happen vnto him, by these words, saying: And I looke after this good turne, that I be slaine going by the way, either of some of those whom I haue named, and to haue my braines beaten out with a bat, or else of Crescens, whom I cannot call a philosopher, but rather a vaine boaster. For it is not conuenient to call him a philosopher, which openly professeth things to him vnknowne, and whereof he hath no skill, saying and reporting of vs, that the christians be vngodly and irreligious: and all to please and flatter them which are seduced by error.

Crescens a railing philosopher and a malicious railer.

For whether he obiecteth against vs the doctrine of the christians which he hath not read, yet is he very malicious, and weake then the vnlearned idiots, who for the most part vse not to dispute or iudge of things they know not, and to beare witnesse of the same. Or put case that he had read it, yet vnderstandeth he not the maiestie of the matters therein contained: or if peraduenture he vnderstandeth them, and doth it for this purpose, that he would not be counted as one of them; then is he so much the more wicked and malicious, and the bondslaue of vile and beastly both fame and feare. For this I testifie of him, giuing you truly to vnderstand that for a truth, which I declare vnto you, how that I haue opposed him, and haue put vnto him many questions, whereby I know and perceiue, that he vnderstandeth nothing. But if so be that this our disputation with him hath not come vnto your eares, I am ready to communicate vnto you againe those questions which I demanded of him, which things shall not be vnfit for your princely honor to heare. But if ye know and vnderstand both what things I haue examined him of, as also what answere he hath made, it shall be apparant vnto you, that he is altogether ignorant of our doctrine and learning; or else if he knoweth the same, he dare not vtter it for feare of his auditors, which thing, as I said before, is a proofe that he is no philosopher, but a slaue to vaine glorie, which maketh none account of that, which his owne master Socrates had in so great estimation. And thus much of Iustine, out of Iustine himselfe.

A slaue of fame and feare.

Crescens procured an vnlearned philosopher.

Now to verifie that, which Iustine before of himselfe doth prophesie, that Crescens would and did procure his death: Tatianus (a man brought vp of a child in the institutions of the Gentiles, and obtained in the same not a little fame, and which also left behind him many good monuments and commentaries) writeth in his booke against the Gentiles in this sort: And Iustine (saith he) that most excellent learned man, full well foreknowing and weighing his minde, that a snare receiued men were like vnto thieues or liers by the high-way side. And in the said booke speaking afterward of certaine philosophers, the said Tacianus inferreth thus; Crescens therefore (saith he) when he came first into that great citie, passed all others in the vicious loue of children, and was verie much giuen to courteousnesse; and where he taught that men ought not to regard death, hee himselfe doth feare death, that he did all his endeuour to oppresse Iustine with death, as with the most greatest euill that was, and all because that Iustine speaking truth, reproued the philosophers to be men only for the belly, and deceiuers: and this was the cause of Iustines martyrdome. Hieronie in his ecclesiasticall catalogue thus writeth: Iustine, when in the citie of Rome he had his disputations, and had reproued Crescens the Cynike for a great blasphemer of the christians, for a belliged, and a man fearing death, and also a follower of lust and lecherie: at last by his endeuour and conspiracie was accused to be a christian, and so Christ shed his blood in the peace of our Lord one hundred fiftie and foure vnder Marcus Antoninus, as the chronicles do witnesse, Abbas Vrspergensis, and Eusebius in his chronicle in the thirteenth yeare of the emperor Antoninus.

Tatianus commended.

The praise of Iustine Martyr.

Ex catalogo Hieron.

The death and martyrdome of Iustinus the noble philosopher and christian martyr.

Among these aboue recited is also to be numbred Praxedis a blessed virgin, the daughter of a citizen of Rome, who in the time of Aniectus there bishop, was so brought vp in the doctrine of Christ, and so affected to his religion, that she with her sister Potentiana, bestowed all her patrimonie vpon the relieuing of poore christians, giuing all her time to fasting and prayer, and to the burying of the bodies of the martyrs. And after she had made free all her familie with her seruants after the death of her sister, she also departed, and was buried in peace.

Praxedis, Potentiana, christian virgins.

Vnder the same Antoninus also suffered Ptolomeus and Lucius for the confession of Christ, in a citie of Egypt called Alexandria, whose historie because it is described in the apologie of Iustinus Martyr, I thought therefore so to set forth the same, as it is alledged in Eusebius, declaring the manner and occasion thereof, Lib. 4. cap. 17. in words and effect as followeth, &c.

Ptolomeus, Lucius, martyrs.

Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

There was (saith he) a certaine woman married vnto a husband, who was giuen much to lasciuiousnesse, wherevnto she her selfe in times past was also addict. But she afterward being instructed in the christian religion, became chast her selfe, and also persuaded her husband to line chastly; oftentimes telling him that it was written in the precepts of the christians, that they should be punished eternally, which lined not chastly and iustly in this life. But he still continuing in his filthinesse, thereby caused his wife to estrange her selfe from his companie. For why? the woman thought it not conuenient to continue in her husbands companie, which contemning the law of of nature, sought other wise to satisfie his filthie appetite. Therefore the was purposed to be diuorced from him. But her neighbours and kinsfolke prouoked her, by promising his amendment, to keepe companie againe with him, and so she did. But not after this touke his iourney into Alexandria, and when it was spoken her, that there he liued more licentiously then at anie time before, so that the would not be counted partaker of his incestuous life by coupling her selfe anie longer with him, she gaue him a letter of diuorce, and so departed from him. Then her husband, who ought rather to haue reioyced to haue so honest and chaste a wife, whych not only would not commit any dishonestie thing her selfe, but also could not abide any lewd or misordered behauiour in her husband, and that by this her separation thee went about to reclaime him from his incest and wickednesse to better amendment of life: hee in reuenge of his wife againe, accused her to bee a christian, which at that time was no lesse then death. Whereupon shee being in great perill and danger, deliuered vp vnto the emperor (as Iustinus in his apologie writing to the emperour himselfe declareth) a supplication, desiring and crauing of his maiestie, first to grant her so much licence as to set her familie in order, and that done, afterward to come againe and make answere to all that might or should be laid against her: whereunto the emperour condescended. Then her husband seeing that he could haue no vantage against her, deuised with himselfe, how he might bring Ptolomeus (which was her instructor in the faith of Christ) in trouble and accusation: vsing the meanes of a certaine Centurion who was his verie friend, whom he perswaded to examine Ptolomeus whether he were a christian or not. Ptolomeus (as one that loued the truth, and not thinking good to hide his profession) confessed no lesse then to the examiner, openly declaring that he had (as truth was) taught and professed the veritie of christian doctrine. For who so denieth himselfe to be that he is, either condemneth in denying that thing that he is, or maketh himselfe vnworthie of that, the confession whereof he professeth, which thing is neuer found in a true and sincere christian. Thus then he being brought before Vrbicius the iudge, and by him condemned to suffer: one Lucius being also a christian, standing by, and seeing the wrong iudgement, and hastie sentence of the iudge, said to Vrbicius: What reason I pray you or equitie is this, that this man who neither is adulterer, nor fornicatour, nor homicide, nor fellon, neither hath committed anie such crime, wherein he may be charged, is thus condemned only for his name and confession of a christian? This condemnation and these maner of iudgements (O Vrbicius) are neither seemely for the vertuous emperour, nor to the philosopher his sonne, nor yet for the estate of his senat of Rome.

Ptolomeus conuicted and condemned.

Lucius condemned and martyred.

The third man also condemned and martyred.

Which words being heard, Vrbicius making no further examination of the matter, said vnto Lucius: Me thinketh thou art also a christian. And when Lucius had giuen him to vnderstand that he was also a christian, the iudge without further delay commanded him to be had away to the place of execution. To whom he answered: I thanke you with all my heart, that you release me from such vnciuil gouernours, and send me vnto my good and most louing father, being also the king of all gods. And in like manner the third man also, coming vnto him, and vsing the like libertie of speech, had also the like sentence of death and condemnation, and crowned also with the same crowne of martyrdome. And thus much out of the apologie of Iustinus, by the which storie it may appear not to be true that Gratianus attributeth vnto Higinus bishop of Rome, the deciding of causes matrimoniall, seeing that in Iustinus time (who was in the same age of Higinus) the diuorcement of this woman in this historie aboue touched, was not decided by any ecclesiasticall law, or brought before any bishop, but was brought before a heathen prince, and determined by the law ciuill.

Concoydus marry.

Henricus de Erfordia recordeth out of the martyrologe of Iuuardus, of one Concoydus a minister of the citie of Spolet, who in the raigne of this Antoninus Verus, because he would not sacrifice vnto Iupiter, but did spit in the face of the idoll, after diuers and sundrie punishments suffained, at last with the sword was beheaded. Vincentius in his tenth booke, chap. 108. recyteth a long storie of his acts and life, whereof some part perhaps may seeme tollerable. But this is vtterly approued to be false and fabulous, concerning the water flowing beside his sepulchre in the forenamed citie of Spolet, vnto the which water was giuen (saith Vincentius) by the vertue of him, for whose name he suffered, to restore sight to the blind, to heale the sicke, and to cast out diuels, &c. Which kind of vertue to open the eyes of the blind, and to expell diuels, neither doth God giue to any creature of water, neither is it like that Concoydus the blessed martyr did or would require any such thing at the hands of God.

Concoydus spit in the face of the idoll.

Iuuardus, and Bede, Vincentius, and Henricus de Erfordia, with other authors more, make relation of diuers other martyrs that by sundrie kinds of torments were put to death, vnder the foresaid Antonius Verus: the names of whom be Symmetrius, Flozellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipodius, Victor, Corona, Marcellius, Valerianus. cause at the emperours commandement they would not sacrifice to idols. Many sorts of punishments and miracles are told of them: but at length the end of them all is, that they were beheaded. Whereby it may be the more suspected, the histories of these writers not to be certaine or true, as well touching these as also other martyrs, as may appeare in Vincentius, in Petrus de Natalibus, and other authors of like sort. In which authors they which lust to reade more of their miracles there may find them.

After before, mention was made of Symphorosa, otherwise named Symphorosa, wife of Getulius, with her seuen sons. This Getulius or Getulius, was a minister or a teacher (as witnesseth Martyrol. Adonis) in the citie of Tiber, which Getulius with Cereals, Amantius, and Primitius, by the commandement of Adrian were condemned to the fire, wherein they were martyred and put to death. The names moreouer of the seuen sonnes of this Symphorosa, I find to be Crescens, Julianus, Nemelius, Primitius, Iustinus, Statteus, and Eugenius, whom the chronicle of Aco declareth to be put to death at the commandement of Adrian, being fastened to seuen stakes, and so racked vp with a pulley, and at last were thrust through. Crescens in the necke, Julianus in the brest, Nemelius in the heart, Primitius about the nauill, Iustinus cut in euery ioynt of his bodie, Statteus run through with speares, Eugenius cut asunder from the brest to the lower parts, and then cast into a deepe pit, hauing the name by the idolatrous priests, entituled Ad septem Biothanatos. After the martyrdome of whom also Symphorosa the mother did likewise suffer, as is before declared.

Vnder the said Antonius Verus, and in the same persecution, which raged not in Rome and Asia only, but in other countries also, suffered the glorious and most constant martyrs of Lions and Vienna, two cities in France, giuing to Christ a glorious testimonie, and to all christian men a spectacle or example of singular constancie and fortitude in Christ our Sauiour. The historie of whom, because it is written and set forth by their owne churches, where they did suffer, mentioned in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2. I thought here to repeate the same in the forme and effect of their owne words, as there is to be seene. The title of which their epistle written to the brethren of Asia and Phrygia thus beginneth.

The martyrs in Lions and Vienne, two cities in France. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 1.

The seruants of Christ inhabiting the cities of Vienna and Lions, to the brethren in Asia and Phrygia, hauing the same faith and hope of redemption with vs: peace, grace, and glorie from God the Father, and from Iesus Christ our Lord.

A letter of the brethren of France to the brethren of Asia.

THe greatnesse of this our tribulation, the furious rage of the Gentiles against vs, and the torments which the blessed martyrs suffered, neither can we in words, nor yet in writing expresse, as they deserue, set forth. For the aduersarie with all his force gaue his endeuour to the working of such preparatiues, as he himselfe lifted, against his vsurnous comming, and in euerie place practised he and instructed his ministers, how in most spitefull maner to set them against the seruants of God: so that not only in our houses, shops and markets we were restrained, but also were vniuersally commanded, that none (so hardie) should be seene in any place. But God hath alwaies mercie in store, and take out of their hands such as were weake amongst them, and other some did he so fix as stone and immouable pillars, which by sufferance were able to abide all violent force, and valiantly to withstand the enemie, enduring all their oppozbious punishment they could deuise: to conclude, they fought this battell so that intent to come vnto Christ, esteeming their great troubles but as light: thereby shewing that all that may be suffered in this present life, is not able to countervaile the great glorie which shall be shewed vpon vs after this life. And first they patiently suffered whatsoeuer the multitude of franticke people running vpon head did vnto them, as railings, scourgings, drawings, and hallings, stinging of stones, imprisonings, and what other thing soeuer the rage of the multitude is wont to vse and practise against their professed enemies. Then afterward they being led into the market place, and there iudged of the captaine and rest of the potentates of the citie, after their confession made openly before the multitude, were commanded again to prison, vntill the returne of their chiefe gouernour. After this they being brought before him, and he vsing all extremitie that possible he might against them: one Vetius Epagathus, one of the brethren, replenished with feruent zeale, both toward God and his brethren (whose conuersation although he were a yong man was counted as perfect as was the life of Zacharie the priest, for he walked diligently in all the commandements and iustifications of the Lord, and in all obedience towards his brethren blameless) he hauing within him the feruent zeale of loue, and spirit of God, could not suffer that wicked iudgement which was giuen vpon the christians; but being vehemently displeased, desired that the iudge would heare the cercle which he was minded to make in the behalfe of Vetius, Epagathus, martyrs.

the christians, in whom (saith he) is no impietie found. But the people cried againe to those that were assistants with the chiefe iustice, that it might not be so (for in deed he was a noble man borne) neither did the iustice grant him his lawfull request, but only asked him whether hee himselfe were a christian or not: And he immediately with a loud and bold voice answered and said, I am a christian. And thus was he received into the fellowship of the martyrs, and called the aduocat of the christians.

The stoutnesse of a godly young man.

And he hauing the spirit of God more plentifully in time, then had Zacharie, the abundance thereof he declared, in that he gaue his life in the defence of his brethren, being a true disciple of Christ, following the lambe wheresoeuer he goeth.

The fainting of certaine weake christians.

By this mans example the rest of the martyrs were the more animated to martyrdome, and made more joyous with all courage of mind to accomplish the same. Some other there were vnreadie and not so well prepared, and as yet weake, not well able to beare the vehemencie of so great conflict: of whom ten there were in number that fainted, ministring to vs much heauinesse and lamentation. Who by their example caused the rest which were not yet apprehended, to beleeue willing there vnto. Then were we all for the variablenes of confession not a little astonied: not that we feared the punishment intended against vs, but rather as hauing respect to the end, and fearing lest any should fall. Sucrie day there were apprehended such as were worthie to fulfill the number of them which were fallen: in so much that of two churches, such as were chiefest, and which were the principall gouernors of our churches, were apprehended. With these also certaine of the Ethnikes, being our menseruants, were apprehended (for to the gouernor commanded, that all of vs in generall without any respect, should be taken) which seruants being ouercome by Satan, and fearing the torments which they saw the saints to suffer, being also compelled thereunto by the meanes of the souldiers, fained against vs that we kept the feastings of Thiestes, and incest of Oedipus, and many such other crimes, which are neither to be remembred, nor named of vs, nor yet to be thought that euer any man would commit the like.

False slanders of the christians.

The rage of the heathen against the christians.

These things being now buted abroad, euery man began to shew cruelitie against vs, in so much that those which before for familiaritie sake were more gentle towards vs, now behaued themselues disdainfully against vs. And thus was now fulfilled that which was spoken by Christ, saying, The time will come that whosoeuer killeth you, shall thinke that he doth God great good seruice. Then suffred the martyrs of God such bitter persecution as is passing to be told: Satan still chasting at this marke, to make them to vtter some blasphemie by all meanes possible. Marueilous therefore was the rage both of the people and prince, specially against one Sanctus, which was deacon of the congregation of Vienna, and against Maturus, being but a little before baptised, but yet a worthie souldier of Christ, and also against Attalus, being borne in Pergama, which was the foundation and pillor of that congregation, and also against Blandina: by whom Christ shewed, that those things which the world esteemed vile and abiect, to be glorious in Gods sight, for the verie loue which in heart and deed they beare vnto him, not in outward face only. For when all we were afraid, and specially her mistresse in flesh, who also was her selfe one of the number of the foresaid martyrs, left happily for the weakenesse of bodie she would not stand strongly to her confession, the foresaid Blandina was so replenished with strength and boldnesse, that they which had the tormenting of her by course from morning to night, for very weerinesse gaue ouer and fell downe, and were themselues ouercome, confessing that they could do no more against her, and marueiled that yet the liued hauing her bodie so torne and rent: and testified that any one of those torments alone, without any more, had been enough to haue plucked the life from her bodie. But that blessed woman, fighting this worthie battell, became stronger and stronger, and as often as shee spake these words (I am a christian, neither haue we committed any euill) it was to her a marueilous comfort and bolding to abide the torments.

The cruell handling and great patience of Blandina.

Sanctus a martyr.

Sanctus also another of the martyrs, who in the midst of his torments, endureing more paines then the nature of a man might atwaie with, also at what time the wicked seruants to haue heard him utter some blasphemous words, for the greatnesse and intollerablenesse of his torments and paines that he was in, abode notwithstanding in such constance of minde, that neither he told them his name, nor what countreman he was, nor in what citie brought vp, neither whether he was a free man or a seruant: but vnto euery question that was asked him, he answered in the Latine tongue, I am a christian, & this was all that he confessed both of his name, citie, kindred, and all other things in the place of execution; neither yet could the Gentiles get any more of him: wherevpon both the gouernour and tormentors were the more vehemently bent against him. And when they had nothing to vse him withall, they clapped plates of brasse red hot to the most tenderest parts of his bodie, wherwith his body indeed being scorched, yet he neuer thunke for the matter, but was bold and constant in his confession, being strengthened and moystened with the fountaine of liuelie water, flowing out of Christs side. Truelie his bodie was a sufficient witnesse what torments he suffered: for it was all one wound and most pitifully wounded and scratched, so that it had therewith lost the proper shape of a man, in whose suffering Christ obtained vnspeakeable glorie, for that he ouercame his aduersarie, and to the instruction of others declared, that nothing else is terrible, or ought to be feared where the loue of God is, nor nothing grieuous wherein the glorie of Christ is manifested.

The cruell torments of Sanctus.

And when those wicked men began after a certaine time again to torment the martyrs, and hoped wel to bring it to passe, that either they should ouercome him in causing him to recant, by reiterating his torments, now when his bodie was so sore and swollen, that he might not suffer a man to touch him with his hand, or else that if he died vnder their hands, yet that thereby they should strike such feare into the hearts of the rest, to cause them to denie Christ. But they were not only disappointed herein, but also contrarie to the expectation of men, his bodie was in the latter punishment and torments supplied and reflored, and tooke the first shape and vse of the members of the same, so that the same his second torment was by the grace of Christ (in stead of punishment) a safe medicine.

A miraculous working of God.

Also Satan now thinking to haue setled himselfe in the hart of one Biblias, being one of them which had denied Christ, and thinking to haue caused her, being a weake and feeble woman in faith, to haue damned her soule, in blaspheming the name of God, brought her to the place of execution: enforcing to wrell some wicked thing out of the mouth of the christians. But she in the middle of her torments, returning to her selfe, and looked as it were out of her dead sleepe, by that temporall paine, called to her remembrance the paines of hell fire, and against all meanes expectations reuiled the tormentors, saying: How should we christians eat young infants (as ye reported of vs) for whom it is not lawfull to eate the blood of any beast? Vpon that, so soone as she had confessed her selfe to be a christian, she was martyred with the rest. Thus when Christ had ended those tyrannicall torments, by the patience and sufferance of our saints, the diuell yet inuented other engins and instruments. For when the christians were cast into prison, they were shut vp in darke and vgly dungeons, and were drawne by the feet in a rache or engine made for that purpose, euen vnto the fift hole. And many other such punishments suffered they, which the furious ministers, filled to with diuelish furie, are wont to put men into: so that very manie of them were strangled and killed in the prisons, whom the Lord in this manner would haue to enioy euerlasting life, and set forth his glorie. And surely these good men were so pittifully tormented, that and if they had had all the helpes and medicines in the world, it was thought impossible for them to line, and to be restored. And thus they remaining in prison destitute of all humane helpe, were so strengthened of the Lord, and both in bodie and mind confirmed, that they comforted and stirred vp the minds of the rest: the younger sort of them, which were latter apprehended, and put in prison, whose bodies had not yet felt the leth of the whip, were not able to endure the sharpnesse of their imprisonment, but died of the same.

Maturus and Sanctus martyred.

Other martyrs died in prison.

The blessed Photinus, who was deacon to the bishop of Lions about fourescore and nine yeares old, and a very feeble or weake man, and could scarcely draw breath for the imbecillitie of his bodie: yet was he of a lively courage and spirit for the great desire he had of martyrdome, when he was brought into the iudgement seat: although his bodie was feeble and weake, both because of his old age, and also through sickenesse, yet was his forte or life preserued to this purpole, that by the same Christ might triumph and be glorified. He, being by the soulders brought to the place of iudgement, many citizens and men of great abilitie following him, and the whole multitude cried vpon him diuerlly, as though he had been Christ himselfe, gaue a good testimonie. For being demanded of the chiefe ruler, what was the christian mans God: he answered: If thou be worthy to know thou shalt know. He being with these words somewhat neere touched, caused him to bee very sore beaten. For those that stood next him, did him all the spite and displeasure that they could both with hand and foot, hauing no regard at all to his old age or white haires. And they which were further off, whatsoeuer came next to hand, they threw at him, and euery man thought that he did verie wickedly refraine, that withheld his hand from not doing the like. For by this meanes they thought that they did reuenge the quarrell of their gods. Photinus now, euen as it were gasping after life, was throwne into prison, and within two daies after died.

Photinus a blessed martyr.

The rage of the people against Photinus.

And heere is the mightie prouidence of God, and the vnspeakeable mercie of Jesus Christ declared, which prouidence being affirmed amongst a fraternitie, is neuer destitute of the aid of Jesus Christ. For those which in their first confession denied Christ, then also were put in prisun, and made partakers of the others affliction. Neither yet did it any whit at all at that time helpe them that had denied Christ, but they which confessed him were imprisoned as christians, neither was there any other crime obiected against them, but the other sort taken like homicids & wicked doers were laid hand on, & had double more punishment then the others had. These men were refreshed with the ioy of martyrdome, the hope of Gods promises, the loue towards Christ, and the spirit of God: the others their consciences sciences accused them, and that very sore, in so much that by their gate, their countenances bewraied vnto the rest their guiltie consciences. For the christians went forth hauing cheerful countenances, very much abouned with glorie and grace, in so much that the very bonds wherewith they were tied, let them out as men in seemely apparell, and like as brides when they be decked in gorgeous and gay garments, and therewithall fauoured as of the redolent smell of Christ, so that it might be supposed them to be anointed with some sweet balme: whereas the others were doubtfull and sad, abiect, ill fauoured, filled with all shame, and furthermore reuiled of the Gentiles themselues, as wretches degenerat, hauing the crime of homicide, and destitute of the most pretious, glorious, and lively calling of the christian name. And truly by these sights the rest were confirmed, and being apprehended, confessing Christ without any staggering, not hauing so much as the thought of any such disuelish mind of denial. And in the same epistle of the foresaid brethren of France, writing to the brethren of Asia, it followeth in this manner: After these things done, the martyrdome of these holy saints were diuided diuerslie into diuers kinds and formes, as the offering to God the father a garland decked with diuers and sundrie kinds of colours and flowers. For it to behoooued the worthie champions of God, after they had suffered diuers kinds of torments, and so winning a triumphant victorie, to obtaine great reward of immortalitie.

Then Maturus, Blandina, and Attalus together, were brought to the common scaffold, there in the face of the people to be cast and deuoured of the beasts. And Maturus with Sanctus being brought the second time to the scaffold, suffered again all kind of torments, as though hitherto they had suffered nothing at all, yea rather as though the aduersarie being ofttentimes put to the worse, they as striuing for the crowne, suffered again more scourgings, the tearing of with beasts, and what thing else soeuer the frantike people on euery side cried for: & wild. And aboue all the rest they brought an iron chaire, in the which their bodies being set, were so fried & broched as on a gridiron fried on the coles, & filled with the fauor of the spring all the people that stood by. And yet for all that, the tormentors ceased not, but vsared more fierce and mad against them, labouring to ouercome the patience of the saints. Notwithstanding al this, they could not get out of Sanctus mouth any other thing but the confession which at the beginning hee declared. And thus these holy men, after they had long continued alive in this their most horrible conflict, at the length were slaine, being made all that whole day a spectacle vnto the world, in place and in stead of the games and fights which were wont to be exhibited to the people. And thus much concerning Maturus and Sanctus.

The spitefull handling of Gods people.

Maturus and Sanctus martyred.

Blandina brought forth againe.

Now concerning Blandina, who being fastened vpon a stake, was call to the rauening beasts to bee deuoured, which thing was not done without the determinat will of God: to this end, that while she seemed to hang vpon a crosse, as it were by the feruentnesse of her prayer, she much comforted the rest of the saints, as beholding her Christ with her bodilie eies, which in that agonie suffered for them all, and that all which beleeue in him, and suffer for the glorie of Christ, might bee assured to line with him for euer. And when they saw that no beast would come nere her thus hanging, they took her downe from the tree, & call her again into prison till another time, that she hauing the victorie of many battels, might triumph ouer that vgly serpent the diuell, & that she being a weake & sillie woman, and not regarded, armed with Christ the inuincible conqueror, might incourage her brethren, and by the enduring of this battell might win a crowne of incorruptible glorie.

Blandina and Ponticus a-gaine brought forth.

Now to Attalus: who being also required and called for of the people to punishment already prepared (for his conscience sake) commeth forth to the fight. For he being worthilie exercised in the christian profession, was alwaies a witnesse and a maintainer of our doctrine. Therefore when the presse of people was about the scaffold, and the table carried before him, wherein was written in the Romane tongue, This is Attalus the christia: then the people were in a marueilous rage against him. But the gouernor, vnderstanding that he was a Roman, commanded him againe to prison, with the rest of his prison fellowes: whereof he wrote to the emperour, and waited for answer what his pleasure herein was. The prisoners were not idle in the meane season, nor vnprofitable to their brethren, but by their patience the vnspeakeable mercy of Christ shined out. For those which were dead before, were now reuiued by them that liued, and they which were martyrs profited them which were none, and the church did much reioyce, as receiuing them againe alive, whom she had lost before as dead. For many of them which before had denied, now by their denial were reconered and stirred vp, and learned to bee confessors. And now being reuiued and strengthened, and tasting the sweetnesse of him which desireth not the death of a sinner, but is merciful to the penitent, came of their owne accord to the iudgement seat against, that they might be examined of the iudge. And so that the emperor had written backe against to him, that all the confessors should be punished and the other let goe, and that the sessions or assises were now begun, which for that multitude that had repaire thither out of euery quarter, was marueilous great:

Apoc 20.

The denyers returning againe to their confession.

he caused all the holy martyrs to be brought thither, that the multitude might behold them, and once againe examined them, and as many of them as bee thought had the Romane freedome he beheaded, the residue he gaue to the beasts to bee deuoured. And truly Christ was much glorified by those which a little before hap denied him, which againe contrarie to the expectation of the infidels, confelled him euen vnto the death. For they were examined apart from the rest, because of their deliuery, which being found confessors, were ioyned to the compane of the martyrs, and had with them their part. But there were ther abode which had no faith at all, neither yet so much as the feeling of the wedding garment, nor any cogitation at all of the feare of God, but blaspheined his waies by the leaud conuersation of their life, euen such as were the children of damnation. All the residue ioyned themselues to the congregation: which when they were examined, one Alexander a Phrygian borne, and a physitian which had diuelt long in France, and knowne almost of all, for the loue hee had to God, and boldnelle of speaking (neither was he void of the apostolicall lone) this Alexander standing somewhat nere to the barre, by signes and becks perswaded such as were examined, to confelle Christ: so that by his countenance sometime reioycing, some other while forzobing, bee was deserid of the standers by. The people not taking in good part to see those which now recanted, by and by again to sticke to their first confession, they cried out against Alexander as one that was the cause of all this mat'er. And when he was inforced by the iudge, and demanded what religion he was of: he answered: I am a christian. He had no sooner spoken the word, but he was iudged to the beasts of them to be deuoured.

The next day following, Attalus of whom I made mention a little before, and Alexander, were brought foorth together (for the gouernour granting Attalus vnto the people, was baited against of the beasts.) When these men were brought to the scaffold, and had taken a taste of all the instruments that there were prepared for their execution, and had suffered the greatest agonie they could put them to, were also at the length slaine: of whom Alexander neuer gaue so much as a sigh, nor held his peace, but from the bottome of his heart praised and prayed to the Lord. But Attalus, when he was set in the iron chaire, and began to frie, and the frying fauour of his burning bodie began to smell, he spake to the multitude in the Romane language: Behold (saith he) this is to eat mans flesh which you do, for we neither eat men, nor yet commit any other wickednelle. And being demanded what was the name of their God: Our God (saith he) hath no such name as men haue. Then said they, Now let vs see whether your God can helpe you, and take you out of our hands or not.

After this, being the last day of the spectacle, Blandina again, and one Ponticus, a child of fiftene yeares old was brought forth, and this was euery day, to the intent they seing the punishment of their fellowes might be compelled there by to sweare by their idols. But because they constantly abode in their purpole, and defied their idols, the whole multitude was in a rage with them, neither sparing the age of the child, nor fauouring the sex of the woman, but put them to all the punishment and paine they could deuise, and ofttentimes inforced them to sweare, and yet were not able to compell them thereunto. For Ponticus being so animated of his sister, as the Ethnikes standing by did see, after that he had suffered all torments and paines gaue vp the ghost. This blessed Blandina therefore being the last that suffered, after she had like a worthy mother giuen exhortations vnto her children, and had sent them before as conquerors to their heauenly king, and had called to her remembrance all their battels and conflicts, so much reioyced of her childrens death, and so hastened her owne, as though she had been bidden to a bridall, and not in case to bee throwne to the wild beasts. After this her pitifull whipping, her deliuerie to the beasts, and her torments vpon the gridiron, at the length she was put in a net, and throwne to the wild bull, and when she had been sufficiently gored and wounded with the hornes of the same beast, and felt nothing of all that chanced to her, for the great hope and consolation she had in Christ and heauenly things, was thus slaine, insomuch that the very heathen men themselues confelled that there was neuer woman put to death of them that suffered so much as this woman did. Neither yet was their furious cruelitie thus assuaged against the christians. For the cruell barbarous people, like wild beasts when they be mooued, knew not when the time was to make an end, but inuented new and sundrie torments euery day against our bodies. Neither yet did it content them when they had put the christians to death, for that they wanted the sense of men: for which cause both the magistrat and people were bered at the very hearts, that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, He that is wicked, let him bee wicked still, and he that is iuli let him be more iuli. For those which in their prisons they strangled, they threw after to the dogs, setting keepers both day and night to watch them, that they should not be buried, and bringing forth the remnant of their bones and bodies, some halfe burned, some left of the wild beasts, and some all to bee mangled, also bringing forth heads of others which were cut off, and in like manner committed by them them to the charge of the keepers to see them remaine vnburied.

The Gentiles grinded and gnashed at the christians with their teeth, seeking which way they might amplifie their punishment: some other flouted and mocked them, extolling their idols, attributing vnto them the cause of this cruelties and vengeance shewed to vs. Such which were of the meaker sort, and seemed to be moued with some pitie, did hit vs in the teeth, saying, Where is your God that you so much boast of? and what helpeth this your religion for which you giue your liues? These were the sundrie passions and affects of the Gentiles, but the christians in the meane while were in great heauines, that they might not burie the bodies and reliques of the holie martyrs. Neither could the darke night serue them to that purpose, nor any intreatie nor waging them with monie, which were appointed for watchmen: but they so narrowlie looked vnto the matter, as though they should haue gotten great benefit and profit thereby.

Thus were the bodies of the martyrs made a wondering flocke, and lay fire daies in the open streetes, at the length they burned them, and threw their ashes into the riuer of Rodes, so that there might appeare no remnant of them vpon the earth. And this did they as though they had been able to haue pulled God out of his seat, and to haue let the regeneration of the saints, and taken from them the hope of the resurrection, wherof they being perswaded (said they) bring in this new and strange religion, and set thus light by death and punishment. Atque hæc ex epistola Viennensium, &c.

Iustinus.

Among others that suffered vnder Antoninus, mention was made also of Iustinus, who (as it is said before) exhibited two apologies, concerning the defense of christian doctrine, the one to the senat of Rome, and the other to Antoninus Pius the emperor, concerning whose suffering, and the causes thereof is partly before declared: this Iustine was borne in Neapoli, in the countrie of Palestine, whose father was Priscus Bachius, as he himselfe doth testifie, by whom in his youth he was set to schole to learne, where in processe of time he became a famous and worthie philosopher, of whose excellencie many learned and notable men doe record. For first he being altogether inflamed and rauished with desire of knowledge, would in no wise bee satisfied in his mind, before he had gotten instructions singularlie seene in all kind of philosophie, whereupon he writeth of himselfe in the beginning of his dialogue Cum Tryphone thus, declaring that in the beginning he being desirous of that sect and societie, applied himselfe to be the scholer to a certaine Stoike, & remaining with him a time, when he nothing profited in diuine knowledge (whereof the Stoike had no skill, and affirmed the knowledge thereof not to be necessarie) he forsoke him, and went to another of the sect of the Peripatetikes, a sharpe witted man, as he thought: with whom after he had bin a while, he demanded of him a stipend for his teaching, for the better confirmation of their familiaritie. Whereupon Iustine accounting him as no philosopher, left him, and departed. And yet not satisfied in mind but desirous to heare of further learning in philosophie, adioyned himselfe to one that professed the Pythagorian sect, a man of great fame, & one who made no small account of himself. Whom after he had followed a time, his master demanded of him whether he had any sight in Musike, Astronomie, and Geometrie, without the sight of which science he said he could not be apt to receiue the knowledge of vertue and felicitie, vnlesse before hee had vsed to applie his mind from sensible matters to the contemplation of things intelligible. And speaking much in the commendation of these sciences, how profitable and necessarie they were: after that Iustine had declared himself not to be scene therin, the philosopher gaue him ouer, which grieued Iustine not a little, and so much the more because he thought his master to haue some knowledge in those sciences. After this, Iustine conferring with himselfe what time was requisit to the learning of these sciences, and thinking not to defer any longer, thought best to resort to the sect of the Platonists for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore he chose vnto him a singular learned man of that sect, which lately was come to those parts, and so remaining with him seemed to profit not a little in contemplation of supernall things, & inuisible formes, insomuch that he thought shortlie to aspire to such sharpenes of wit and wisdom, that out of hand he might atchine to the comprehension and contemplation of God, which is the end of Plato his philosophie. And in this maner he beStowed his youth: but after ward he growing to a riper age, how and by what means the said Iustine came to the knowledge and profession of christianitie, it followeth likewise in his said first apologie: where hee affirmeth of himselfe (as witnesseth Eusebius in his fourth booke) that when he did behold the christians in their torments & sufferings to be so constant in their profession, was therwith marueilouslie mooued: after this maner reasoning with himselfe, that it was impossible for that kind of people to be subiect to any vice or carnalitie, which vices of their owne nature are not able to sustaine any sharp aduersitie, much lesse the bitternes of death. The sight whereof helped him not a little (being of his owne nature inclined to the searching of true knowledge and vertue) to begin thereby to loue and imbrace christian religion, for so he doth witnesse of himselfe in the end of the first apologie: signifying there how it was his seeking and indeuor to attaine to christianitie: vnderstanding how the christians by malice of wicked persons were compelled to suffer wrong and torments, and to be euill spoken of. By sight whereof, as he saith himselfe, he became a christian, through this occasion. For being thus afflicted in his mind, as is aforesaid, it came in his head for his more quietnesse to go aside to some desert and solitarie place void of concourse of people, vnto a village or grange neere to the sea side: whither as he approched, thinking there to be all alone, there meeteth with him an old ancient father of a comely visage and gentle behauior, who following him a little off, began to reason with him: where after long disputation, when the old man had declared vnto him that there was no knowledge of truth amongst the philosophers, which neither knew God, neither were aided by the holy Ghost: and further had reasoned with him of the immortalitie of the soule, of the reward of the godly, and punishment of the wicked: then Iustine being conficted with his reasons & argumentes, yeelded to him of his owne accord: and demanded of him by what means he might attaine to that true knowledge of God, whereof he had spoken: who then counselled him to read and search the prophets, adioyning therewith praier. But what maner (quoth Iustine) should I vse for the instruction thereof, and who shall be able to helpe vs if these philosophers (as you say) lacke the truth, and are voide of the same? To whom the old father answering, There haue been (said he) many peeres before these philosophers other more ancient then all these, which being accounted for philosophers were ill and beloued of God: who spake by the spirit of God, foreseeing and prophesying these things which we see now come to passe, and therefore they are called prophets. These only haue knowne the truth and reuealed it to men, neither fearing nor passing for any, who were seduced with no opinions of mans inuention, but only spake and taught those things which they themselues both heard and saw, being inspired with the holie spirit of God: whose writings and works yet to this day remaine, out of which the reader may receiue great profit and knowledge of things, as concerning the first creation of the world and end of the same, with all other things necessarie to be knowne of euery true philosopher which will giue credit vnto them. Neither in their teaching doe they vse any demonstration, as being more certaine of themselues, then that they need any such demonstration to be made, forasmuch as the accomplishing and the end of things both past and now present, constraineth vs of necessitie to beleeue the words and doctrin which they taught: which men not only therfore are to be beleeued, but also for their miracles and wonders done, are worthie of credit; for that they both preached of God the maker and creator of all things, and also did prophesie before of Christ his sonne to be sent of him; the which the false prophets being seduced with false & wicked spirits, neither haue done, nor doe, but only take vpon them to worke certaine prodigious wonders for men to gaze at, setting out thereby to the world false and vncleane spirits. But then afore all things make thy praier that the gate of light may be opened vnto thee, for otherwise these things cannot be attained vnto of euery man, but onlie of such to whom God and his Christ giueth vnderstanding.

These things, with much more (which now leisure serueth not to prosecute) after the foresaid old father had declared vnto him, hee departed, exhorting him well to follow the things which he had spoken: and after that Iustine (as he himselfe witnesseth) saw him no more. Immediatlie after this, Iustine being all inflamed as with fire kindled in his breST, began to conceiue a loue and zeale toward the prophets and all such as were fauoured of Christ. And thus he reuoluing in his mind more and more these words, found only this philosophie among all other professions both sure and profitable, and so became hee a philosopher, and in time by these meanes afterwards hee was made a christian and baptized. But where he receiued this holy sacrament of baptisme, it is not read of, nor yet by what occasion he left his country and came to Rome. This only we read in Jerome, that he was in Rome, and there vsed certaine exercises which he called Diatribas, disputing there with Crescens a Cynicall philosopher, as is before touched. But this is certaine, how that Iustine after he had receiued the profession of christian religion, became an earnest defender of the same, trauelling and disputing against all the aduersaries thereof, fearing neither perill of life nor danger of death, whereby he might maintaine the doctrine of Christ against the malicious blasphemers, and also augment the number of christian beleeuers, as may appeare by his vehement disputations against the heathen philosophers also moreouer as wel appeareth in that long disputation which he had with one Tripho at Ephesus, as also in his confutations of heresithes. Furthermore, his conflicts and apologies which with great courage and securitie he exhibited against the persecutors of the christians, both the emperors and the magistrats, yea and the whole senat of Rome do testifie the same.

Of the which apologies, the first he wrote to the senat of Rome, and after to Antoninus Pius the emperor, as is before mentioned, where in the first writing with great libertie to the senat, hee declared, that of necessitie hee was compelled to write write and utter his mind and conscience to them. For that in persecuting of the christians they did neglect their dutie, and highly offended God, and therefore need they had to be admonished. And further writing to Urbicius lieutenant of the citie, said, that he put men to death and tormented for no offence committed, but for the confession onely of the name of Christ, which proceedings and iudgements neither became the emperor nor his sonne, nor the senat: defending moreouer in the said apologie, and purging the christians of such crimes as falslie were laid and obiected against them by the ethnikes.

The second apologie of Iustine.

And likewise in his second apologie writing to Antoninus the emperor and his successors, with like grauitie and free libertie declareth vnto them holy they had the name, commonly being reputed and taken as pernitious philosophers, maintainers of iniquitie, louers of learning; but whether they were so, their acts declared. As for him, neither for flatterie nor fauor at their hands, he was constrained thus to write vnto them, but only to sue vnto them, and desire a serious and righteous kind of dealing in their iudgements and sentences (for it becommeth princes to followe vprightnesse and pietie in their iudgements, not tyrannie and violence) and also in plaine words chargeth as well the emperour as the senat with manifest wrong, for that they did not grant the christians that which is not denied to all other malefactors, inuging men to death not conuicted but only for the hatred of the name. Other men should be apprached (said he) in iudgement, are not condemned before they are conuicted: but on vs you take our name only for the crime. When as indeed you ought to see iustice done vpon our accusers. And againe (saith he) If a christian being accused only denie that name, him you releasle, being not able to charge him with any other offence: but if he stand to his name, only for his confession you may cast him, where indeede it were your dutie rather to examine their manner of life what thing they confesse or denie, and according to their demerits to see iustice done.

The Lord take away this spirit of feare, condemning innocents before they be conuicted.

And in the same further he saith; You examine not the causes, but incensed with rath affections as with the spurre of fury, ye slap and smother them not conuicted, without any respect of iustice. And further he addeth: Some peraduenture will say, certaine of them haue been apprehended and taken in euill doings: as though (saith he) you vsed to inquire vpon them being brought afore you, and not commonly to condemne them before due examination of their offense for the cause aboue mentioned. Where also in the end of the said apologie after this manner he reprehendeth them: You doe degenerat (quoth he) from the goodnesse of your predecessors, whose example you follow not: for your father Adrian of famous memorie caused to be proclamed that christians accused before the iudge, should not be condemned, vnlesse they were found guiltie of some notorious crime. I find that all his vehement and graue apologie standeth vpon most strong and firme probations, denying that the christians ought by conscience at the will and commandement of the emperors senat to doe sacrifice to the idols: for the which they being condemned, affirme that both they suffer open wrong; affirming moreouer that the true and only religion is the religion of the christians, whose doctrine and conuersation hath no fault. Iustinus although with these and such like perswasions did not so preuaile with the emperour, to cause him to loue his religion and become a christian (for that is not written) yet thus much hee obtained, that Antoninus writing to his officers in Asia in the behalfe of the christians, required and commanded them, that those christians which onlie were founde guiltie of any trespasse should suffer, and such as were not conuicted, should not therefore only for the name be punished, because they were called christians. By these it is apparant with what zeale and faith this Iustinus did strue against the persecutors, which (as he said) could kill only, but could not hurt.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16. A place of Epiphanius falslie taulte.

This Iustinus by the meanes and malice of Crescens the philosopher (as is before declared) suffered martyrdome vnder Marcus Antoninus Verus, a little after that Polycarpus was martyred in Asia, as witnesseth Eusebius, Lib. 4. Here is to be gathered how Epiphanius was deceiued in the time of his death, saying, that he suffered vnder Rufficus the president, and Adrian the emperor, being of thirtie yeeres of age, which indeed agreeth not either with Eusebius, nor Hieronie, nor Sulpice, nor others more, which manifestly declare & testifie how he exhibited his apologie vnto Antoninus Pius which came after Adrian. Thus hath thou (good reader) the life of this learned and blessed martyr, although partly touched before, yet now more fullie and amplie discoursed for the better commendation of his excellent and notable vertues, of whose finall end thus writeth Photius, saying; that he suffering for Christ died cheerefully and with honor.

Thus haue ye heard the whole discourse of Iustinus and of the blessed saints of France, Vetius, Zacharias, Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Blandina, Alexander, Alcibiades, with others, recorded and set forth by the writing of certaine christian brethren of the same church and place of France. In the which forsaid writing of theirs, moreouer appeareth the great meekenesse and modest constancie of the said martyrs described in these words: Such followers were they of Christ, who when he was in the forme of God, thought it no robberie to be equall with God, being in the same glorie with him, that they not once nor twice but oft times suffered martyrdom, and taken againe from the beasts, & bearing woonds, tearings and shars in their bodies, yet neither would count themselues martyrs, neither would they suffer vs so to call them: but if any of vs either by word or letter would call them martyrs, they did vehemently rebuke them, saying; that the name of martyrdome was to be giuen to Christ the faithfull and true martyr, the first borne of the dead, and the captaine of life; testifying moreouer, that martyrdome belonged to such, who by their martyrdom were already pulled out of this life: and whom as Christ by their worthie confession hath received vnto himselfe, and hath sealed by their martyrdome by their end finished: as for them which were not yet consummated, they (said they) were not worthie the names of martyrs, but only were humble and worthie confessors, desiring also their brethren with teares to pray without ceasing for their confirmation. Thus they performing indeed that which belongeth to true martyrs, in resisting the heathen with much libertie & great patience, without all feare of man, being replenished with the feare of God, refused to be named of their brethren for martyrs. And after in the said writing it followeth more: They humbled themselues vnder the mightie hand of God by which they were greatly exalted, then they rendred to all men a reason of their faith, they accused no man, they loosed all, they bound none, and for them which so euill did intreat them they prayed, following the example of Stephan the perfect martyr, which said: O Lord impute not their sinne to them. And after againe: Neither did they proudly disdaine against them which fell, but of such as they had they imparted to them that lacked, bearing toward them a mother's affection, shedding their plentifull teares for them to God the father, and prayed for their life and saluation, and as God gaue it them they also did communicat to their neighbours, and thus they as conquerors of all things departed to God. They loued peace, and leauing the same to vs, they went to God, neither leauing any molestation to their mother, nor sedition or trouble to their brethren, but ioy, peace, concord, and loue to all.

The holy martyrs refuse to be called martyrs.

Out of the same writing moreouer concerning these martyrs of France afore mentioned, is recorded also another historie not vnworthie to be noted, taken out of the same booke of Eusebius cap. 3. which historie is this.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 1.

Alcibiades.

The strict fasting of Alcibiades corrected by the holy ghost.

There was among these constant and blessed martyrs, one Alcibiades, as is aboue specified: which Alcibiades cuer vsed a very strict diet, receiuing for his food and sustenance nothing else but only bread and water. When this Alcibiades now being cast into prison went about to accustome the same strictnesse of diet, after this vsuall manner, before it was reuealed by God to Attalus afore mentioned, one of the said companie, being also the same time imprisoned after his first conflict vpon the scaffold, that Alcibiades did not well in that he refused to vse and take the creatures of God, and also thereby ministred to other a pernitious occasion of offensiue example. Whereupon Alcibiades being aduertised, and reformed, began to take all things boldly with giuing thanks. Whereby may appeare to all scrupulous consciences, not only a wholesome instruction of the holy Ghost, but also here is to be noted how in those daies they were not destitute of the grace of God, but had the holy spirit of God to be their instructor. Chdginiate & Laini pro Christo perstit.

The singular modestie of the foresaid martyrs declared. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2.

The foresaid martyrs of France at the same time commended Irenæus, newly then made minister, with their letters vnto Eleutherus bishop of Rome, as witnesseth Euseb. in the tenth chapter of the said booke, which Irenæus first was the hearer of Polycarpus, then made minister (as is said) vnder these martyrs: and after their death made bishop afterward of Lions in France, and succeeded after Photinus. Besides this Iustinus, there was also the same time in Asia, Claudius Apollinaris, or Apolinarius bishop of Hierapolis, and also Melito bishop of Sardis, an eloquent and learned man, much commended of Tertullian, who succeeding after the time of the apostles, in the raigne of this Antoninus Verus, exhibited vnto him learned and eloquent apologies in defense of Christs religion, like as Quadratus and Aristides aboue mentioned did vnto the emperour Adrian, whereby they moued him somewhat to stay the rage of his persecution. In like manner did this Apolinaris and Melito (stirred by by God) aduenture to defend in writing the cause of the christians vnto this Antonius. Of this Melito, Eusebius in his fourth booke making mention, excerpeth certaine places of his apologie in these words as followeth: Now, saith he, which twas neuer seene before, the godly suffer persecution by occasion of certaine proclamations and edicts proclamed throughout Asia; for villanous sycophants, robbers and spoilers of other mens goods, grounding themselues vpon these proclamations, and taking occasion of them, rob openly night and day, and spoile those which doe no harme. And it followeth after; Which if it be done by your commandement, be it so well done; for a good prince will neuer command but good things, and so we will be contented to sustaine the honor of his death. This or we may well humblie beseech your maiestie, that calling before you and examining the authors of this tumult & contention, then your grace would would iustly iudge whether wee are worthie of cruell death or quiet life. And then if it be not your pleasure, and that it proceedeth not by your occasion (which indeede against your barbarous enemies were too bad) the more a great deale we are petitioners to your highneesse, that hereafter you will vouchsafe to heare vs thus scorned and oppressed with these kinde of villanous robberies. And verilie our philosophie and doctrine did first among the barbarous take place, which doctrine first in the daies of Augustus your predecessor, when it had raigne and florish, thereby your empire became most famous and fortunate: and from that time more and more the state of the Romane empire increased in honor, wherevnto you most happily were made successor, and so shall your sonne too, I hope: therefore this philosophie which with your empire sprang vp and came in with Augustus, which your progenitors alwaie all other honored and most esteemed. And verily this is no small argument of a good beginning, that since our doctrine flourished in the empire, no misfortune or losse happened from Augustus time: but contrarie alwaies victorie, good and honorable peeres, as euer any man would wish: once among all, and of all, Nero and Domitian being kindled by diuers naughtie and spitefull persons cauillingly obiected against our doctrine, of whom this prophanticall slandering of vs by naughtie cuttome first came and sprang vp. But your godly fathers espying the ignorance of these, attentiues by their writing corrected their temerous attempts in that behalfe: among whom your grandfather Adrian with many others is read of, to haue written of Fundane the proconsull and lieutenant of Asia: and your father, your auncle father I say, with whom you ruled in all things, wrote to the cities vnder his signet, as the Larissens, Thessalonicenses, Athenienses and Grecians, rashly to innouat or alter nothing of your highnesse: therefore, who in this case is of that sect as your predecessors were, yea and of a more benigne and philosophicall mind, we are in good hope to obtaine our petition and request.

The christians religion began in the time of the empire of Rome.

Christian religion maruellously flourished vnder Traian.

The bookes of the old testament auncient and receiued.

Thus much out of the apologie of Melito, who writing to Onesimus, giueth to vs this benefit, to know true catalogue and the names of all the auncient bookes of the old testament, receiued in the ancient time of the primitiue church. Concerning the number and names whereof, the said Melito in his letter to Onesimus declareth: bids that he returning into the parts where these things were done and preached, there he diligently inquired out the bookes appointed of the old testament, the names whereof in order he subscribeth, & sendeth vnto him as followeth: The fiue bookes of Moses, Genesis, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, Deuteronomi, Iesus Naue, The Iudges, Ruth, Foure bookes of Kings, Two bookes Parahpomenon, The Psalmes, Proues of Salomon, The booke of Wisdome, The Preacher, The song of songs, Iob, The prophets, Esay, Hieromie, Twelue prophets in one booke, Daniel, Ezechiel, Esdras. And thus much of this matter which I thought here to record, for that it is not vnpossible for these latter times to vnderstand, what in the first times was receiued and admitted as auteintike, and what otherwise.

But from this little digression to returne to our matter omitted, that is, to the apologies of Apolinarius and Melito, in the storie so it followeth; that whether it was by the occasion of these two apologies, or whether it was through the writing of Athenagoras a philosopher, and a legat of the christians, it is vncertaine: but this is certaine, that the persecution the same time was staied. Some do thinke, which most probable seeme to touch the truth, that the cause of staying this persecution, did rise vpon a wonderfull miracle of God shewed in the emperors campe by the christians; the storie whereof is this. At what time the two brethren Marcus Antoninus, & Marcus Aurelius Commodus emperors, ioyning together, warred against the Quades, Vandales, Sarmates, and Germans, in the expedition against them, their armie by reason of the imminent assault of their enemies was coped and shut in within the straits and hot die places, where their souldiers besides other difficulties of battell, being destitute of water fiue daies, were like to haue perished, which dead not a little discomfited them, and abated their courage; where, in this so great distresse and iepardie, suddenly withdrew from the armie a legion of the christian souldiers for their succor, who falling prostrat vpon the earth, by ardent prayer by and by obtained of God double release: by meanes of whom God gaue certaine pleasant showers from the element, wherby as their souldiers quenched their thirst, so were a great number of their enemies discomfited and put to flight by continuall lightnings which flashed out of the aire. This miracle so pleased and won the emperor, that euer after he inared gentler and gentler to the christians, and directed his letters to diuers of his rulers (as Tertullian in his apologie witnesseth) commanding them therein to giue thanks to the christians, no lesse for his victorie, then for the preseruation of him and all his men. The copie of which letter iustly.

Ex Euseb. Hidem.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus emperor, to the senat and people of Rome.

I Giue you hereby to vnderstand what I intend to doe, as also what successe I haue had in my warres in Germany, and with how much difficultie I haue vitelled my campe, being compassed about with seuentie and foure fierce dragons, whom my Scouts descried to be within nine miles of vs, and Pompeianus our lieutenat hath viewed, as he signified vnto vs by his letters: wherefore I thought no lesse but to be ouerrunne and all my bands of so great multitude, as well my vaward, maineward, as rereward, with all my souldiours of Ephrata; in whose host there were numbred of fighting men, nine hundred seuentie and fiue thousand. But when I saw my selfe not able to encounter with the enemie, I craued aid of our countrie godsat whose hands I finding no comfort, and being driuen of the enemie vnto an exigent, I caused to be sent for those men which wee call christians, who being mustered, were found a good indifferent number, with whom I was in further rage the I had good cause, as afterwards I had experience by their maruellous power, who foorthwith did their indeuor, but without either weapō, munition, armor or trumpets, as men abhorring such preparation and furniture, but only satisfied in trust of their God, whom they carie about with them in their consciences. It is therefore to be credited, although we call them wicked men, that they worship God in their hearts. For they falling prostrat vpon the ground prayed not onlie for me, but for the host also which was with me, beseeching their God for helpe in that our extremity of victuals and fresh water: for we had been now fiue daies without water, and were in our enemies land, euen in the midst of Germany; who thus falling vpon their faces, made their prayer to a God vnknowne of me. And there fel amongst vs from heauen a most pleasant and cold shower, but amongst our enemies a great storme of haile mixt with lightning, so that immediatlie we perceiued the inuincible aid of the most mighty God to bee with vs: therefore we giue those men leaue to professe christianitie, left perhaps by their prayer we be punished with the like, and thereby make my selfe the author of such hurt as shall bee receiued by the christian profession. And if any shal apprehend one that is a christian, only for that cause, I will that he being apprehended without punishment, may haue leaue to confesse the same, so that there be none other cause obiected against him, more then that he is a christian; but let his accuser bee burned alue. Neither will I that he confessing and being found a christian, shall be inforced to alter the same his opinion for the gouernor of any of our prouinces, but left to his owne choice. And this decree of mine I will to be ratified in the senat house, and command the same publikely to be proclamed and read in the court of Traianus: and that further from thence it may bee sent into all our prouinces by the diligence of Veratius gouernor of our citie Pollone. And further, we giue leaue to all men to vse and write out this our decree, taking the same out of our copie publikely in the common hall set foorth.

Fullus a senator conuerted to Christ.

Thus the tempestuous rage of persecution against the christians began for a time to allwage partly by the occasion here of, partly also vpon other causes incident, compelling the enemies to surcease their perfecution, as great plagues and pestilence hapning vpon the countrie of Italie: likewise great feares, as well in the east parts, as also in Italie and France, terrible earthquakes, great floods, noisome swarmes of flies and vermine deuouring their corne fields, &c. And thus much of things done vnder Antoninus Verus, which Antoninus in the beginning of his raigne ioyned with him in the gouernment of the empire his brother Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who also two sith him at the miraculous victorie gotten by the christians, as Eusebius, cap. 5. lib. 5. recordeth. Contrarie, Platina in vita Soteris, and the booke intituled Flores historiarum, referre the same to the time of Antoninus Verus, and his sonne Lucius Antoninus Commodus, & not of Marcus Aurelius Commodus his brother. But howsoeuer the truth of peeces do stand, certaine it is, that after the death of Antoninus Verus, and of Aurelius Commodus, succeded Lucius Antoninus Commodus the sonne of Verus, who raigned thirteene peeres.

Antoninus Verus, & Aurelius Commodus emperors.

The difference betweene Eusebius and Platina.

Anno 175.

In the time of this Commodus, although hee was an incommodious prince to the senators of Rome, yet notwithstanding there was some quietnesse vniuersallie through the whole church of Christ from persecution, by what occasion it is not certaine. Some thinke, of whom is Xiphilinus, that it came through Marcia the emperors concubine, which fauored the christians: but howsoeuer it came (saith Eusebius) the furie of the raging enemies was then somwhat mitigated, and peace was giuen by the grace of Christ vnto the church throughout the whole world: at what time, the wholesome doctrine of the gospell allured and reuoked the hearers of all sects of people vnto the true religion of God, insomuch that many both rich and noble personages of Rome with their whole families and houshoulds to their saluation, adioyned them to the church of Christ.

Quietnesse giuen to the church.

Among whom there was one Apollonius, a noble man and a senator of Rome, mentioned in Eusebius, lib. 5. cap. 21. who being maliciously accused vnto the senat by one whom Hieromie writeth to be the seruant of the said Apollonius, and named him Seuerus: but whose seruant soeuer he was, the wretched man came soone enough before the iudge, being condignelie rewarded for that his malicious diligence: for by a law which the emperor made, that no man vpon paine of death should should false accuse the christians, he was put to execution, and had his legs broken soothwith by the sentence of Perennius the iudge, which being an heathen man he pronounced against him: but the beloued martyr of God when the iudge with much adoe had obtained of him to render an account before the honorable senat of his faith, vnder whose defense and warrant of life he did the same, deliuered vnto them an eloquent apologie of the christian beleefe: but the former warrant notwithstanding, he by the decree of the senat was beheaded, and so ended his life, for that there was an ancient law among them decreed, that none that professed Christ and therefore arraigned, should be released without recantation, or altering his opinion.

This Commodus is said in diuers to be so fierce and feddie handed in calling the dart, that in the open theater before the people he would encounter with the wild beasts, and be sure to hit them in place where he appointed. Among diuers other his vicious and wild parts he was too farre surpassed in pride and arrogancie, that he would be called Hercules, and many times would shew himselfe to the people in the shape of a lion, to bee counted thereby the king of men, like as the lion is of the beasts.

Vincentius, Eusebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, martyrs.

Upon a certaine time being his birth day, this Commodus calling the people of Rome together, in a great royaltie hauing his lions skin vpon him, made sacrifice to Hercules and Iupiter, causing it to be cried through the citie that Hercules was the patrone and defender of the city. There were the same time at Rome, Vincentius, Eusebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, learned men and instructors of the people, who following the steps of the apostles, went about from place to place where the gospel was not yet preached, conuerting the Gentils to the faith of Christ. These hearing the madnesse of the emperor and of the people, began to reproue their idolatrous blindnesse, teaching in villages and townes all that heard them to beleeue vpon the true and only God, and to come alway from such worshipping of diuels, and to giue honor to God alone which only is to be worshipped, willing them to repent and to be baptised, lest they perished with Commodus. With this their preaching they conuerted one Iulius a senator, & others, to the religion of Christ. The emperor hearing hereof, caused them to be apprehended of Titellius his captaine, and to be compelled to sacrifice vnto Hercules: which they stoutlie refused, after diuers grieuous torments & great miracles by them done, at last they were pressed with leaden weights to death. Vincentius, lib. 10. cap. 119. & Chron. Henr. de Erfordia.

Ex Vincen. lib. 10. cap. 119. Hen. de Erfor. Peregrinus sent to France and martyred at Rome.

Ex Platina in vita Sixti.

This Peregrinus aboue mentioned had been sent before by Eleutherius bishop of Rome into the parties of France, to supplie there the roome of a bishop and teacher, by reason that for the continuall and horrible persecutions there aboue touched, those places were left desolate and destitute of ministers and instructors, where after he had occupied himselfe with much trauile among the flock of Christ, and had kabilled the congregation there, returning home againe to Rome, there finished at last (as it is said) his martyrdome.

Eleutherius bishop of Rome.

Now remaineth likewise to speake of Iulius: which Iulius being (as is afore described) a senator of Rome, and now wonne by the preaching of these blessed men to the faith of Christ, did exhortones inuite them and brought them home to his house, where being by them more fullie instructed in christian religion, he beleeued in the gospell. And sending for one Ruffinus a priest, was with all his familie by him baptised, who (not as the common sort was wont to doe) kept close and secret his faith, but incensed with a marueilous and sincere zeale, openlie professed the same, altogether loathing and praying to be giuen to him by God, not onely to beleeue in Christ but also to hazard his life for him. Which thing the emperour hearing how that Iulius had forsaken his old religion, and became a christian, forthwith sent for him to come before him, vnto whom hee spake on this wise: O Iulie, what madnes hath possessed thee, that thus thou doest fall from the old and common religion of thy forefathers, who acknowledged & worshipped Iupiter and Hercules their gods, and now doest imbrace a new vnfound kind of religion of the christians? At which time Iulius hauing good occasion to shew and open his faith, gaue straight way account thereof to him, and affirmed that Hercules and Iupiter were false gods, and how the worshippers of them should perish with eternal damnation and punishments. Which the emperor hearing how that he condemned and despised his gods, being then inflamed with a great wrath (as he was by nature verie cholerike) committed him forthwith to Titellus the maister of the souldiors, a verie cruell and fierce man, to see Iulius either to sacrifice to mightie Hercules, or refusing the same to dap him. Titellus (as he was commanded) exhorted Iulius to obay the emperors commandement, and to worship his gods, alleaging how that the whole empire of Rome was not onlie constituted, but also preserued and maintained by them: which Iulius denied vtterly to doe, admonishing sharply in like maner Titellus to acknowledge the true God, and obey his commandements, lest hee with his master should die some grieuous death: wherent Titellus being mooued, caused Iulius with cudgels to be beaten vnto death.

Iulius with his familie baptised and after martyred.

These things being thus briefly recited touching such holie martyrs as hitherto haue suffered, now remaineth that we returne againe to the order of the Romane bishops, such as followed next after Alexander, at whom wee left, whose successor next was Xistus or Sixtus, the sixt bishop counted after Peter, and gouerned that ministerie the space of tenne yeres, as Damasus and others do write. Aespergensis maketh mention but of nine peeres. Platina recordeth that he died a martyr, & was buried at Vaticane. But Eusebius speaking of his decease, maketh no word or mention of any martyrdome. In the second tome of the councels certaine epistles be attributed to him, whereof Eusebius, Damasus, Hyeronie, and other old authors, as they make no reliance, so seeme they to haue no intelligence nor knowledge of any such matter. In these counterfeit epistles, and in Platina apeareth that Xistus was the first author of these ordinances. First, that the holy mysteries and holy vessels should be touched but onelie of persons holie and consecrated, especiallie of no woman. Item, that the corporas cloth should be made of no other cloth but of fine linen. Item, that bishops such as were called vp to the apostolike see, returning home againe, should not bee receiued at their returne, vnlesse they brought with them letters from the bishop of Rome, saluting the people. Item, at the celebration he ordained to be sung this verse, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Saboth. Where no reuerence is to be noted, that the said Platina, in the life of this Xistus, doth testifie that Peter minifired the celebration of the communion onely with the Lords prayer. These trifling ordinances of Xistus, who is so rude that seeth not so many notable conuicture to bee falslie fathered of Xistus, or of any father of that time: first by the vniforme rudenesse and stile of all those decreall letters, nothing sauouring of that age, but rather of the latter punticall times that followed; also by the matter and argument in those letters contained, nothing agreeing with the state of those troublesome daies. Neither againe is it to be supposed, that any such reuerence of bishops was then to the apostolicall see of Rome, that it was not lawfull to returne without their letters: when as the persecution against the christians was then so hot, in the daies of Adrian, that the bishops of Rome themselues were more glad to flie out of the citie, then other bishops were to come to them vnto Rome. And if Xistus added the Sanctus vnto the masse canon, what peece then of the canon went before it, when they which put to the other patches came after Xistus? And if they came after Xistus that added the rest, why did they set their peeces before his, seeing they that began the first peece of the canon, came after him?

Xistus the first author of these ordinances.

The ordinances of Xistus suspected.

The same like wise is to be iudged of the epistles and ordinances of Telesphorus, who succeeded next vnto Xistus, and being bishop of that congregation the terme of eleuen yeres, the first yeere of the reigne of Antoninus Pius, died martyr, about the yeere of our Lord, one hundred thirtie and eight. His epistle like vnto the rest containing in it no great matter of doctrine, hath these ordinances. First he commandeth all that were of the clergie to fast and abstaine from flesh eating seuen weekes before easter. That three masses should be said vpon the nativitie day of the Lord. That no lay man should accuse either bishop or priest. He ordained moreouer Gloria in excelsis, to be added to the masse, &c. But these things fullie to be fained vpon him may easilly be conicctured. For as touching the seuen weeks fast, neither doth it agree with the old Romane terme commonly receiued, calling it Quadragesima, that is, the foxtie daies fast: neither with the example of our sauiour, who fasted not seuen weeks but onelie foxtie daies. Moreouer, as concerning this foxtie daies fast, whereof the saied epistle of Ignatius, which was long before Telesphorus: whereby it may appeare that this Telesphorus was not the first inuentor thereof. And if it be true that is lately come out in the name of Abdias (but vntrulie as by many coniectures may be proued) there is read, that in the daies of S. Matthew this Lent fast of foxtie daies was obserued long before Telesphorus by these words that follow: In the daies (saith he) either of Xist, or in the time of other lawfull fastings, he that abstaineth not as well from the eating meat as also from the mixture of bodies, doth incur in so doing not onelie pollution, but also committeth offense, which must be washed away with the teares of repentance. Against Apollonius all truth that Montanus the heretike was the first deuiser and inuenter of these lawes of fasting into the church, which before time was vsed to be free. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 18. But especially by Socrates, writer of the ecclesiasticall storie, who liued after the daies of Theodosius, may be argued, that this seuen weekes fast is fallly imputed to Telesphorus. For Socrates in his first booke, speaking of this time hath these words: Romani namque tres ante pascha septimanas prater Sabbatum & Dominicum continuas ieiunant, that is: The Romans (saith he) doe fast three weeks continuallie before easter, beside the sabbath and the sunday. And moreouer, speaking of the diuers and sundrie fastings of Lent in sundrie and diuers churches, he addeth these words: And because that no man can bring foorth any commandement written of this matter, it is therefore apparant, that the apostles left this kind of fast free to euery mans will and iudgement, left any should bee constrained by feare and necessitie to doe that which is good, &c.

With

w Socrates, l. 7. cap. 19.

With this of Socrates agrée also the words of Sozomenus, hauing much about the same time, in his seuenth book, where he thus writeth: The whole fast of Lent (saith he) some compe-hend in six weeks, as doe the Illirians, and the west churches, with all Libia, Egypt, & Palestina: one in seuen weeks, as at Constantinople, and the parties bordering to Phenice: other some in three weeks, not before the day of Easter, and some again in two weeks, &c. By the which it may be collected, that Telesphorus neuer ordained any such fast of seuen weeks: which otherwise neither would haue ben neglected in Rome, and in the west churches: neither again would haue ben vnremembred of these ancient ecclesiasticall writers, if any such thing had been. The like is to be thought also of the rest, not only of his constitutions, but also of the other ancient bishops & martyrs, which followed after him, as of Higinus in the yere of our Lord one hundred forty and two, who succeeding him and dying also a martyr, as Volaterranus lib. 22. declareth, is said or rather fained to bring in the creame, one godfather and godmother in baptisme, to ordain the dedication of churches: when as in his time so far it was off, that any solemne churches were standing in Rome, that vnneth the christians could safely conuent in their owne houses. Likewise the distributing the orders of metropolitans, bishops, and other degrees, sauor nothing lesse then of that time.

After Higinus followed Pius, who as Platina reporteth was so precisely deuout about the holy mysteries of the Lords table, that if any one crum thereof did fall downe to the ground, he ordained that the priest should do penaunce fortie daies: if any fell vpon the superaltar, he should do penaunce three daies: if vpon the linner cloth or napkin, cloth foure daies: if vpon any other linnen cloth nine daies. And if any drop of the bloud (saith he) should chance to be spilled, wheresoeuer it fell it should be licked vp, if it were possible: if not, the place should be washed or pared, and so being washed or pared, should be burned and laid in the vestrie. All which toies may séeme to a wise man more vaine and trifling, then to sauor of those pure and strict times of those holy martyrs. This Pius (as is reported) was much conuersant with Hermes, called otherwise Pastor. Damasus saith he was his brother. But how is that like that Hermes being the disciple of Paul, or one of the three or disciples, could be the brother of this Pius? Of this Hermes and of the revelations the foresaid Pius in his epistle decretall (if it be not forged) such mention is declaring that vnto him appeared the angell of God in the habit of a shepheard, commanding him that Easter day should be celebrated of all men vpon no other day, but vpon a sunday: wherevpon, saith the epistle, Pius the bishop by his authoritie apostolicall decreed and commanded the same to bee obserued of all men.

Then succeeded Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius, about the yere of our Lord one hundred and fourescore. This Eleutherius, at the request of Lucius king of Britaine, sent to him Damianus and Fugatius, by whom the king was conuerted to Christs faith, and baptised about the yere of our Lord one hundred threscore and nineteene. Nauclerus, lib. chro. Gen. 6. saith, it was in the yere one hundred threscore and nine, in the nineteenth yere of Verus the emperor. Some say it was in the first yere of Commodus, which should be about the yere of our Lord one hundred fourescore and fiue. Eusebius in his storie thinketh that Eleutherius came himselfe: but that is not like. And as there is a variance among the writers for the count of yeres: so doth there rise a question among some, whether Eleutherius was the first that brought the faith from Rome into this land or not. Nicephorus lib. 4. cap. 4. saith that Simon Zelotes came into Britaine. Some other allege out of Gildas de victoria, Aurel. Ambrosh. that Joseph of Aramathy after the dispersion of the Iewes, was sent to Philip the apostle from France to Britaine, about the yere of our Lord three score and three, and here remained all his life time, and so with his fellowes laid the first foundation of christian faith among the Britaine people. Whereupon other preachers and teachers comming afterward confirmed the same and increased it more. And therefore doth Petrus Clumacensis call the Scotishmen and so doth count them as more ancient christians. For the confirmation hereof might be allaged the testimonie of Origen, of Tertullian, and the words also of the letter of Eleutherius, which import no lesse but that the faith of Christ was here in England among the Britaine people, before Eleutherius time, and before the king was converted: but hereof more shall be spoken hereafter (Christ willing) when after the tractation of these ten persecutions, we shall enter into the matter of our English stories.

About this time of Commodus afore mentioned, among diuers other learned men & famous teachers, whom God stirred vp at that time (as he doth at all other times raise vp some) in his church, to confound the persecutors by learning and writing, as the martyrs to confirme the truth with their bloud, was Serapion bishop of Antioch, Egesippus a writer of the ecclesiasticall historie from Christs passion to his time, as witnesseth Hierome and Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 8. & 22. which books of his be not now remaining: and those that be remaining (which be fiue De excidio Hierosol.) be not mentioned neither of Hierome, Eusebius, nor of Philippides, which also wrote his apologie in defense of christian religion, as did Melito, Quadratus, and Aristides before mentioned. About the same time also wrote Heracitus, who first began to write annotations and enarrations vpon the new testament, and epistles of the apostles. Also Theophilus bishop of Cesaria, Dionysius bishop of Corinth a man famouslie learned, which wrote diuers epistles to diuers churches, and among others vnto the church of Nicosia a certaine bishop, Ne graue seruandæ castitatis onus necessarió fratribus imponat, sed multorum esse imbecillitati attemperet, that is, That he would lay no yoke of chastitie of any necessitie vpon his brethren: but that he would consider the infirmitie of others, and beare with it. Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 23. Moreouer the said Dionysius in his epistles writing of Dionysius Areopagita, declareth of him how that he was first conuerted to the christian faith by S. Paul, according as in the acts is recorded, and afterward was made the first bishop of Athens, but maketh there no mention of his book De hierarchia. Whereby it may easily appeare, that is to be iudged of that booke. Furthermore, by the epistles of the said Dionysius of Corinth, this we haue to vnderstand, to be the vse at that time in churches to read the letters and epistles, such as were sent by learned bishops and teachers vnto the congregations, as may appeare by these words of Dionysius, who writing to the church of the Romans, and to Soter, saith: This day we celebrate the holie sabboticall day, in which we haue read your epistle, which alwaies we will reade for our exhortation, like as we do reade also the epistle of Clement sent to vs before, &c. Eusebius, ibid. Where also mention is made of keeping sunday holy, wherof we find no mention made in ancient authors, before this time, except onely in Iustinus martyr, who in his description declareth two times most especially vsed for christian men to congregat together: first, when any conuert was to bee baptised, the second was vpon the sunday, which was wont for two causes then to be hallowed: first, because (saith he) vpon that day God made the world: secondly, because that Christ vpon that day first shewed himselfe after his resurrection to his disciples, &c.

Diuer and beside these abone named, about the daies of Commodus, wrote also Clemens Alexandrinus, a man of notable and singular learning, whose bookes although for a great part be lost, yet certaine of them yet remaine, wherein is declared among other things, the order and number of the bookes and gospels of the new testament, &c.

The same time or soone after liued Pantenus, which was the first in Alexandria that professed in open schoole to read, of whom is thought first to proceed the order and manner among the christians to read and professe in vniuersities. This Pantenus for his excellencie of learning was sent by Demetrius bishop of Alexandria to preach to the Indians, where he found the gospel of S. Matthew written in Hebrue, left there by S. Bartholomew, which booke afterward he brought with him from thence to the librarie of Alexandria.

During all the reigne of Commodus, God granted rest and tranquillitie, although not without some bloudshed of certaine holy martyrs, as is aboue declared, vnto his church. In the which time of tranquillitie, the christians hauing now some leasure from the forreigne enemie, began to haue a little contention among themselues about the ceremonie of Easter: which contention albeit of long time before had ben stirring in the church, as is before mentioned of Polycarpus and Anicetus: yet the variance & difference of that ceremonie brought no breach of christian concord and societie among them: neither as yet did the matter creed so farre, but that the bond of loue, and communion of brotherlie life continued, although they differed in the ceremonie of the day. For they of the west church pretending the tradition of Paul and Peter, but indeed being the tradition of Hermes and of Pius, kept one day, which was vpon the sunday after the fourteenth day of the first moneth. The church of Asia following the ordinance of John the apostle, obserued another, as more shall be declared (the Lord willing) when wee come to the time of Victor bishop of Rome. In the meane time as concerning the fourth persecution let this hitherto suffice.

The fift persecution.

Severus emperor. Anno 195. The fift persecution.

AFter the death of Commodus raigned Pertinax but fiue moneths, after whom succeeded Severus, vnder whom was raised the fifth persecution against the christian saints: who raigning the terme of eighteene yeres, the first ten yeres of the same was very fauourable and courteous to the christians: afterward through sinister suggestions and malicious accusations of the malignant, was so incensed against them, that by proclamations he commanded no christians any more to bee suffered. Thus the rage of the emperor being inflamed against them, great persecution was stirred vp on euery side, whereby an infinit number of martyrs were slaine, as Eusebius in his first booke recordeth, which was about the yere of our Lord two hundred and fiue. The crimes and false accusations alleaged against the christians are partly touched before: as sedition and rebellion against the emperour, sacrilege, murthering of infants, incestuous pollution, eating raw flesh, lasciuious communture, whereof certaine indeed called then Gnostici, were infamed. Item, it was obiected against them for worshipping the head of an asse: which whereof it should rise, I find no certaine cause, except it were perhaps by the Iewes. Also they were charged for worshipping the sun, for that peraduenture before the sun did rise, they conuented together, singing their morning hymnes vnto the Lord, or else because they prayed toward the east: but specially for that they would not with them worship their idolatrous gods, and were counted as enemies to all men, &c.

The fate accustomed against christians.

The captaines and ministers of this persecution. Ex Tertul. ad Scapulam.

The captaines and presidents of this persecution vnder the emperor were Hilerianus, Vigellius, Claudius, Vernicianus ruler of Cappadocia, Cecilius, Capella, Vespronius, also Demetrius mentioned of Cyprian, and Aquila iudge of Alexandria, of whom Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 5. maketh relation.

The places where the force of this persecution most raged, were Africa, Alexandria, Cappadocia, and Carthage. The number of them that suffered in this persecution, by the report of the ecclesiasticall storie was innumerable. Of whom the first was Leonides, the father of Origen, who was beheaded: with whom also Origen his sonne, being of the age then of seuenteene yeares, should haue suffered (such a feruent desire hee had to be martyred for Christ) had not his mother priuilie in the night season conueied away his cloths and his shirt. Whereupon moze for shame to be seene, then for feare to die, hee was constrained to remaine at home: and when hee could doe nothing else, yet he writeth to his father a letter with these words: Caue tibi, ne quid propter nos aliud quàm martyrij constanter faciendi propositum cogites, that is, Take heed to your selfe, that you turne not your thought and purpose for our sake, &c. Such a feruencie had this Origen being yet yong, to the doctrine of Christs faith, by the operation of Gods heauenly prouidence, and partly also by the diligent education of his father, who brought him vp from his youth most studiouslie in all good literature, but especially in the reading and exercise of holy scripture, wherein he had such inward and mystical speculation, that many times he would moue questions to his father of the meaning of this place or that place in the scripture. In so much that his father diuers times would vncouer his breast being asleepe, and kisse it, giuing thanks to God which had made him so happie a father of such a happie child. After the death of his father, and all his goods confiscated to the emperor, he with his mother, and six brethren, being brought to such extreame pouertie, did sustaine both himselfe and them by teaching a schole: till at length being wearie of the profession, hee transferred his studie onely to the knowledge and seeking of diuine scripture, and such other learning conducible to the same. So much he profited both in the Hebrue & other tongues, that hee conferred the Hebrue text with the translation of the seuentie: and moreouer did confer and sinde out the other translations which we call the common translation of Aquila, of Symmachus, and Theodotion. Also he adioyned to these aforesaid other foure translations, whereof moze is in the storie of Eusebius expressed.

Leonides father of Origen martyr.

Origen commended. Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 3.

They that write of the life of Origen, tellithe of him that he was of wit quicke and sharpe, much patient of labour, a great traueller in the tongues, of a spare diet, of a strict life, a great faster, his teaching and his liuing were both one: his going was much like vnto a strict obseruer of that saying of the Lord, hauing to haue but one cote, &c. He is said to haue written so much as seuen notaries, and so many maids euery day could pen. The number of his bookes by the account of Hierome, came to seuen thousand volumes, the copies whereof he vsed to sell for three pence or a little moze, for the sustentation of his liuing. But of him moze shall be touched hereafter. So zealous he was in the cause of Christ, and of Christs martyrs, that he nothing fearing his owne perill would assist and exhort them going to their death, and kisse them, in so much that he was oft in leopardie to be slone of the multitude: and sometimes by the prouision of christian men had his house guarded about with soulders, for the safetie of them which daily resorted to heare his readings. And many times he was compelled to flit from place and house, for such as laid wait for him in all places: but great was the prouidence of God to preserue him in the midst of all this tempest of Seuerus. Among others which resorted vnto him, and were his hearers, Plutarchus was one, and died a martyr; and with him Serenus his brother who was burned. The third after these was Heraclides, the fourth Heron, who were both beheaded. The fifth, was an other Serenus, also beheaded, Rhais, and Potamiena, who was tormented with pitch powred vpon her, and martyred with her mother Marcella, who died also in the fire. This Potamiena was of a fresh and flourishing beautie, who because she could not be remoued from her profession, was committed to Basilides one of the captaines there in the armie to see the execution done. Basilides receiuing her at the iudges hand, and leading her to the place, shewed her some compassion in repressing the rebukes and railings of the wicked aduersaries: for the which Potamiena the virgin to requite against his kindnelle, bad him bee of good comfort, saying that she would pray the Lord to shew mercie vpon him, and so went she to her martyrdome, which she both strongly and quietly did sustaine.

Plutarchus scholar of Origen, and Serenus his brother martyred. Heraclides, Heron, Rhais, Potamiena, & Marcella, scholars of Origen and martyrs.

Not long after it happened that Basilides was required to giue an oath in a matter concerning his fellow soulders, which thing he denied to doe, plainly affirming that hee was a christian: for their oath then was wont to bee by the idols and the emperor. At the first hee was thought dissemblingly to sest, but after when he was heard constantly and in earnest to confirme the same, he was had before the iudge, and so by him committed toward. The christians marualling thereat, as they came to him in the prison, inquired of him the cause of that his sudden conuersion. To whom hee answered againe and said, that Potamiena had prayed for him to the Lord, and so he saw a crowne put vpon his head: adding moreouer, that it should not be long but he should be receiued. Which things thus done, the next day following hee was had to the place of execution and there beheaded. Eusebius lib. 6. cap. 5. Albeit the said Eusebius giueth this storie of no credit, but onely of hearesay, as he there expresseth.

Basilides of a persecutor made a martyr.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 5.

As diuers and many there were that suffered in the daies of this Seuerus, so some were againe which through the protection of God his prouidence being put to great toiments, yet escaped with life: Of whom was one Alexander, who for his constant confession and toments suffered, was made bishop afterward of Hierusalem together with Narcillus, who being then an old man of an hundred and three score yeares and three, as saith Eusebius, was vnwoldie for his age to gouerne that function alone.

Alexander confessor and bishop of Ierusalem.

Of this Narcillus is reported in the ecclesiasticall historie that certaine miracles by him were wrought, very notable if they be true. First of water by him turned into oyle at the solemne vigill of Easter, what time the congregation wanted oyle for their lamps. An other miracle is also told of him, which is this: There were three euill disposed persons, who seeing the soundnelle and graue constancie of his vertuous life, and fearing their owne punishment, as a conscience that is guiltie is alwaies fearefull, thought to preuent his accusations in accusing him first, and laying an hainous crime vnto his charge. And to make their accusation more probable before the people, they bound their accusation with a great oath, one wishing to be destroyed with fire if hee said not true; the other to bee consumed with a grieuous sicknelle; the third to lose both his eyes if they did lie. Narcillus although hauing his conscience cleare, yet not able being but one man to withstand their accusation, bound with such oaths, gaue place, and removed himselfe from the multitude into a solitarie desert by himselfe, where he continued the space of many yeares. In the meane time to them which so willingly and wickedly sorsware themselues, this hapned: The first by casualtie of one little small sparkle of fire, was burnt with his goods and all his familie. The second was taken with a great sicknesse from the top to the toe, and deuoured with the same. The third hearing and seeing the punishment of the other confessed his fault, but though great repentance powred out such teares, that he lost both his eyes: and thus was their falle periurie punished. Narcillus after long absence returning home againe, was by his meanes both cleared of the fact and received into his bishoppike against whom as is said, for impotencie of his age, Alexander was ioyned with him in execution of the function. Eusebius, histor. eccles. lib. 6. cap. 10. Of this Alexander is recorded in the said ecclesiasticall historie, that after his agonies and constancie of his confession shewed in the persecution of Seuerus, hee was admonished by a vision in the night season to make his iourney vp to Jerusalem and Palestina (for that place remained free from this persecution) to see there the congregation and to pray. Thus he taking his iournep and drawing neere to the citie, a vision with plaine words was giuen to certaine chiefe heads of Jerusalem to goe out of the gate of the citie, there to receiue the bishop appointed to them of God. And so was Alexander met and received, and ioyned in partner with aged Narcillus, as is before expressed, in the citie of Jerusalem, where hee continued bishop about fortie yeares, vntill the persecution of Decius, and there erected a famous librarie, where Eusebius had his chiefest helpe in writing his ecclesiasticall historie. Hee wrote also diuers epistles to diuers churches, and licenced Origen openly to teach in his church. At length being very aged, was brought from Jerusalem to Cesaria before the iudge vnder Decius, where after his constant confession the second time, he was committed to prison and there died.

The constancie and death of Alexand. bishop.

Besides these that suffered in this persecution of Seuerus recited of Eusebius, Aimentius also, Lib. 11. cap. 6. ex martyrologio, speaketh of one Andoclus, whom Polycarpus before had sent into France: which Andoclus because hee spread there the doctrine of Christ, was apprehended of Seuerus, and first beaten with staues and bats, after was beheaded.

Andoclus martyr.

To these above named may also bee added Asclepiades, who although was not put to death in this persecution of Seuerus, yet constantly he did abide the triall of his confession, & suffered much for the same, as Alexander did before mentioned. Wherefore afterward he was ordained bishop of Antioch, where he continued the space of seuen yeares, of whom Alexander writeth vnto the church of Antioch out of prison, much ning & giving thanks to God, to heare that he was their bishop.

About the same time, hearing the raigne of Severus, died Irenæus Hæur. de Hæresibus. And as other martyr writers doe hold, that hee was martyred with a great multitude of others more, for the confession and doctrine of Christ, about the fourth or fifth yeare of Severus. This Irenæus as hee was a great writer, so was hee greatly commended of Tertullian for his learning, whom he calleth Omnium doctrinarum curiosissimũ explorato rem: A great searcher of all kind of learning. He was first scholler and hearer of Polycarpus, from thence either was sent or came to France, & there by Photinus, and the rest of the martyrs was instituted into the ministerie, committed by their letter to Eleutherius, as is before premonished. At length after the martyrdome of Photinus, hee was appointed bishop of Lions, where he continued about the space of three and twenty yeares. In the time of this Irenæus, the state of the church was much troubled, not onely for the outward persecution of the forraigne enemie, but also for diuers sects and errors that sterring against which he diligently laboured, and wrote much, although but few of his bookes be now remaining. The nature of this man well agreeing with his name, was such, that he euer loued peace, and sought to set agreement then any controuersie rose in the church. And therfore, when the question of keeping the Easter day was renued in the church, betweene Victor bishop of Rome, and the churches of Asia, and when Victor would haue excommunicated them as schismaticks, for disagreeing from him therein: Irenæus with other brethren of the French church, loue to se such a contention among brethren for such a trifle, conuented themselues together in a common counsell, and directing their letter with their common consent subscribed, sent vnto Victor, intreating him to stay his purpose, and not to proceed in excommunicating his brethren for that matter. Although they themselues agreed with him in obseruing the sunday Easter as he did: yet with great reasons and arguments exhorted him not to deale so rigorously with his other brethren, following the ancient custome of their countrie manner in that behalfe. And beside this hee wrote diuers other letters about or concerning the same contention, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of no force.

Not long after Irenæus followed also Tertullian, about the time of this Severus and Antoninus Caracalla his sonne, a man both in Greeke and Latine well expert, hauing great gifts in disputing, and in writing eloquent, as his bookes declare, and as the commendation of all learned men doth testifie vnto him. Eusebius Hieronimus & Hilarius giueth such praise, that he calleth him the floure of all Latine writers: and of the eloquence of his stile he thus writeth, that vnder the face of his reasons, he saith, whom he could not perswade, them he compelled to consent vnto him. Into many words, so many sentences, and how many sentences so many victories he had, &c.

Tertullian ecclesiasticall writer.

Such men of doing and writing, God raised vp from time to time, as pillers and staies for his poore church, as he did this Tertullian in the dangerous daies of persecution. For when the christians were bered with wrongs, and falsly accused of the Gentiles: Tertullian taking their cause in hand, defended them against the persecutors, and against their slanderous accusations. First, that they neuer minded any stir or rebellion, either against the empire or emperors of Rome: so much as the vse of christians was to pray for the state of their emperors and gouernors. And where as they were accused falsly to bee enemies to all mankind, holding that (saith Tertullian to Scapula) seeing the proper office of the christians is by their profession to pray for all men, to loue their enemies, neere requiting euill for euill, when as all other doe loue but onely their friends, and scarcely them: As touching the horrible slander of murthering infants, how can that bee true in the christians (saith he) whose order is to abstaine from all blood and strangled vnto so much that it is not lawfull for them to touch the blood of any beast at their tables when they feed: From whence copulation no sort more free then they, which are and euer haue beene the greatest obseruers of chastitie, of whom, such as may, liue in perpetuall virginitie all their life, such as cannot, contract matrimonie, for auoiding all whoredome and fornication. Neither can it bee proued of the christians to worship the same, which false surmise Tertullian declareth to rise hereof, for that the maner of the christians was to pray toward the east. Such lesse was there any of them so mad as to worship an asses head, whereof the occasion being taken onely of the Iewes, the slander thereof therefore he proueth to be falsly and wrongfully laid to the charge of the christians.

The apologie of Tertullian defending the christians.

Tertullianus ad Scapulam.

The occasion hereof, whence came of the Iewes worshipping the law of an asse in the house of Samson.

And likewise against all other lies and slanders, obiected of the heathen against the christians, the said Tertullian purgeth the christians, declaring them falsly to be beleeued, and wrongfully persecuted, not for any desert of theirs, but onely for the hatred of their name. And yet notwithstanding, by the same persecutions, he proueth in the same apologie, the religion of the christians nothing to bee empaired, but rather increased. The more (saith he) we are mowne downe of you, the more rise vp. The blood of christians is seed. For what man (saith he) in beholding the painefull torments, and the perfect patience of them, will not search and inquire what is in the cause? And when hee hath found it out, who will not agree vnto it? And when he agreeth to it, who will not desire to suffer for it? Thus (saith he) this sect will neuer die, which the more it is cut downe, the more it groweth. For euery man seeing and wondering at the sufferance of the saints, is moued the more thereby to search the cause: in searching, he findeth it, and in finding he followeth it. Tertullian in eodem apologe.

Thus Tertullian in this dangerous time of persecution, being stirred vp of God, defended the innocencie of the christians, against the blasphemie of the aduersaries; and moreouer for the instruction of the church hee compiled many fruitfull bookes, whereof some are extant, some are not to bee found. Notwithstanding the great learning and famous vertues of this woorthie man, certaine errors and blemishes are noted in his doctrine, as were before both of Origen and Irenæus, and likewise of them, were they neuer so excellent, that followed them. Which errors all here in order to note and compriehend, were to long a matter for; this stoole to prosecute. This by the way shall be sufficient to admonish the reader, neuer to looke for such perfection of any man in this world, how singular so euer he be (Christ onely excepted) but some blemish or other ioyneth himselfe withall, wherof more perchance shall be said when we come to Cyprian.

The errors and imperfections in learned men noted.

And now to returne againe to the order of bishops of Rome intermitted. After Eleutherius afore mentioned, next in the bishoprike of Rome succeeded Victor, who as Platina saith, died quietly in the daies of Severus. But Damasius, Supplement. lib. 8. and such as doe follow the common chronicles, affirme that he died a martyr, after he had sitten ten (or as some say twelue) yeares. This Victor was of great stature (as partly before is signified) in the controuersie and contention of Easter day. For the which he would haue proceeded in excommunication against the churches of Asia, had not Irenæus then bishop of Lions, with the counsell of other his brethren there assembled, repressed his intended violence. As touching that controuersie of Easter in those daies of the primitiue church, the originall thereof was this, as Cusanus, Socrates, Platina, and others record. First, certaine it is, that the apostles onely being intentiue and attendant to the doctrine of saluation, gaue no heed nor regard to the obseruation of daies and times, neither bound the church to any ceremonies & rites, except those things necessary mentioned in the Acts of the apostles, as strangled & blood, which was obserued then of the holy ghost, not without a most vrgent and necessarie cause, touched partly in the history before. For when the murthering and blood of infants was commonly obiected by the heathen persecutors against the christians, they had no other argument to helpe themselues no to resell the aduersary, but onely their owne law, by the which they were commanded to abstaine not onely from all mens blood, but also from the blood of all common beasts. And therfore that law seemeth by the Apostles spirit to be giuen, and also to the same end continued in the church, so long as the cause, that is, the persecutions of the heathen Gentiles continued. Beside these lawes read of no other ceremonies or rites, which the apostles greatly regarded, but left such things free to the libertie of christians, euery man to vse therein his owne discretion, for the vsing or not vsing thereof. Wherupon, as concerning all the ceremoniall obseruations of daies, times, places, meats, drinks, vestures, and such other: all these things neither was the diuersitie among men greatly noted, nor any vniformitie greatly required. In so much that Irenæus writing to Victor of the tradition of daies, and of fastings, and of the diuersitie of these things then vsed among the primitiue fathers, saith: Nihilo tamen minus omnes illi pacem inter se retinuerunt, & retinemus etiamnum, & semper mutuantia fidei concordiam commendat, &c. that is, Notwithstanding all this variete, all they kept peace among themselues, and yet we kept it still, and this difference of fasting among vs commendeth more the concord of faith. And so long did the doctrine of christian libertie remaine whole and sound in the church till the time of Victor, which was about the yeare of our Lord two hundred, although the diuersitie of the vsages began something before also in the daies of Pius and Anicetus, about the yeare of Christ one hundred fortie and three to be mistaken: yet retraint hereof was not so much urged before, as in the time of Victor. And yet neither in the violence of Victor takes such place, but that the doctrine of christian libertie was defended and maintained by meanes of Irenæus and others, and so continued in the church till after the councell of Nice. And thus much concerning the doctrine of christian libertie of the differences of rites and ceremonies.

Victor bishop of Rome. Victor reproued of some to bee a martyr.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 16.

The doctrine of christian liberte in outward things.

Now to returne to Victor againe, to shew what diuersitie there was in obseruing the day of Easter, and how it came, thus is the storie. First, in the time of Pius and Anicetus the yeare of Christ one hundred fortie and three, the question of Easter day began first to be moued, at what time Pius, by the reuelation of Hermes, decreed the obseruation of that day to bee changed from the wonted maner of the fourteenth day of the moone in the first moneth vnto the next sunday after. After him came Anicetus, Soter, & Eleutherius bishops of Rome, which also determined the same. Against these stood Polita bishop of Sardis, Polycarpus, & as some thinke, Egesippus, with other learned men of Asia. Which Polycarpus being sent by the brethren of Asia, came to Rome as is afore said, to confer with Anicetus cetus in that matter: wherein when they could not agree after long debating, yet notwithstanding, they did both communicate together with reuerence, and so departed in peace. And so the celebration of Easter day remained a disputation, as a thing indifferent in the church, till the time of Victor; who following after Anicetus and his fellowes, and chiefly stirring in this matter, indeuored by all meanes and might, to driue, or rather subdue the churches of Asia vnto his opinion, thinking moreouer to excommunicate all those bishops and churches of Asia, as heretikes & schismatiks, which disagreed from the Romane order: had not Irenæus otherwise restrained him from that doing, as is afore said, which was about the yeare of our Lord one hundred foure score and eleuen, in the reigne of Commodus. Thus then began the vniformitie of keeping that holy day to be first required as a thing necessarie, and all they accounted as heretikes and schismatiks, which dissented from the bishop and tradition of Rome.

With Victor also Theophilus bishop of Cesaria, Narcissus of Ierusalem, Irenæus of Lions, Palmas of Pontus, Bacchillus of Corinth, the bishop of Osroena, and others more. All which condescended to haue the celebration of Easter vpon the sunday, because they would differ from the Iewes in all things as neere as they might, and partly because the resurrection of the Lord fell on the same day.

Of the contrary diuers bishops were in Asia, of whom the principall was Polycrates bishop of Ephesus, who being assembled with a great multitude of bishops and brethren of those parties, by the common assent of the rest, wrote againe to Victor, and to the church of Rome, declaring, that they had euer from the beginning obserued that day, according to the rule of scripture vnchanged, neither adding nor altering any thing from the same. Alleaging moreouer for them the examples of the apostles and holy fathers their predecessors, as Philip the apostle, with his three daughters at Hierapolis: Also John the apostle, and euangelist at Ephesus, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Thraseas at Eumenia bishop and martyr, likewise of Sagaris at Laodicea bishop and martyr, holy Papirius, & Melito at Sardis. Beside these bishops also of his alone kinred, and his olne ancestors, to the number of seuen which all neuer bibbed before him, and the eighth now after them. All which obserued (saith hee) the solemnitie of the same day, after the same wise and sort as we doe now.

Victor, being not a little moued herewith, by letters againe denounceth against them (more bold vpon authoritie, then wise in his commission) violent excommunication, abetted by the vnlouing handling of Irenæus, and other learned men, that matter was staied. Victor otherwise persuaded. What the persuasions of Irenæus were, partly may appeare in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 26. the sum whereof tendeth to this effect: That the variance and difference of ceremonies is no strange matter in the church of Christ, when as this variete is not onely in the day of Easter, but also in the manner of fasting, and in diuers other vsages among the christians. For some fast one day, some two dayes, some others fast more. Others there be, which counting forty houres, both day and night, take that for a full daies fast. And this so diuers fashion of fasting in the church of Christ, began not onely in this our time, but was before among our forefathers. And yet notwithstanding, they with all this diuersitie were in vnitie among themselues, and so bee we: neither doth this difference of ceremonies any thing hinder, but rather commendeth the concord of faith. And thereto both the examples of the fathers, of Telesphorus, Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and such others, who neither obserued the same vsage themselues, nor prescribed it to others, and yet notwithstanding kept christian charitie with such as came to communicate with them, not obseruing the same forme of things which they obserued, as well appeared by Polycarpus and Anicetus, which although they agreed not in one forme of rites, yet refused not to communicate together, the one giuing reuerence vnto the other. Thus the controuersie, being taken vp betweene Irenæus and Victor, remained free to the time of Noen councell. Hæc ex Iren. Eusebius. And thus much concerning the controuersie of that matter, and concerning the doings of Victor.

After Victor succeded in the see of Rome Zephirinus, in the daies of the foresaid Severus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and three. To this Zephirinus are ascribed two epistles, in the first some of the councels. But as I haue said before of the decretall epistles of other Romane bishops: so I say and verily suppose of this; that neither the countenance of the stile, nor the matter therein contained, nor the condition of the time, doth otherwise giue to thinke of these letters, but that they be verily bastard letters, not written by these fathers, nor in these times, but craftily and wickedly packt in by some, which also determined the same. Against these stood Polita bishop of Sardis, Polycarpus, & as some thinke, Egesippus, with other learned men of Asia. Which Polycarpus being sent by the brethren of Asia, came to Rome as is afore said, to confer with

Then to seeke for any primacie or patriarchship, or to driue all other churches to appeale to the see of Rome, or to exempt all priests from the accusation of any tale man: as in the first epistle of Zephirinus is to be seene, written to the bishops of Sicilia, and likewise the second epistle of his to the bishops of the prouince of Egypt, containing no matter of doctrine, nor consolation necessarie for that time, but onely certaine rituall decrees to no purpose, arguethe no lesse but the said epistles neither to haue of that man, nor talt of the time.

Of like credit also semeth the constitution of the patins of glasse, which Damasius saith that the same Zephirinus ordained to be caried before the priest at the celebration of the masse. Against Platina writeth that he ordained the ministration of the sacrament to be no more vsed in vessels of wood, or of glasse, or of any other metall, except onely siluer, gold, and tin, &c. But how these two testimonies of Damasius and Platina ioyne together, let the reader iudge: especially seeing the same decree is referred to Urbanus, that came after him. Against, what needed this decree of golden chalices to be stablished afterward in the councell of Ther and Rhens, if it had been enacted before by Zephirinus? How long this Zephirinus sat, our writers do vary. Eusebius saith, he died in the reigne of Caracalla, & sat seuenteene yeares. Platina writeth that he died vnder Severus, and sat eight yeares, and so saith also Naucerus. Damasius affirmeth he sat fiftéene yeares and two monethes.

Matthews author of the storie intituled Flores historiarum, with other latter chronicles, maketh mention of Perpetua, and Felicitas, and Reuocatus, his brother, also of Saturninus and Satyrus brethren, and Secundulus, which in the persecution of this Severus gaue ouer their liues to martyrdome for Christ, being thotwne to wild beasts and deuoured of the same, in Carthage and in the fiftéenth yeare of Severus raught against from the beasts, was beheaded, and Secundulus died in prison about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and two, as writeth Floilegus.

Severus martereth in Britain.

This Severus the persecutor reigned, as the most part of writers accord, the terme of eightéene yeares, who about the latter time of his reigne came with his armie hither into Britaine, where after many conflicts had with the Britains, in the borders of the north, he cast vp a ditch with a mightie rampire of earth and turffes, and strong stakes, to the length of one hundred thirtie and two miles from the one side of the sea to the other, beginning at Tine, and reached to the Scotish sea: which done, he remoued to Yorke, and there by the breaking in of the northern men & the Scots, was besieged and slaine, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fourteene, leauing behind him two sonnes, Bassianus and Geta. Which Bassianus surnamed Caracalla, after hee had slaine his brother Geta here in Britain, gouerned the empire alone, the space of six yeares. After whose death, he being slaine also of his seruants (as he had slaine his brother before) succeeded Macrinus with his son Diadumenus, to be emperor, who after they had reigned one yeare, were both slaine of their owne people.

After them followed Varius Heliogabalus in the empire, rather to be called a monster then a man, so prodigious was his life in all gluttonie, filthinesse, and ribaudrie. Such was his pompe, that in his lamps he vsed balme, & filled his fishponds with rose water. To let passe his sumptuous vestures which he would not weare but onely of gold, and most costly silkes: his shoes glittering with pretious stones finely engrained, he was neuer twise serued with one kind of meate, he neuer wore one garment twice. And likewise for his fleshly wickednesse, some daies his companie was serued at meale with the braines of ostriches, & a strange foiole called phenocoptery, an other day with the tongues of popingais, and other sweet flesh ing birds. Being nigh to the sea, he neuer vsed fish: in places far distant from the sea, all his boule was serued with most delicate fishes: at one supper he was serued with seuen thousand fishes, and fiue thousand foules. At his removing in his progresse, often there followed him six hundred chariots laden onely with bauds, common harlots, and ribauds. He sacrificed with yong children, and preferred to the best aduancements in the common weale most light personages, as bauds, minstrels, carters, and such like: in one word, he was an enemie to all honestie and good order. And when he was foretold by his sorcerers and astronomers, that he should die a violent death, he prouided ropes of silke to hang himselfe, two dos of gold to kill himselfe and strong poyson in iacinths, and emrauds to poison himselfe, if needs he must thereto be forced; moreouer he made an high tower, hauing the floore of bords couered with gold plate, bordered with pretious stones from the which tower he would throw himselfe downe, if he should be driuen of his enemies. But notwithstanding all his prouision, he was slaine of the soulders, drawen through the citie, and cast into Tiber, after he had reigned two yeares and eight moneths, as witnesseth Eutropius others say foure yeares.

Zephirinus bishop of Rome. Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 21. Heliogabalus slaine of his soulders. Ex Eutropio. Alexander Severus emperor. Anno 224

This Heliogabalus, hauing no issue, adopted to his sonne and heire Aurelius Alexander Severus, the sonne of Mammea, who entring his reigne the yeare of our Lord one hundred twentie and four, continued thirteene yeares, well commended for vertuous, wise, gentle, liberall, and to no man hurtfull. And as hee was not vnlearned himselfe though, the diligent education of Mammea his mother, so he was a great fauourer of men wise and learned. Neither did hee any thing in the common weale, without the assistence of learned and sage counsellors. It is reported of him, to beare such stomacke against corrupt iudges, that when he chanced to meete with any of them, by the commotion of his minde he would cast vp choler, being so moued with them that he could not speake, and was ready with his two fingers to put out their eies. From his court he dismissed all superfluous and vnnedefull seruants, saying, that he was no god pupill, which fed idle seruants with the bowels of his common weale.

Against corrupt iudges.

The hoording of Alexander to be noted and followed.

Vile seruants cast vp by the bowels of the common weale.

Among his other god vertues, it appeareth also that he was friendly and fauourable vnto the christians, as by this at may be gathered: for when the christians had occupied a certaine publike place in some god vse, belike for the assembling and conuenting together of the congregation, the company of the cokes or tiplers made challenge of that place to belong vnto them. The matter being brought before the emperor, he iudged it more honest, the place to the worship of God, howsoeuer it were, then to the dirtie slubbering of cokes and scullians.

A rare worthie to be marked.

By this it may be vnderstood, that in Rome no christian churches were erected vnto this time, when as yet (notwithstanding this fauor of the emperor) no publike house could quietly be obtained for the christians. So that by the reason hereof may appeare the decretall epistle and ordinance of pope Higinus, concerning the dedication of churches aboue mentioned to be falsified. And likewise the ordinance of Pius his successor, concerning the altar, or Superalare to be also false. For what Superalare was it like they had in the time of Higinus and Pius, when as this time which was long after, no publike place almost could be granted them for the christians to assemble together?

Platina in vita Pontiani.

Of this Alexander Platina writeth, that as he was a great hater of all boasters and flatterers, so he was of such prudence, that no deceit could escape him, and bringeth in a storie of one Turtius, who had gotten craftily many great bribes and gifts, in making the people beleeue that he was of great authoritie with the emperor, and that he could helpe them to what soeuer they sued for. Whereof the emperor being certified, caused him in the open market to be fastened to a stake, and there billed with smoke, where the crier stod thus crying to the people: Smoke he sold, and with smoke he is punished.

Punished with smoke, that sold smoke.

Mammea, the mother of this Alexander aboue mentioned (whom Herome calleth a deuout and religious woman) hearing of the fame and the excellent learning of Origen, being then at Alexandria, sent for him to Antio-, desirous to heare and see him: vnto whom the foresaid Origen according to her request resorted, and after that he had there remained a space with the emperour and his mother, returned againe to Alexandria.

Mammea the mother of the emperor.

And thus continued this god emperor his raigne the space of thirteene yeeres, at length at a commotion in Germanie, with his mother Mammea he was slaine. After whom succeded Maximinus, contrarie to the mind of the senat, onely appointed by the souldiers to be emperor. During all this time betweene Seuerus and this Maximinus, the church of Christ, although it had not perfect peace, yet it had some meane tranquillitie from persecution. Albeit some martyrs there were at this time that suffered, whereof Eusebius giueth this reason: For although (saith he) Alexander being persecuted sought the intreating of his mother Mammea, did fauor the christians yet notwithstanding, there was no publike edict or proclamation prouided for their safegard. By reason whereof, diuers there were which suffred martyrdome vnder Almachius and other iudges. In the number of whom after some stories, was Calixtus bishop of Rome, who succeded next vnto Zephirinus aboue mentioned; and after him Urbanus also, which both being bishops of Rome, did both suffer, by the opinion of some writers, vnder Alexander Seuerus.

Ex Nauclero.

Calixtus bishop of Rome and martyr.

This Calixtus in his two decretall epistles, written to Benedictus, and to the bishops of France, giueth these ordinances, that no actions or accusations against the prelats or teachers of the church should bee receiued, that no secret conspiracies should be made against bishops: item, no man to communicate with persons excommunicate: also no bishop to communicate or to deale in an others diocesse. And here herpon doth the diocesse, or the parish of any bishop or minister to bee his wife. The wife (saith the apostle) is bound to the law, so long as the husband liueth: when he is dead, she is free from the law: so (saith Calixtus) the wife of a bishop (which is his church) so long as he liueth, is bound duely to him, neither ought to bee iudged or disposed by any other man, without his will and iudgement: after his death she is free from the law, to marrie to whom she will, so it be in the Lord, that is, Regularier, regularly. In the end of the said his epistle decretall, he confuteth the error of them which hold, that they which are fallen, are not to be received againe. Which heresie after the time of Calixtus or Calistus, came in first by Nouatus, in the daies of Cornelius. Moreouer, in his said first epistle decretall, is contened the fast of the foure times, commonly called the Ember fast, whereof also Sarianus Scotus maketh mention. But Damasus speaking of the same fast, saith, he ordained the fast but of three times, which was for the increase of corne, wine, and oyle.

The decretall epistles of Calixtus examined

The place of S. Paul vnfitly expounded.

Ember fast first ordained.

By these hitherto premised, it is not hard for a quicke reader to finell out the craftie ingining of that person or persons whosoeuer they were, that falsely haue ascribed these decretall institutions to those holy fathers. For first, what leisure had the christians to lay in their accusations, against their bishops, then we neuer reade nor find in any storie any kinde of variance in those daies among them, but all loue, mutuall compassion, and hartie communion among the saints: And as wee read of no variance among the people in those daies, nor of any fault or backsliding among the bishops, who for the most part then died all constant martyrs: so neither doe we read of any tribunall seate or constitorie vsed or frequented then about any such matters. Againe, if a man examine well the dangers of those busie daies, he shall see the poore flocke of the christians so occupied and pitifullie oppressed by the cruell accusations of the heathen infidels, that though the cause bid, yet the time would not serue them to commense any law against their bishops. Secondly, as touching their conspiracy against bishops, that conspiracie either would they then practise against them, which alwaies gaue their lines for their defence: Or how could they then conspire in any companies together, when neuer a true christian durst put his head out of his doores, neither was there in the church any christian in those perillous daies, except he were a true man indeed, such as were far from all false conspiracies? And when as all the world almost in all places conspired against them: what time, what cause, or what heart trow yee could they haue to conspire against their instructors? Thirdly, concerning the confutation of the decretalles, how standeth the confutation with the time of Calixtus, when Donatus the author that heresie was after him in the time of Cornelius? Fourthly, if by the laton of Calixtus euery diocesse bee the proper wife of euery bishop or minister, then hold many bishops wiues, and parsons wiues had the aduouterous pope of Rome beloued in these latter daies of the church, which so prodily and impudently hath intermedled and taken his pleasure and his olunie profit, in euery diocesse and parish almost throughout all christendome, without all leaue and licence of the good man, who hath been in the meane time, and yet is compelled still, wheresoeuer the popes holinesse commeth, Vigilante flertere nafo, and to giue him leaue to aske it, to doe what he list. Wherefore if this canon decretal be truely his, why is it not obserued, so as it both stand without exception? If it be not, why is it then falsely forged vpon him, & the church of Christ deceiued? And concerning lamentable it is, that this falsifying of such trifling traditions vnder the false pretence of antiquitie, either was begun in the church to deceiue the people: or that it hath remained so long vndetected. For as I thinke, the church of Christ will neuer bee perfectly reformed, before these decretall constitutions and epistles which haue so long put on the visor of antiquitie, shall be fullie detected, and appeare in their owne colours, wherein they were first painted.

Against the decretall epistles and constitutions.

And yet neither do I say this, as thinke contrarie, but that it may be, that bishops of Rome and of the same name haue beene the true authois of these traditions. But here commeth in the error (as I credibile suppose) that when other latter bishops of the like name haue deuised these ceremoniall inuentions, the vulgar opinion of men hath transferred them to the first primitiue fathers, although being of an other time, yet bearing the same name with the true inuentors thereof. But of Calixtus enough: who as Damasus saith, in the daies of this Alexander Seuerus died a martyr. Vincentius affirmeth that he was tied to a great stone, and so out of a window was throwen into a ditch. Eusebius speaking of his death, maketh no mention of his martyrdome, and saith hee lat fiue yeares, Platina saith six yeares, Sabellicus giueth him seuen yeares, and so doth Damasus.

Calixtus a martyr. Ex Dionysio in epist. ad Antiochen. lib. 7. cap. 6.

After Calixtus followed Urbanus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred twentie and seuen, who in his epistle decretall (comming out of the same forge) which he wrote in common to all bishops, making no mention of the heanie persecutions of the church, nor ministring any exhortation of comfort or constancie to the brethren, onely giueth many strict precepts, for not trusting nor esteeming the gods of the church, and to pay truely their offerings, which they vsed to haue all common among the clergie. Moreouer, about the end of his epistle he instituteth the confirmation of children after baptisme (which the papists be wont to take into the number of their seuen sacraments) affirming & denouncing more then scripture will beare, that the imposition of the bishops hand bringeth the Holy-ghost, and therefo to be made full christians, &c. But of these decretall epistles inough is said before, more hap hereafter considered of the discreet reader. Marianus Scotus, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, and other late storie writers doe hold as is aforesaid, that he died a martyr in the daies of Alexander Seuerus, after he had gouerned that seat foure yeares, as Damasus and Platina do witnesse, as Sarianus saith, eight yeares.

Urbanus bishop of Rome. Anno 227

Urbanus martyred.

The same Damasus & Platina do testifie of him, that he by his preaching and holinesse of life conuerted diuers Ethniks to the faith. Among whom were Tiburtius and Valerianus the husband of Cecilia, which both being noble men of Rome, Tiburtius, Valerianus, martyrs.

Rome, remained constant in the faith vnto the end and martyrdome. Of this Cecilia thus it is written in the martyrologe by Ado, that Cecilia the virgin, after she had brought Valerian his husband espoused, and Tiburtius his brother to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and with his exhortations had made them constant vnto martyrdome, after the suffering of them she was also apprehended by Almachius the ruler, and brought to the bolts to do sacrifice: which thing when she abhorred to doe, she should be presented before the iudge to haue the condemnation of death. In the meane time, the sergeants and officers which were about his beholding his comely beautie, and the prudent behauior in his conuersation, began with many persuasions of words to solicite his mind to fauour his selfe, & that for excellent beauty, and not to cast his selfe away, &c. But she against to replied to them with reasons and godly exhortations, that by the grace of almighty God their hearts began to kindle, and at length to yeeld to that religion, which before they did persecute. Which thing she perceiuing desired of the iudge Almachius a little respit: which being granted, she sendeth for Urbanus the bishop home to his house, to stablish and ground them in the faith of Christ: and so were they with diuers others at the same time baptised both men and women, to the number (as the storie saith) of foure hundred persons, among whom was one Gordianus a noble man. This done, this blessed martyr was brought before the iudge where she was condemned; then after was brought to the house of the iudge, where she was inclosed in a hot bath, but she remaining there a whole day and night without any hart, as in a cold place, was brought out againe, and commandement giuen that in the bath she should bee beheaded. The executor is said to haue foure blowes at her or more, and yet for hast making cut off, she (as the storie giueth) liued three dayes after, and so died this holy virgin martyr, whose bodie in the night season Urbanus the bishop tooke and buried among the other bishops. Also the compiler of this martyrologe addeth that this was done in the time of Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus. But that cannot be, for so much as Urbanus by all histories was long after those emperors, and liued in the daies of this Alexander, as is aboue declared. Antoninus, Vincentius, Gesnius, Equilinus, with such other writers set forth this history with many strange miracles wrought by the said Cecilia, in conuerting her husband Valerianus and his brother, in shewing them the angell which was the keeper of her virginitie, and of the angell putting on crowines vpon their heads. But as touching these miracles, as I do not dispute whether they bee true or fabulous, so beside that they haue no certaine nor sufficient or graue authors, but taken out of certaine new legendes, I doe therefore refer them thither from whence they came.

The martyrdome of Cecilia.

Cecilia martyr. Ex martyrologio Adonis.

Origenes de martyrio.

Under the same Alexander diuers others there be, whom Bergomensis mentioned to haue suffred martyrdome, as one Agapetus of the age of fifteene yeres, who being apprehended and condemned at Penestle in Italie, because he would not sacrifice to idols, was assailed with single commentes, first with whips scourged, then hanged vp by the feet, after hauing hot water poured vpon them, at the last cast to the wild beasts: with all which tormentes when he could not bee hurt, finallie, with sword was beheaded. The executor of these punishments (as by Henricus Erfordiensis may be gathered) was one Antiochus, who in the executing of the foresaid tormentes suddenly fell downe from his iudicial seat, crying out, that all his inward bowels burned within him, and so gaue vp the breath. Henr. de Erfordia lib. 6. cap. 29.

Agapetus a bleſſed martyr. Ex Bergomensis lib. 8.

A notable example of Gods iuſt plague vpon a persecutor. Ex Henr. Erfordiensis lib. 6.

Also with the same Agapetus is numbred Calepodius a minister of Rome, whose body first was drawen through the citie of Rome, and after cast into Tiber. Bergo. ibidem.

Calepodius martyr.

Then followeth Pammachius a senator of Rome, with his wife and children, and others both men and women, to the number of fortie and two.

Pammachius with his wife and children martyrs.

After, another noble senator of Rome named Simplicius, all which together in one day had their heads smitten off, and their heads after hanged vp in diuers gates of the citie for a terror of others, that none should profeſſe the name of Christ.

Fortie and two martyrs. Simplicius martyr.

Besides these suffred also Quirinus a noble man of Rome, who with his mother Iulla and a great number more, were put likewise to death.

Quirinus, Iulla his mother, martyrs.

Tiburtius, Valerianus, brethren and martyrs.

Tiburtius, Valerianus, citizens of Rome, and brethren, suffred (as Bergomensis saith) the same time, who first being buried and broken with bats, after were beheaded.

Martina a virgin and martyr.

Also Vincentius, Bergomensis, and Erfordiensis, make mention of Martina a christian virgin, which after diuers bitter punishments being constant in pit saith, suffered in like maner by the sword.

Albeit as touching the time of these so named martyrs, as I find them not in other writers: so do I suppose them to suffer vnder Parminius or Decius, rather then vnder Alexander.

The sixth persecution.

Maximinus emperor and persecutor. The sixth persecution. Anno 237

After the death of Alexander the emperor, who with his mother Mammea (as is said) was murdered in Germanie, followed Maximinus, chosen by the will of the souldiers, rather then by the authority of the senat, about the yeare of our Lord, two hundred thirtie and seuen, who for the hatred he had to the house of Alexander (as Eusebius recordeth) raised vp the sixth persecution against the christians, especially against the teachers and leaders of the church, thinking thereby the sooner to vanquish the rest, if the captaines of them were removed out of the way. Whereby I suppose rather the martyrdome of Urbanus the bishop, and of the rest aboue specified, to haue happned vnder the tyrannie of this Maximinus then vnder Alexander. In the time of this persecution, Origen wrote his booke De martyrio: which booke if it were extant would giue vs some knowledge, I doubt not, of such as in this persecution did suffer, which now lie in silence vnknowen: and no doubt but a great number they were and more should haue been, had not the prouident mercie of God shortened his daies and limbled his tyrannie, for he reigned but three yeares. After whom succeded Gordianus in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fortie, a man no lesse studious for the vtilitie of the common wealth, as mild and gentle to the christians. This Gordianus, after he had gouerned with much peace and tranquillitie the monarchie of Rome the space of six yeares, was slaine of Philip emperor after him.

Gordianus emperor. Anno 240

In the daies of these emperors aboue recited, was Pontianus bishop of Rome, who succeded next after Urbanus aboue rehearsed, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred thirtie and six, in the twelfth yere of Alexander, as Eusseb. lib. 6. cap. 28. noteth, declaring him to sit fiue yeares. Contrarie Damasius and Platina write, that he was bishop nine yeres and a halfe, and that in the time of Alexander, he with Philippus his priest was banished into Sardinia, and there died. But it seemeth more probable that he was rather banished vnder Parminus, and died in the beginning of the reigne of Gordianus. In his epistles decretall (which seeme likewise to be fained) he appeareth very deuout after the common example of other bishops to vphold the dignitie of priests and of clergie men, saying; that God hath them so familiar with him, that by them he accepteth the offerings and oblations of others, & forgiueth their sins, and reconcileth them vnto him also, that they to make the bodie of the Lord with their diuine mouth, and giue it to others, &c. which doctrine how it standeth with the testament of God and glorie of Christ, let the reader vse his diuine iudgement.

Pontianus bishop of Rome. Diuersitie betweene Damasus and Eusebius. Pontianus banished.

This doctrine feigned to bergamasis to Christ and blasphemous.

Other notable fathers also in the same time were raised vp in the church, as Philetus bishop of Antioch, which succeded after Asclepiades afore mentioned, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and twentie, and after him Zebinus bishop of the same place, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fortie.

Philetus & Zebinus bishops.

To these also may be added Ammonius schoolmaster of Origen, as Suidas suppoleth, also the sinnen of Porphyrie the great enimie of Christ: notwithstanding, this Ammonius indued with better grace, as he left diuers bookes in defence of Christs religion, so did he constantly persteere (as Eusebius reporteth) in the doctrine of Christ which he had in the beginning receiued, who was about the daies of Alexander.

Ammonius a christian writer.

Julius Aphricanus also about the time of Gordianus aforesaid, is numbred among the old and ancient writers, of whom Nicephorus writeth to bee the scholar of Origen, and a great writer of histories of that time.

Julius Aphricanus writer.

Unto these doctors and counsellors may be adioyned the fauris of Natalius mentioned in the first booke of Eusebius. This Natalius had suffered persecution before like a constant confessor, who being seduced & perſuaded by Asclepiodotus & Theodonus (which were the disciples of Theodocus) to take vpon him to bee bishop of their sect, promising to giue euery moneth an hundred and fiftie pieces of siluer, and to be ioyning himselfe to them, was admonished by vision & reuelation from the Lord, for such was the great mercy of God & our Lord Christ Jesu, that he would not his martyr (which had suffered so much for his sake) so to perish out of his church: for which cause (saith Eusebius) God by certaine visions did admonish him; but he not taking great heed thereunto, being blinded partly with lucre, partly with honor, was at length all the night long scourged of the angels, in so much that he being made herby very foie, and early on the morrow putting on sackecloth, with much weeping & lamentation went to Zephirinus the bishop of Rome mentioned, where he falling downe before him & all the christian congregation, shewed them the stripes of his body, and praied them for the mercies of Christ, that he might be receiued into their communion againe, from which he had sequestred himselfe before, and so was admitted according as he desired.

Natalius, confessor. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 28.

The Lord will not leaue them which haue done or suffered any thing for him.

After the deceasse of Pontianus bishop of Rome afore mentioned, succeded next in that place Antertus, of whom Eusardus writeth, that Pontianus departing away, did substitute him in his roome: but Eusebius writeth that he succeeded immediatly after him. Damasus saith, that because he caused the acts and deaths of the martyrs to be written, therfore he was put to martyrdome himselfe by Parminus the iudge. Concerning the time of this bishop our writers do greatly iar. Eusebius and Sarianus Scotus affirme that he was bishop but one moneth, Sabellicus saith that not to be so. Damasus affgreeth to him in the yeres one moneth. Violatchus, Bergomensis, and Henricus Erfordiensis, giue to him three yeres and one moneth. Nauclerus writeth that he sat one yeare and one moneth. All which are so far discrepant one from another, that which of them most agreeth with truth, it lieth in doubt. Next to this bishop was Fabianus, of whom more is to be said hereafter.

Of Hippolytus also both Eusebius and Hieronymus maketh mention that he was a bishop, but where, they make no relation. And so likewise both Theodoretus writeth him to be a bishop, and also a martyr, but naming no place. Gelasius contra Eutychen saith, hee died a martyr, & that he was bishop of an head city in Arabie. Nicephorus writeth, that hee was bishop of Oliva, a port towne neere to Rome. Certaine it is, hee was a great writer, and left many workes in the church, which Eusebius and Hierome do recite: by the supputation of Eusebius, he was about the yeare of our Lord, two hundred & thirty.

Dindentius Deirlepha.

Dindentius in his Persephanon, making mention of great heapes of martyrs buried by themselves together, speaketh also of Hippolytus, and saith that hee was drawen with wild beastes through fields, dales and bushes, and describeth thereof a pitifull storie.

Philippus emperor. Anno 246

Philippus the first christian emperor.

After the emperor Gordianus, the empire fell to Philippus, who with Philip his son governed the space of fiuer yeares, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred fortie and fiue. This Philippus with his son and all his familie was christened and commerted by Fabianus and Origen, who by letters exhorted him and Seuera his wife to be baptised, being the first of all the emperors that brought in christianitie into the imperiall seat. Howbeit Dionysius Letus reporteth of him to be a dissembling painted thing: it is certaine, that for his christianitie he with his son was slaine. Decreta de his Philippensis, lib. 8. wherein this hatred of Decius against Philippus to be conceiued, for that the emperor Philip both the father and the son had committed their treasures vnto Fabianus then bishop of Rome.

Philippus slaine.

The seuenth persecution.

Decius emperor. Anno 250

The seuenth persecution. The cause and occasion of this persecution. Fabianus bishop of Rome.

THus Philippus being slaine, after him Decius inuaded the crowne about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fifty, by whom was moued a terrible persecution against the christians, which Decius noteth to be the seuenth persecution. The first occasion of this hatred and persecution of this tyrant conceiued against the christians, was chiefly (as is before touched) because of the treasures of the emperor, which were committed to Fabian the bishop.

Euseb. lib. 6.

This Fabian first being a maried man (as Platina writeth) was made bishop of Rome after Anterius aboue mentioned by the miraculous appointment of God, which Eusebius doth thus describe in his fifth book. When the brethren (saith he) were together in the congregation about the election of their bishop, and had purposed among themselues vpon the nomination of some noble and worthie personage of Rome, it chanced that Fabianus among others was there present, who of late before was newly come out of the countrie to inhabit in the citie. This Fabian as is said, thinking nothing lesse then of any such matter, suddenly commeth a doue flying from aboue, and sitteth vpon his head, wherewpon all the congregation being moued, with one mind and one voice the chiefe him for their bishop, in the which function he remained the space of fifteene yeares, as Eusebius writeth; Damasus, Marianus, and Sabellicus say fourteene yeares vnto the time of Decius: who, whether for that Philippus had committed to him his treasures or whether for the hatred he bare to Philippus, in the beginning of his raigne caused him to be put to death, sending out moreouer his precepts and writs to all quarters, that all wholy prohibited the name of Christ should be slaine.

The first ordinations of Fabianus recited. Cyle and exorcist. A ruling of liturgie. Appealing to citeis apostolicall. Marriage not without the holy degree.

To this Fabian he ascribed certaine ordinances, as of consecrating new oyle once euery yere, and burning the old, of accusations against bishops of appealing to the see apostolike, of not marying within the fift degree, of communicating three a yeare, of offring euery sunday, with such other things more in his three epistles decretalles, which epistles, as the diuers other euidences may be supposed to be truely named vpon him, giuing no signification of any matter agreeing to that time: to doe I find the most part of the third epistle word for word standing in the epistle of Sixtus the third, which followed almost two hundred yeares after him, beside the brisenesse doctrine also in the end of the said epistles contained where he commaunds to the intent of the gospell applieth remission of sins (onely due to the blood of Christ) vnto the offerings of bread and wine by men and women euery sunday in the church.

False doctrine detected.

Origen.

To this Fabianus wrote Origen De orthodoxia fidei, that is, Of the right cousines of his faith wherby is to be vnderstood, that he continued to the time of Decius: some say also to the time of Gallus. Of this Origen partly mention is touched before, declaring how both a learned he was in the daies of Seuerus, in assisting confirming, exhorting and kindling the martyrs that were imprisoned and suffred for the name of Christ, with such danger of his owne life, that had not been the singular protection of God, he had been stoned to death many times of the heathen multitude. Such great concourse of men and women was daily to his house to bee catechised and instructed in the christian faith by him that foulders were hired of purpose to beleeue the place where he taught them. Againe, such search sometime was set for him, that scarcely any shifting of place or countrie could couer him. In whose laborious trauels and affaires of the church, in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting, and expounding, he continued about the space of fiftie two yeares, vnto the time of Decius and Gallus. Diuers and great persecutions he sustained, but especially vnder Decius, as testifieth Eusebius in his sixth booke, and declaring that for the doctrine of Christ he sustained bandes and torments in his body, rackings with bars of iron, dungeons, besides terrible threats of death and burning. All this he suffred in the persecution of Decius, as Eusebius recordeth of him, and maketh no relation of any further matter. But Suidas and Nicephorus following the same, saith further concerning him, that the said Origen after diuers and fundrie other torments which he manfully and constantly suffred for Christ, at length was brought to an altar, where a foule filthie Ethiop was appointed to be, and there this option or choice was offered vnto him, whether he would sacrifice to the Idol, or to haue his body polluted with that foule and ogliе Ethiop. Then Origen (saith hee) who with philosophicall mind euer kept his chastitie vndefiled, much abhorring that filthie villanie to bee done to his bodie, condescended to their request: whereupon he hadge putting incense in his hand, caused him to set it to the fire vpon the altar: for the which impietie hee afterward was excommunicated of the church. Epiphanius writeth that he being vrged to sacrifice to idols, and taking the boughes in his hand, wherewith the beasts were wont to honor their gods, called vpon the christians to come and do honor to Christ. The which fact the church of Alexandria misliking, removed him from their communion: whereupon Origen driuen away with shame and horrour out of Alexandria, went into Iurie, where being in Ierusalem among the congregation, and there requested of the priests and ministers, he being also a priest, to make some exhortation in the church, refused a great while to doe. At length by importunate petition being constrained thereunto, role vp, and turning the booke as though he would haue expounded some place of the scripture, onely read the verse of the fortie ninth psalme: But God said to the sinner, why dost thou preach my iustifications and why bost thou take my testament in thy mouth? &c. Which verse being read, he shut the booke, and sat downe weeping and waling, the whole congregation also weeping and lamenting with him. Vnto Niceph. Doze what became of Origen it is not found in history, but only that Suidas addeth, he died and was buried at Tyrus. Eusebius affirmeth, that hee departed vnder the emperor Gallus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred fiftie and fiue, and the seuentih yere of his age, in great miserie (as appeareth) and penurie.

In this Origen diuers blemishes of doctrine bee noted, whereupon Hierome sometimes doth inueigh against him; at best in some places against his doth extoll and commend him for his excellent learning, as in his apologie against Ruff. and in his epistle to Pammachius and Ocean, where he praiseth Origen, although not for the perfection of his faith and doctrine, nor for an apostle, yet for an excellent interpretor, for his wit, and for a philosopher: and yet in his prologue vpon the homilies of Origen on Ezechiell, he calleth him another master of the churches after the apostles. And in an other preface vpon his questions vpon Genesis, hee writheth to himselfe the knowledge of the scriptures, which Origen had, also with the ennie of his name. Athanasius moreouer calleth him singular and laborious, and vseth also his testimonies against the Arians. Socrates, Lib. 6. cap. 13.

Besides his singular order of life he requireth next to speake of Heraclas his scholer, a man singularly commended for his knowledge, not onely in philosophie, but also in all liberall faculties as to a christian diuine doe appertaine. This great towardnes of wit & learning when Origen perceiued in him, he appointed him aboue all others to be his scholer & vnderteacher, to helpe in his schole of vniuersitie of Alexandria in the reigne of Antonius Caracalla sonne of Seuerus. And after in the tenth yeare of Alexander, Origen departing vnto Cesaria, he succeeded in his roome to gouerne the schole in Alexandria. Further also, in the time of Gordianus after the decease of Demetrius bishop of Alexandria, this Heraclas succeeded to be bishop of the said citie: Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 29. In the which function he ministred the terme of sixteene yeres. Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 35. Of this Heraclas writeth Origen himselfe, that hee, although being priest, yet ceased not to read ouer and perule the bookes of the Gentiles, to the intent he might the better out of their diuine bookes confute their errors, &c.

Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 29.

Heraclas called pope, yet no bishop of Rome.

After Heraclas succeeded Dionysius Alexandrinus in the bishoprike of Alexandria, like as he succeeded him in the schole before: which Dionysius also writeth of the same Heraclas vnto Philemon a priest of Rome, thus saying; Hunc ego canonem & typum a beato Heraclа pontifice accepi, &c. that is, This canon and type I receiued of blessed Heraclas, our pope, &c. This Heraclas was no martyr, which died three yeares before Decius about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fiftie. After whom succeeded next in the same seat of Alexandria Dionysius Alexandrinus, who also suffered much vnder the tyrannie of Decius as hereafter shall be shewed (Christ willing) when we come to the time of Valerian.

Anno 250

Eusebius moreouer in the first booke treeteth of the epistles of Dionysius Alexandrinus, diuers that he suffred diuerslie at Alexandria; the which places of Dionysius, as they be cited in Eusebius, I thought here good for the ancientnesse of the author to insert and notifie in his owne woords, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius bishop of Antioch, as followeth.

Ex Nicepb. lib. 5. cap. 29.

Eorchorous in his first booke and others which write of this persecution vnder Decius declare the horriblenesse thereof to be so great and so innumerable martyrs to suffer in the same, that he saith it is as easie to number the sands of the sea, as to recite the particular names of them whom this persecution did deuour. In the which persecution the chiefest doctors and teachers vnder the emperor appeare in the historie of Nicentius to be these: Optimus the vnder consull, Secundianus, Marianus, and Marcellianus, &c. Although therefore it be hard here to insert all and singular persons in order that died in this persecution, yet such as remaine most notable in stories, I will briefly touch by the grace of him for whose cause they suffred.

Persecutors.

Alexander bishop of Hierusalem, martyr.

In the former reaction of the first persecution, mention was made before of Alexander bishop of Hierusalem, and of his troubles suffred vnder Severus, and how afterward by the miracle of God he was appointed bishop of Hierusalem, where he continued a verie aged man aboue the terme of fortie yeares gouernor of that church, till the time of the first yere of Decius, at what time he being brought from Hierusalem to Cesarea into the iudgement place, after a constant and stedfast confession of his faith made before the iudge, was committed vnto prison, and there finished his life, as testifieth Dionysius Alexandrinus in the first booke of Eusebius. After whome succeeded in that seat Mezabanes the thirtie and first bishop of that citie, after Iames the apostle.

Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 40.

Asclepiades bishop of Antioch, martyr. Ex Hieron. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 5. Epist. of Gaius circius reppounde.

Asclepiades bishop of Antioch, martyr.

Asclepiades also before of Asclepiades bishop of Antioch, suffred vnder Serapion, and in the persecution of Severus did likewise persuere a constant confessio, and as Vincent. testifieth in his eleuenth booke, suffred martyrdome at last vnder this Decius. But this computation of Vincentius can in no wise agree with the truth of time, for somuch as by probable writers, as Zonaras, Nicephorus, and others, the said Asclepiades after Serapion, entred the bishops seat of Antioch, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fourteene, & not fiftie yeare before the time of Gordianus, after whom succeded Philetus, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred twentie & one, gouerning the function twelue yeares. And after him Zebinus followed in the yeare of our Lord two hundred thirtie and two, and so after him Babylas, which Babylas if he died in this persecution of Decius, then could not Asclepiades also suffer in the same time, seeing he long before him was deceased.

Babylas bishop of Antioch, martyr. Ex Christ. lib. contra Gentiles. The death of Babylas.

The story of Babylas bishop of Antioch, & the oracles of Apollo.

The repentance of the persecutors of Babylas bishop of Antioch, Eusebius and Zonaras record, that vnder Decius he died in prison, as did Alexander bishop of Hierusalem aboue rehearsed.

The same Babylas bishop of Antioch, Eusebius and Zonaras record, that vnder Decius he died in prison, as did Alexander bishop of Hierusalem aboue rehearsed.

The tale of Babylas, read in a certeine treatise of Chrysostome, intituled Contra Gentiles, a notable and a long historie of one Babylas a martyr, who about these times was put to death for resisting a certeine emperor, not suffring him to enter into the temple of the Christians vntill the murder committed, the story of which murder is this. There was a certeine emperor, who vpon conclusion of peace made with a certeine nation, had receiued for hostage of furetie of peace the sonne of the king being of young and tender age, with conditions vpon the same, that neither he should be molested of them, nor that they should euer be vexed of him. Vpon this the kings sonne was deliuered not without great care & store of the father vnto the emperor, whom the cruell emperor contrarie to promise, caused in short time without all fault cause to be slaine. This fact so horrible being committed, the tyrant with all haste would enter into the temple of the christians, where Babylas being bishop or minister, withstood him that he should not into that place approch. The emperor therewith not a little incensed, in great rage bade him forthwith to be laid in prison with as many irons as he could beare, & from thence to attic after to be brought forth to death and execution. Babylas going constantie and boldlie to his martyrdome, desired after his death to be buried with his irons & bands, & so he was. The losie proceedeth moreouer, and saith, that in continuance of time in the reigne of Constantius Gallus then made the questor of the East partes, caused the bones of Babylas to be translated into the suburbs of Antioch called Daphnes, where was a temple of Apollo, famous with diuelish oracles and answers giuen by that idoll, or by the diuell rather in that place. In the which temple after the bringing of the bodie of Babylas, the idoll ceased to giue anie more oracles, saying, that for the bodie of Babylas hee could giue no more answers, but complaining that that place was wont to be consecrated vnto him, but now it is full of dead mens bodies. And thus the oracles there ceased for that time till the comming of Iulianus, who inquiring out the cause why the oracles ceased, caused the bones of the holie martyr to be remoued againe from thence by the christians, whom he then called Galileans. They comming in a great multitude both men, maidens, & children, to the tomb of Babylas, transported his bones according to the commandement of the emperor, singing by the waie as they went, the verse of the psalme in words as followeth; Confounded be all that worship images, and all that glorie in idols, &c. Which coming to the emperors ears, set him in great rage against the christians, stirring vp persecution against them. Albeit Zonaras declareth the cause something otherwise, saying, that so soone as the bodie of him & other martyrs were remoued & translated out of the temple of the idoll with the image, in the night time fire came from heauen & burnt the temple, with the image: which Iulian seeing, fiered vp with anger, persecuted the christians, as shall be shewed (Christ willing) in his order & place hereafter.

Ex Zonara, tom. 3.

And thus much of Babylas, which whether it was the same Babylas bishop then of Antioch, or an other of the same name, it appereth not by Chrysostome, which neither maketh mention of the emperors name, nor of the place where this Babylas was bishop. Againe, the stopping of the emperor out of the church impieth as much, as that emperor to haue beene a christian: for otherwise, if he had come in as an heathen and as a persecutor, it was not then the maner of christian bishops violentlie to withstand the emperors or to stop them out. Diuer and beside the testimonie of Eusebius, Zonaras doth witnesse contrarie in his first booke, that this Babylas which was then bishop of Antioch after Zebinus, was not put to death by the tormentors, but died in prison: wherefore it is not impossible, but this Babylas and this emperor which Chrysostome speaketh of, may be an other Babylas then that which suffered vnder Decius. Nicephorus in his fift booke maketh mention of an other Babylas beside this that suffred vnder Decius, which was bishop of Nicomedia.

In the forenamed citie of Antioch, Vincentius lib. 11. speaketh of fortie virgins martyrs, which suffred in this persecution of Decius.

Fortie virgins martyrs.

In the countrie of Phrygia, and in the towne of Lampsar, the same Vincentius also speaketh of one Peter which there was apprehended, & suffred bitter torments for Christs name vnder Diotimus the proconsull. And in Troada likewise of a number martyrs that there suffered, whose names were, Andrew, Paul, Nicomachus, and Dionysia a virgin. Lib. 11. cap. 46.

Peter of Phrygia martyr.

Andreas, Paulus, Nicomachus, Dionysia virgin, martyrs.

Also in Babylon (saith he) diuers christian confessors were found of Decius which were led awaie into Spaine, there to be executed: Lib. eodem, cap. 43.

Martyrs of Babylon, Germania, Eleophilus, Cesarius, Cletalis, Diodorus, Keliq.

In the countrie of Cappadocia at the citie of Cesarea, in like manner of the said author is testified of Germanus, Theophilus, Cesarius, and Mitalis, to suffer martyrdome for Christ. Eodem, cap. 52. And in the same booke mention also is made of Polychronius bishop of Babylon, cap. 89. and in Pamphilia of Nestor there bishop that died martyr, cap. 52.

At Perside in the towne of Carbala, Olympiades & Maximus in Tyrus also Anatolia virgin, and Iudar gaue their liues likewise to death for the testimonie of Christs name.

Olympiades, Maximus notable men. Anatolia virgin, Audaes, martyrs. Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 40. 41. 44.

Eusebius moreouer in the first booke treeteth of the epistles of Dionysius Alexandrinus, diuers that he suffred diuerslie at Alexandria; the which places of Dionysius, as they be cited in Eusebius, I thought here good for the ancientnesse of the author to insert and notifie in his owne woords, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius bishop of Antioch, as followeth.

The epistle of Dionysius bishop of Alexandria to Fabius.

The persecution (saith he) began not with the proclamation set forth by the emperor, but began a whole yere before, by the occasion and meanes of a wicked person, a southsaier, and a follower of wicked arts: who comming to our citie here, stirred vp the multitude of the heathen against vs, and incited them to maintein their owne old superstition and gentilitie of their countrie, whereby they being set agog, and obteining full power to prosecute their wicked purpose, so thought me to leese declared, all their pietie and religion to consist onelie in the idolatrous worship of diuels, and in our destruction. And first laying vpon a certeine preest of ours named Metra, apprehended him, and brought him forth to make him speake after their wicked blasphemie, which when he would not do, they laid vpon him with fistes and clubs, and with sharpe reeds pricked his face and eies, & afterward bringing him out into the suburbs, there they stoned him to death. Then they take a faithfull woman called Quinta, & brought her to the temple of their idols to compell her to worship with them: which when she refused to doe, and abhorred their idols, they bound her feet, & drew her through the whole street of the citie vpon the hard stones, and so bathing her againe with stripes, and scourging her with whips, brought her to the same place of the suburbs as they did the other before, where she likewise ended her life. This done, in great outrage and wilde a multitude running together, they burst in to houses of the religious and godlie christians, spoiling, sacking, and carying awaie all that they could find of any price. The rest of things such as were of lesse value and of no vse, they brought into the open market and set them on fire. In the meane time the brethren bended aside, and withdrew themselues, taking patientlie and no lesse ioifullie the spoiling of their goods, then did they of whome S. Paul doth testifie: neither doe I know any of them all (one onlie excepted) apprehended of them, which reuolting from his profession, denied the Lord yet to this present daie.

Metra, martyr.

Quinta a faithfull woman and martyr.

Patience and ioy in affliction. The constancie of the martyrs of Alexandria.

Among the rest that there were taken, there was a certeine virgin well stricken in yeres named Apollonia, whome they brought forth, and dashing all her teeth out of her iawes, made a great fire before the citie, threatning to cast her into the same, vnlesse she would blaspheme with them and denie Christ: whereat she staying a little with her selfe as one that would take a pause, suddenlie leaped into the midst of the fire, and there was burned.

Apollonia a blessed virgin and martyr.

There was one also Serapion, whome they take in his owne house, and after they had assailed him with sundrie kinds of tormentes, and had broken almost all the ioints of his bodie, they cast him downe from an vpper lofe, and so did he complet his his martyrdome. Thus was there no way neither priuie nor publike, nor corner nor alley left for vs, neither by day nor by night to escape, all the people making an outcrie against vs, that vnlesse we vttered words of blasphemie, we should bee drawne to the fire and burned. And this outragious tumult indured a certaine space, but at length as the Lord would the miserable wretches fell at diuision among themselues, which turned the crueltie they exercised against vs vpon their owne heads. And so had we a little breathing time for a season, while the furie of the heathen people by this occasion asswaged.

Shortly then after this, vnto vs was brought vnto vs of the state of the empire, which before was something fauourable to vs, to be altered and changed against vs, putting vs in great feare. And consequently vpon the same followed the edit of the emperor so terrible & cruell, that according to the forewarning of the Lord, the elect (if it had been possible) might haue been thereby subuerted. Vpon that edict such feare came ouer vs all, that many there were, especially of the richer sort, of whom some for feare came running, some were led by the occasion of time, some were drawne by their neighbors being cited by name, to those impure and idolatrous sacrifices. Other some came trembling and shaking, as men not which should doe sacrifice, but which should be sacrificed themselues, the multitude laughing them to scorne. Some againe came boldly to the altars, declaring themselues neuer to haue been of that profession, of whom it is said, that hardly they shall bee saued. Of the residue, some followed one part, some an other, some ran away, some were taken; of whom certaine continued to bands and torments constant; others again after long imprisonment, before they should come before the iudge renounced their faith. Some also after they suffered torments, yet after recouered. But others being as strong as blessed, and valiant pillers of the Lord, fortified with constancie agreeing to their faith, were made faithfull martyrs of the kingdome of God.

Iulianus martyr.

Of whom the first was Iulianus, a man diseased with the gout, and not able to go, being caried of two men, of whom the one quickely denied; the other Cronion surnamed Saurus, with the foresaid Iulianus the old man, confessing the Lord with a perfect faith, were laid vpon camels, and there scorged, at length cast into the fire, with great constancie were consumed.

A certaine souldier martyr.

As these aforesaid were going to their martyrdome, there was a certaine souldier, who in their defence take part against them that rashly vp on them. For the which cause the people crying out against him, he also was apprehended, and being constant in his profession, was forthwith beheaded.

Macar a blessed martyr.

Like wise one Macar, a man borne in Libia, being admonished and exhorted of the iudge to denie his faith, and not agreeing to his persuasions was burned aliue.

Ephemachus, Alexander, with foure women martyrs.

After these suffered Ephemachus, and one Alexander, who being long detained in prison tied in bands, after innumerable paines and torments with rasors and scourges, were also cast into the burning fire with foure other women with them, which all there ended their martyrdome.

Ammonarion virgin, martyr.

Also Ammonarion an holy virgin, whom the cruell iudge had long and bitterly tormented, for that shee promising the iudge before, that for no punishme nt the would yeild to his requests, and constantly performing the same, suffered likewise martyrdome, with two other women, of whom there was an aged matrone, named Hermeria, the other was called Dionysia, being a mother of many faire children, whom yet notwithstanding she loued not aboue the Lord. These after they could not be ouercome by any tormets of the cruell iudge, but hereby ashamed and confounded to be ouercome of silly women, at length they being pall seling of all tormets, were slaine with the sword. At ll Ammonarion like a valiant captaine suffering before them.

Hermeria, Dionysia, Didymus, Dolorus, martyrs.

Heron, Ater, Isidorus, Dioscorus, also a child of fiftene yeares, were crowned with the same crowne of martyrdome. And first the iudge began with the child, thinking him more easie to bee won, with words to entice him, then with tormets to constraine him: but hee perceiuing immediately, giuing neither place to perswasions nor punishments. The rest, after he had cruelly tormented being constant in their profession, he committed to the fire. At Dioscorus the iudge greatly marueiling for his wise answeres and graue constancie dismissed him, sparing (as he said) his age to a longer respit: which Dioscorus is yet also with vs at this present, waiting for a longer triall.

Nemesion martyr. Theores in the end of the 8. booke of Eusebius.

Nemesion being also an Egyptian, first was accused for a companion of theeues, but being purged thereof before the centurion, was then accused of christianitie, and for the same being in bands, was brought to the president, who most vnmercifully tormenting and scourging him double to all other theeues and fellons; at length among the theeues burned him to death, making him a blessed martyr.

Ammon, Zenon, Ptolemeus, Ingenius, Theophilus martyr cornelius.

There were standing before the tribunall seat certaine of the warriers or knights, whose names were Ammon, Zenon, Ptolemeus, Ingenius, and with them a certaine aged man called Theophilus, who standing by, at what time a certaine christian man was before the iudge examined, and there seeing him so feare ready to incline and fal away, did burst almost for sorrow within themselues, making signes to him with their hands, and all gestures of their bodie, to be constant. This being noted of all the standers by, they were readie to lay hold vpon them, but they preuenting the matter, prested vp of their owne accord before to the bench of the iudge, professing themselues to be christians. In so much that both the president with the benchers were all astonied, the christians which were iudged more imboldened to suffer, and the iudges thereby terrified. This done, they departed aside from the place, glad and reioycing for the testimonie that they had giuen of their faith. Many other besides were in other cities and townes rent and torne asunder vp the heathen, among whom one I will speake of for cause worthie of memorie.

A notable example of a christian courage in confessing Christ.

Ischirion, one that was in seruice with a certaine noble man, was commanded of his master to make sacrifice, who for not obeying, was therefore rebuked: after persisting in the same, was grieuously threatned with charge and menacing words. At last his master, when he could not perswade against him, taking a stake or pike in his hands, ran him through into the body and slue him.

The epistle of Dionysius Alexandrinus, to Germanus. This Germanus was a bishop in that time, which charged Dionysius for his flying persecution, against whom he purgeth himselfe. God wisled Dionysius to flie in persecution.

Foure virgins martyrs. Triphon martyr.

Moreouer, the foresaid Dionysius in an other place writing to Germanus, of his owne dangers and of others, sustained in this persecution, and before this persecution of Decius, thus inferreth as followeth: For (saith he) whom before the sight of God I lie not, and be knowen, I lie not, who that I hauing no regard of mine owne life, and not without the motion of God, did flie and auoid the danger of this persecution. Yea and also before that this persecution of Decius did rage against vs, Sabinus the same boure sent a farmer to seeke me, at what time I remaining at home waited three daies for his coming. Wet he searching narrowly for me by all waies, fields, floods, and corners, where he thought I might best haue hid my selfe, or to haue passed by, was stricken with such blindnes, that he could not find my house, thinking with himselfe nothing lesse then y I would abide at home in such so dangerous persecution. Thus these three daies being past, vpon the fourth day, the Lord God so willing and commanding me to flie, and also my selfe likewise opening to me the way, I with my children and many other brethren went out together. And this not to come of my selfe, but to be the worke of Gods prouidence, the sequell of those things declared, wherein afterward I was not vnpossitable peradventure to some, &c.

Ego bishops then had wiues and children.

Againe in another place shortly after, the foresaid Dionysius proceeding in the narration of himselfe, thus inferreth: Then I comming to Jerusalem with them with whom I was, was sent for by Fabulus the Tyrothite, where as Timotheus (by the prouidence of God) neither was present, nor yet taken. Who then returning home, found his house desert, and officers watching about the same, and so within taken, &c. And againe shortly after it followeth: And to see (saith hee) the admirable disposing of God his workes; as Timotheus was thus flying with much hast and great feare, a certaine man, as happened, a doer of euil, met him by the way, and asked whither he went so hastily: to whom Timotheus answering declared al the matter simplie as it was. Which done, the man proceedeth on his iourny, whither he was purposed to go, which was to a marriage, the matter of which mariages then was to sit by all the night long feasting and drinking. Thus as he was come sitting with them at the feast, he telleth his companions what was done, and what he heard by the way. Into this no sooner told, but all they fastning with vpon a heat, as stricken with a sudden furie rushing out together, made toward his as fast as they could, with such crying and noise as might seeme simply terrible. At the first hearing whereof, the souldiers that had vs in keeping, being afraid ran away, by reason whereof we were left alone, and found as we were lying vpon formes and benches. Then (the Lord knoweth) thinking with my selfe that they had been theeues, which came to spoile and rob, being in my couch, lay still in my shirt and vp as I was, the rest of my garments lying by me. I offered to them that then willed me to all hast to rise and get away, whereby I then perceiuing the cause of their comming, cried vnto them, desiring that they would suffer vs so to doe: and if they would do any benefit to me, for so much as I could not escape the hands of them which would pursue me and carie me away, I prayed them that they would present them, and cut off my head before. And as I was crying thus vnto them, casting my self grouelling vpon the

Such as renoūce to and forsake this persecution.

Now that I have recorded of them sufficiently, which under this tempest of Decius constantly gaue their liues to martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ: it remaineth, that a few words also be spoken of such that for feare or frailty in this persecution did shrinke and slide from the truth of their confession. In the number of whom first commeth in the remembrance of Serapion an aged old man. Of whom writeth Dionysius Alexandrinus vnto Fabius, declaring: that this Serapion was an old man, which lined amongst them a sincere and vpright life of long time, but at length fell. This Serapion oft and many times desired to bee receiued againe, but no man listened to him, for he had sacrificed before. After this, not long after he fell into sickenesse, where hee remained three daies dumbe, and benummed of all sences. The fourth day following, beginning a little to recouer, hee called to him his sisters sonne, and said How long, how long (my sonne) do ye hold me here? Make haste I pray you that I were absolued. Call hither some of the ministers to me: and so saying no more, held his peace as dumbe and speechlesse. The boy ran, it was then night, vnto the minister, who at the same time being sicke, could not come with the messenger, but said: For so much as he willed heretofore (as he said) that such as lay a dying, if they coūt to be receiued and reconciled, and especially if they required it earnestly, should be admitted, whereby with the better hope and confidence they may depart hence: therefore he gaue to the boy a little of the * eucharist, willing him to crumble it into the cup, and so to drop it into the mouth of the old man. With this the boy returned, bringing with him the holy eucharist. As he was now neere at hand before hee had entred in, Serapion the old man, speaking againe: Comest thou (said he) my sonne? The priest, quoth the messenger, is sicke and can not come, but doe as he willeth you, and let me goe. And the boy hurried the eucharist, and dropt it in softly into the mouth of the old man, who after he had tasted a little, immediately gaue vp the ghost, &c. Haec Dionys. ex. Euseb.

Ex Hen. de Erford.

In the citie of Troad, as the processe was grieuously tormenting one Nicomachus, he cried out that he was no christian, and so was let downe againe. And when after he had sacrificed, he was taken ofstoons with a wicked spirit, and so throwne downe vpon the ground, where hee biting off his tongue with his teeth, so departed. Hen. de Erford.

A terrible example of despaire, shewed vpon Nicomachus. Dionysius ad Fabi. in Cypriānus Serm. de la. sct.

Dionysius in his epistles also writing to Fabius, and lamenting the great terrour of this persecution declareth, how that many worthie and notable christians, for feare and horror of the great tyranny therof, did shew themselues feeble & weake men. Diuers some for bread, some of their olmes accord, others after great torments suffred, yet after reuolted from the constancie of their profession. Also saint Cyprian in his treatise De lapsis reciteth with great sorrow, and testifieth, how that a great number at the first threatning of the aduersarie, neither being compelled nor yet one downe with any violence of the enemie, but of their voluntarie weakenesse, fell downe themselues. Neither (saith he) tarying while the iudge should put incense in their hands, but before any stroke fricken in the field, turned their backes, and played the coūardes; not only comming to their sacrifices, but preuenting the same, and pretending to come without compulsion, bringing moreouer their infants and children either put into their hands, or taking them with them of their owne accord, and exhorting moreouer others to do the like after their example.

The weaknesse of christians comming right faith.

Of this weaknesse and falling, the said author theireth two causes, either loue of their goods and patrimonie, or feare of torments: and addeth moreouer examples of the punishments of them which reuolted; affirming that many of them were taken and bound with wicked spirits; and of one man among other, which after his voluntarie denial, suddenly was stricken dumbe. Against an other after his abiuration, as hee should communicate with others, in stead of bread receiued ashes in his hand. Item, of a certaine maiden, who being taken & vexed with a spirit, did teare her own tongue with her teeth, & tormented with paine in her belly & inward parts so deceased.

The examples of God his punishment after denial. S. Cyprian de lapsis.

Among others of this sort S. Cyprian. lib. 2. ep. 8. maketh also mention of one Successus a bishop in Africa, who leauing his charge, and making shipwracke of his faith, went wandring about in other countries, forsaking his owne flocke. In like maner he maketh also mention of Nicostratus a deacon, who forsaking his deaconship, and taking the goods of the church with him, fled away into other countries. Albeit Bertonensis giueth that this Nicostratus the deacon afterward died a martyr. Thus then, although some did relent, yet a very great number (saith he) there was, whom neither feare could remoue, nor paine could diuert, vow to cause them to betray their confession, but that they stood like glorious martyrs vnto the end. Cyprian.

Cyprian. lib. de mortalitate.

The same Cyprianus also in an other booke De mortalitate, reciteth a notable story of one of his owne colleagues and fellow priest, who being oppressed with weakenesse, and greatly afraid with death drawing at hand, desired leaue to depart, and to be discharged. As hee was thus intreating, and almost now dying, there appeared by him a young man, of an honorable and reuerend maiestie, of a tall stature, and comely behauiour, of bright and cleare to behold, that scarce mans carnall eyes were able so to doe, which was moreouer able to depart this world. To whom this young man speaking with a certaine indignation of minde and voice, thus said: Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To suffer ye dare not, to goe out ye will not, what would ye me to doe vnto you?

Notable voice of God to a priest of Carthage.

Vpon the occasion of these and such others, which were a great number, that fell and did renounce, as is aforesaid, in this persecution of Decius, rose vp first the quarrell and heresie of Nouatus, who in these daies made a great disturbance in the church, holding this opinion, that they which once renounced the faith, and for feare of torments had offered incense to the idols, although they repented therefore, yet could not afterward be reconciled, nor admitted to the church of Christ. This Nouatus being first priest vnder Cyprian at Carthage, afterward by stirring vp discord and factions, began to disturbe the bishoprike of Cyprian, to appoint there a deacon called Felicissimus, against the bishops mind or knowledge; also to allure and separate certaine of the brethren from the bishop; all which Cyprian. lib. 2. epist. 8. doth well declare. After this the said Nouatus going to Rome, kept there the like stirre with Cornelius (as the same Cornelius in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. doth testifie) setting himselfe vp as bishop of Rome against Cornelius, which was the lawfull bishop of Rome before. The which to bring to passe, hee vsed this practise. First he had allured to him to bee his adherents, three or foure of good men and holy confessors, which had suffered before the three torments for their confession, whose names were Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus. After this he enticed three simple bishops about the coasts of Italie to repaire to Rome, vnder pretence to make an end of certaine controuersies then in hand. This done, he caused the same, whether by making them drunke, or by other craftie counsell, to lay their hands vpon him, and to make him bishop, and so did. Wherefore the one of those three bishops hardly was receiued to the communion, by the great intercession of his people: the other two by discipline of the church were displaced from their bishoprikes, and others possessed with their romes. Thus then were there two bishops together in one church of Rome, Nouatus and Cornelius, which were vnfeemely, and contrarie to the discipline of the church. And hereupon riseth the true cause and meaning of saint Cyprian, writing in his epistles so much of one bishop, and of the vnitie to be kept in ecclesiasticall regiment, as appeareth, Lib. 4. epist. 2. de simplicit. prælat. Item lib. 3. epist. 11, &c. And in like sort writeth also Cornelius himselfe of one bishop, saying: Eaque vindex illecumpeth, ignorant vnum esse debere episcopum in catholica ecclesia, &c: that is, He knew not that there ought to bee one bishop in a catholike church, &c. This by the way, not out of the way I trust. I haue touched briefly, to detect or refute the cauilling meelling of the papists, which falsely applie these places of Cyprian and Cornelius to maintaine the popes supremacie therby, as ouer the whole vniuersall church of Christ in all places; when their meaning is otherwise, how that euery one catholike church or diocelle ought to haue one bishop ouer it, not that the whole world ought to be subiect to the dominion of him onely that is bishop of Rome. Now to the storie againe. Nouatus bring thus bishop to be not a little vpon him, going about by all meanes to defeate Cornelius, and to allure the people from him. In so much that (as in the forsaid booke of Eusebius appeareth) when Nouatus came to the distributing of the offerings, and should giue euery man his part, hee compelled the simple persons euery man to sweare, before they should receiue of the benediction, and of the collets or oblations, holding both their hands in his, and bidding them so long, speaking these words vnto them (Sweare to me by the body and blood of our Lord Jesu Christ, that thou wilt not leaue me and goe to Cornelius) till that they sweating vnto him, in stead of amen (to bee said at the receiuing of the * bread) should answere, I will not returne to Cornelius, &c. Where note by the way, that the Latine booke of Christoforsons translation, in this place, craftilie leaueth out the name of bread. This storie being written in Eusebius, also contained in Stephanus, although not in the same order of words, yet in effect hee name out of him, both declare in plaine words in both the authors (who so will marke the same) that the sacrament of the body of Christ is learned with the plaine name of bread, after the consecration.

It followeth now in the storie, that Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus, before mentioned, perceiuing at length the craftie dissimulation and arrogancie of Nouatus, left him, and with great repentance returned againe to the church, and were reconciled to Cornelius, as they themselues writing to Cyprian, and Cyprian likewise writing to them an epistle gratulatorie doth declare: lib 2. epist. 3. and Cornelius also in his epistle to Fabius witnesseth the same. In this epistle the said Cornelius moreouer writeth of one Moses a confessor martyr, which once being a follower also of Nouatus, after perceiuing his wickednesse forsooke him, & did excommunicate him. Of him Cyprian also maketh mention, and calleth him a blessed confessor. lib. 2. epist. 4. Damasus in his pontificall saith, that he was apprehended with Parsinus and Nicostratus aboue mentioned, and was put with them in prison, where he ended his life. And thus much of Nouatus, against whom (as Eusebius testifieth) a synod was holden at Rome of three score sundrie bishops in the time of Cornelius, and vnder the reigne of Decius, in the yere of our Lord two hundred fiftie & fiue; whereby it may be supposed that the heat of the persecution at that time was somewhat calmed.

A censure of the best epistle of Cornelius.

After Fabianus (or as Zonaras calleth him Flauianus) next succeeded into the bishoprike of Rome Cornelius, whom Cyprian noteth to be a worthie bishop, & for his great vertue and manerlie continencie much commendable, chosen to that rowme, not so much of his own consent, as of the full agreement both of the clergie men, and also of the people. Hieronie addeth also that he was a man of great eloquence: whereby it may appeare those two epistles decretall, which go in his name not to be his, both for the rudenesse of the barbarous & grosse stile, and also for the matter therein conteined, nothing tasting of that time, nor of that age nor doings then of the church. Whereof in the first he writeth to administers and brethren of the church, concerning the lifting vp of the bodies and bones of Peter and Paul, De cathecumbis, & translated to Vaticanum, at the instance of a certaine deuout woman named Lucina, hauing no great argument or cause to write thereof into the churches, but onelie that he in that letter doth desire them to pray vnto the Lord, that through the intercession of those apostolicall saints, their sinnes might be forgiuen them, &c. In the second epistle writing to Rufus a bishop of the East church, he decreeth and ordeineth that no oth ought of be required of exacted of any head or chefe bishop, for any cause, or by any power. Also that no cause of priests or ministers ought to be handled in any strange or forreine court, without his presence, except onelie in the court of Rome by appellation: whereby who seeth not the traine of our latter bishops, going about craftilie to aduance the dignitie of the court of Rome, vnder and by the pretended title of Cornelius, and of ancient bishops? If Cornelius did write any epistles to any indeed in those troubulent times of persecution, no doubt but some signification thereof he would haue touched in the said his letters, either in ministring consolation to his brethren, or in requiring consolation and prayers of others. Neither is there any doubt, but he would haue giuen some touch also of the matter of Nouatus, with whom he had so much to doe, and vnder his bishoprike to haue had the ouersight of the papists to the papacie. Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 43.

Cyprian. lib. 1. epist. 1.

The constancie of Cornelius in his martyrdome.

What trouble this Cornelius had with Nouatus, sufficiently is before signified. In this persecution of Decius, he demeaned himselfe verie constantlie and faithfully, which sustained great conflicts with the aduersaries, as saint Cyprian plentifully witnesseth. lib. 1. epist. 1. Hieronie testifieth that he remained bishop after the death of Decius, to the time of Gallus, and so appeareth also by saint Cyprian, which hath these words: Et tyrannum armis & bello postmodum victum, prior sacerdotio suo vicit. But Damasus and Sabellicus, his followers, affirme that he was both exiled & also martyred vnder the tyrannous reigne of Decius. Of whom Sabellicus writeth this storie, taken out (as it seemeth) of Damasus, and saith: that Cornelius by the commandement of Decius, was banished into a towne called Centumcellas, bordering in Hetruria, from whence he sent his letters to Cyprian bishop of Carthage, and Cyprian againe to him. This comming to the eares of Decius the emperor, he sendeth for Cornelius, asking him: how he durst be so bold to shew such stubbornesse, that he neither caring for the goods, nor fearing the displeasure of his princes, durst go against the commonwealth, giue and receiue letters from others? To whom Cornelius answering againe, thus purged himselfe, declaring to the emperor, that letters indeed he had written and receiued againe concerning the praises and honoring of Christ, and of saluation of soules, but nothing as touching any matter of the common wealth. And it followeth in the storie: Then Decius moued with anger commanded him to be beaten with plumbats (which, as saith Sabellicus, a kind of scourging) and so to be brought to the temple of Mars: either there to doe sacrifice, or to suffer the extremitie. But he rather willing to die, then to commit such iniquitie, prepared himselfe to martyrdome, being sure that hee should die. And so commending the charge of the church vnto Stephanus his archdeacon, was brought to the way of Appius, where he endeth his life in faithfull martyrdome. Eusebius in one place saith that he sat two yeres, in an other place he saith that he sat three yeres, and so doth Marianus Scotus, following also the diuersitie of the said Eusebius. Damasus giueth him onelie two yeres.

Cornelius martyred.

In this forsaid persecution of Decius, it seemeth by some writers also that Cyprian was banished: but I suppose rather his banishment to be referred to the reigne of Gallus next emperor after Decius, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in this place hereafter. In the meane time the said Cyprian in his second booke, epist. 5. & 6. maketh mention of two that suffered either in the time of this Decius, or much about the same time. Of whom one was Aurelius a youthie and lustie young man, who was twise in torments for his confession, which he neuer denied, but manfully and boldly withstood the aduersarie till he was banished, and also after: and therefore was commended of Cyprian to certaine brethren to haue him for their lector, as in the forenamed epistle of Cyprian appeareth. The other was named Pappalicus, who in the baie before he suffered, declaring to the proconsull in the midst of his torments, and saying: Videbis cras agonem: that is, To morrow you shall see the running for a wager, &c: was brought forth, according as he forespeake, to martyrdome, and there with no lesse constancie then patience did suffer.

And thus much of the tyrannie of this wicked Decius against God his saints. How to touch also the power of God his vengeance and punishment against him. Like as we see commonlie a tempest that is vehement, not long to continue: so it hapned with this tyrannicall tormentor, who reigning but two yeres, as saith Eusebius or three at most, as writeth Diodius, among the middle of the Barbarians with whom he did warre was there slaine with his sonne, like as he had slaine Philippus and his sonne his predecessors before. So was he with his sonne slaine by the righteous iudgement of God himselfe. Eusebius lib. 7. cap. 1. Plutin. Pomponius affirmeth that he warring against the Gothians, and being by them ouercome, left the should fall into their hands, ran into a whirlepit, where he was drowned, and his bodie neuer found after.

The death and destruction of Decius.

Orosius lib. 4. cap. 14.

The last reuenge of God against persecutors.

Neither did the right hand of God plague the emperor onlie, but also reuenged as well the heathen Gentils and persecutors of his word throughout all prouinces and dominions of the Roman monarchie, amongst whom the Lord immediatlie after the death of Decius, sent such a plague and pestilence, lasting for the space of ten yeres together, that horrible it is to heare, and almost incredible to beleeue. Of this plague or pestilence testifieth Dionysius to Hierar a bishop in Egypt. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 21. 22: where he declareth the mortalitie of this plague to be so great in Alexandria where he was bishop, that there was no house in the whole citie free. And although the greatnesse of the plague touched also the christians somewhat, yet it scourged the heathen idolaters much more: beside that the order of the christians in the one and in the other was much diuers. For as the forsaid Dionysius doth record, the christians throughout the whole one and pietie, did not refuse one to visit and comfort an other, and to minister to him what need required, notwithstanding it was to them great danger: for diuers there were who in closing vp their eies, in washing their bodies, & burying them in the ground, were next themselues which followed them to their graues. Yet all this staid not them from doing their dutie, and shewing mercie one to an other: whereas the Gentils contrarlie being extremelie visited by the hand of God felt the plague, but considered not the striker, neither yet considered they their neighbor, but euerie man thrusting for himselfe, neither cared one for an other, but such as were infected, some they would cast out of the doors halfe dead to be deuoured of dogs and wild beasts, some they let die within their houses without all succor, some they suffered to lie vnburied for that no man durst come nere him: and yet notwithstanding for all their voiding and thrusting, the pestilence followed them whither so euer they went, and miserablie consumed them. In so much that Dionysius bishop the same time of Alexandria, thus reporteth of his owne citie, that such a mortalitie was then among them, that the said citie of Alexandria had not in number of all together both old and young, as it was wont to conteine before of the old men onlie from the age of three score to seuentie, such as were found in time past common to lie almost in that citie. Pomponius Letus and other Latine writers also making mention of the said pestilence, declare how the beginning thereof first came (as they thinke) out of Ethiope, and from the hot countries, and so inuading and waisting first the south parts, from thence spread into the east, and so further running and increasing into all other quarters of the world, especiallie where for the edicts of the emperor went against the christians, it followed after and continued the most part of the inhabitants, where they many places became desolate and void of all concourse, and so continued the terme often yeres together.

A terrible pestilence reigning through all the Romane monarchie.

This pestilerous mortalitie (by the occasion whereof Cyprian take the ground to write his booke De mortalitate) began as is said, immediatlie after the death of Decius the persecutor, in the beginning of the reigne of Cilbius Gallus, and Volusianus his sonne, by he succeeded through treason next vnto Decius, about the yere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and fiue, and continued their reigne but two yeres.

Cyprianus lib. de mortalitate.

Gallus and Volusianus emperors.

Anno 255

His Gallus, airy on the first beginning of his reigne was some thing quiet, yet thattie after following the steps of Decius, by whom rather he should haue taken better heed, set forth edicts in like maner for the persecution of christians, albeit in this edict we find no number of martyrs to haue suffered, but onlie all this persecution to rest onlie in the enlement of bishops or guides of the flocke. Of other sufferings or executions we doe not read, for the terrible pestilence following immediatlie kept the barbarous heathen otherwise occupied. Vnto this time of Gallus, rather then to the time of Decius, I refer the banishment of Cyprian, who was then bishop of Carthage, of the which banishment he himselfe testifieth in diuers of his epistles, declaring the cause thereof to rise vpon a commotion or sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himselfe, lest the sedition should grow greater; notwithstanding the said Cyprian though being absent, yet had no lesse care of his flocke and of the whole church, then if he had been present with them, and therefore neuer ceased in his epistles continuallie to exhort and call vpon them to be constant in their profession, and patient in their afflictions. Amongst diuers others whom he doth comfort in his banishment, although he was in that case to be comforted himselfe, writing to certaine that were condemned to mining for metalls, whose names were Nemesianus, Felix, Lucius, with other bishops, priests and deacons, declareth vnto them; How it is no shame but a glory not to be feared, but to be reioiced at, to suffer banishment or other paines for Christ; and confirming them in the same, or rather commending them, signifieth how worthily they doe shew themselues to be as valiant captaines of vertue, prouoking both by the confessions of their mouth, and by the suffering of their bodie, the hearts of the brethren to christian martyrdome, whose example was and is a great confirmation to many, both maids and children to follow the likenesse of their punishment and suffering, it is (saith he) a thing not execrable to a christian: for a christian mans breast, whose hope doth wholie consist in the tree, dreadeth neither bat nor clubswounds and skarres of the bodie be ornaments to a christian man, such as bring no shame nor dishonestie to the partie, but rather prefereth and freeth him with the Lord. And although in the mines where the mettals be digged there be no beds for christian mens bodies to take their rest, yet they haue their rest in Christ: and though their wearie bones lie vpon the coldground, yet is it no paine to lie with Christ. Their feet haue been fettered with bands and chains, but happilie he is bound of man, whom the Lord Christ doth loose: happilie doth he lie tied in the stocks, whose feet thereby are made swifter to run to heauen. Neither can any man tie a christian so fast, but he runneth so much the faster for his garland of life. They haue no garments to saue them from cold, but he that putteth on Christ is sufficientlie coted. Doth bread lacke to their hungrie bodies? But man liueth not onlie by bread, but by euerie word proceeding from the mouth of God. Your deformitie (saith he) shall be turned to honor, your mourning to ioy, your paine to pleasure, and felicitie infinit. And if this doo grieue you that ye cannot now enioy your sacrifices and oblations after your wonted maner, yet your sacrifice dailie censeth not, which is a contrite and humble heart, as when you offer vp dailie your bodies a liuelie and a glorious sacrifice vnto the Lord, which is the sacrifice, that pleaseth God. And though your trauell be great, yet is the reward greater, which is most certaine to follow: for God beholding and looking downe vpon them that confesse his name, in their willing mind approoueth them, in their striuing helpeth them, in their victorie crowneth them, rewarding that in vs which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in vs perfected. With these, and such like comfortable words he doth animat his brethren, admonishing them that they are now in a ioifull journey, hasting apace to the mansions of the martyrs, there to enioy after this darknesse a stable light and brightnesse greater then all their passions, according to be apostles saying: These sufferings of this present time be nothing like comparable to the brightnesse of the glory that shall be reuealed in vs, &c.

Cypr. lib. 4. ep. 5. 6. 7.

And after the like words of sweet comfort and consolation writting to Seagrius and Rogatianus, which were in prison and bonds for the testimonie of truth, Doth encourage them to continue stedfast and patient in the way wherein they haue begun to run: for that they haue the Lord with them their helper and defender, who promiseth to be with vs to the worlds end, and therefore willeth them to set before their eies in their death immortalitie, in their paine euerlasting glory, of the which it is written: Pretious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Item, although before men they suffered torments, yet their hope is full of immortalitie, and being vexed in small things, they shall be well requited in great matters: for the Lord hath tried the as gold in the fire. And writeth moreouer, admonishing them that it is appointed from the beginning of the world that righteousnesse heere should suffer in secular conflicts, for so vnto Abel was slaine in the beginning of the world, and after him all iust and good men, the prophets also & the apostles first of the Lord himselfe, vnto whom all the Lord iust gaue ensample in humilitie, teaching that there is no comming to his kingdome, but by that way which he entred himselfe, saying by these words: He that loueth his life in this world shall lose it, &c. And againe, Feare ye not them that slaie the bodie, but haue no power to slaie the soule. And S. Paul likewise admonishing all them whosoeuer couet to be partakers of the promises of the Lord, to follow the Lord, saith: If we suffer together with him, we shal reigne together, &c.

Furthermore, as the same Cyprian doth encourage heere the holie martyrs which were in captiuitie, to persist: so likewise writing to the priests and deacons which were free, exhorteth them to be seruiceable and obsequious with all care and loue, to cherish and embrace them that were in bonds. Cypria. lib. 2. epist. 6. Whereby maie appeare the feruent zeale and care of this good bishop toward the church of Christ, although being now in exile in the time of this emperor Gallus.

Lucius bishop of Rome banished.

In the same time and vnder the said Gallus reigning with his sonne Volusianus, was also Lucius bishop of Rome sent to banishment who, next succeeded after Cornelius in that bishoprike, about the yere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and six. Albeit in this banishment he did not long continue, but returned home to his church, as by the epistle of S. Cyprian, lib. 3. epist. 1. may appeare. As to all other bishops of Rome in those primitiue daies certaine decretall epistles with seuerall ordinances be ascribed, bearing their names & tities as hath been afore declared: So also hath Lucius one epistle fathered vpon him, in the which epistle he writing to the brethren of France and of Spaine, appointeth such an order and forme of the church as scarcely not to agree with the time then present: for so he declareth in that epistle that a bishop in all places whither so euer he goeth, should haue two priests with three deacons waiting vpon him to be witnesses of all his iniuries and doings. Which ordinance although I denie not but it may be and is commendable, yet I see not how that time of Lucius could serue them for a bishop to carie such a pompe of priests and deacons about him, or to studie for any such matter: for so much as bishops commonlie in those daies were seldome free to go abroad, vnlesse they were so secret, but either were in houses close and secret, or in prison, or els in banishment. Moreouer in the said epistle holy pompoustlie writeth he to the church of Rome: This holie and apostolicall church of Rome (saith he) the mother of all churches of Christ, which by the grace of God omnipotet hath neuer been prooued to swarue out of the path of apostolicall tradition, neither hath euer fallen or been depraued with heretical innouations: but euen as in the first beginning it receiued the rule of the apostolicall faith by his first instructors, the princes of the apostles, so it continueth euer immaculat and vndefiled vnto the end.

Vnto this Lucius also is referred in the decrees of Gratian this constitution, that no minister what soeuer after his ordination, should at any time reenter to the chamber of his owne wife in paine of losing his ministerie in the church, &c. Eusebius in his seuenth booke making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his martyrdome, saith that he sat but eight months: but Damasius in his martyrologe holdeth that he sat three yeres, and was beheaded the second yere of Valerian and Galienus emperors, and so doth also Sarianus Scotus and Nauclerus, with other that follow Damasius affirme the same.

Eusebius and Damasius varie in time. Lucius bishop of Rome, martyr.

After him came Stephanus next bishop of Rome following Lucius, whom Damasius, Platina, and Sabellicus, affirme to haue sit seuen yeres and fiue months, and to die a martyr. Contrarie Eusebius and Violaterranus holding with him, giue him but two yeers: which part cometh neist neere to the truth, I leaue to the readers iudgement. Of his two epistles decretal, and of his ordinances out of the same collected, I need not much to write for two respects, either for that concerning these decretall epistles suspicionslie intituled to the names of the fathers of the primitiue church, suff cientlie hath been said before, or els because both the phrase barbarous and incongrue, and also the matter it selfe therein conteined is such, that although no testimonie came against it, yet it easilie refelleth it selfe. As where in the second epistle he decreeth, That no bishop being expulsed out of his seat, or depriued of his goods, ought to be accused of any, or is bound to answere for himselfe, before that by the law regularly he be restored againe fully to his former state, and that the primats and the synod reuder vnto him againe all such goods and fruits as were taken from him before his accusation, as is agreeing both to the lawes canon and also secular. First here I would desire the reader a little to stay, and this to consider with himselfe, who be these heere ment which either vsed or might despoile these bishops of their goods, and expulse them from their seats for such wrongfull causes, but onely kings and emperors which at this time were not yet christened no: vsed any such proceedings against these bishops, in such sort as either primats or synods could restore them again to their places and possessions: again, what priuat goods or possessions had bishops then to be taken from them, when as churches yet neither were indued with patrimonies nor possessions? And if any treasures were committed to the church, it pertained not properly to the bishop, but went in generall to the subuention of the poor in the church, as in the epistle of Cornelius to Fabius may appeare, alleaged in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. where in speaking of his church, and declaring how there ought to be but one bishop in the same, inferreth mention of fortie and six priests, seuen deacons, with seuen subdeacons, fortie two acolithes, of widowes and poore afflicted persons to the number of fiftene hundred and aboue, found and nourished in the same by the mercifull benignitie and prouidence of God: Eusebius. lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the end of the said canon, Which thing is forbidden both by the lawes ecclesiasticall, call, and also secular, &c. Now what lawes secular were in the time of Steuen for Bishops not to be charged with any accusation before they were reduced againe to their state, let any reader marking well the state of the heathen lawes that then were, iudge, and in iudging I doubt not but this matter alone though there were no other, will be enough to descrie the vntruth hereof.

Lawfull to appeale to Rome.

Moreouer, by diuers other probable notes and arguments in the said second epistle of Stephanus it may be easily espied, this epistle to be feined and misauthorised, especially by the 5 canon of the said epistle, where he so solemnely entreateth of the difference betweene primats, metropolitans, and archbishops, which distinction of degrees and titles fauouring more of ambition then of perfection, giueth me iustly to suppose this epistle not to be written by this Stephan, but by some other man either of that name, or of some other time when the church began to be setled in more prosperitie, and orders therein to be taken for: euery man to know his degree and limits of his authoritie, according as is specified by the first and seuenth canon of Nicen councell, decreeing of the same matter.

Ecclesiments and holy vessels seruing for the altar.

The like estimation may be conceiued also of the seuenth canon of the said epistle, where he willeth and appointeth all causes iudiciarie to be decided and determined within the precinct of their owne proper prouince, and not to passe ouer the bounds thereof, vnlesse (saith he) the appeale be made to the apostolicall sea of Rome, which sauoureth in me not rather of a smacke of poperie, then of the being of christianitie, especially in these tiures, during this terrible persecution among the bishops of Christ. And thus much of the second decretall epistle of Stephanus, although of the first epistle also written to Hilarius some thing may be said, as where he speaketh in the said epistle of holy vestiments, and holy vessels, and other ornaments of the altar seruing to diuine worship, and therefore not to be touched no: handled of any man, saying of priests alone. Concerning all which implements, my opinion is this, that I thinke the church of Rome not to haue bin in so good state then, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him being occupied about other more earnest matters, and scarce able to bide their owne heads, had any mind or cogitation to studie vpon such vnnecessarie inuentions seruing in publike churches: neither do I see how the heathen in those daies would haue suffered these ornaments to be vnconsumed, which would not suffer the bishops themselues to liue amongst them, notwithstanding Isidorus and Polybotus iudge the contrarie. Betweene this Stephan and Cyprian bishop of Carthage was a great contention about rebaptising of heretikes, wherof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be said.

Besides these bishops aboue specified, diuers others there were also sent into banishment vnder the foresaid emperors Gallus and Volusianus, as appeareth by Dionysius writing to Hermannus on this wise: That Gallus not seeing the euill of Decius, nor foreseeing the occasion of his seduction & ruine, stumbled himselfe also at the same stone, lying open before his eyes: for at the first beginning when his empire went prosperously forward, and all things went luckily with him, afterward he draue out holy men, which prayed for his peace and safegard, and so with them reiected also the prayers which they made for him, &c. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 1. Otherwise of any bloodshed or any martyrs that in the time of this emperor were put to death, we do not reade.

Discord and division among the brethren.

After the raigne of which emperour Gallus and of his son Volusianus being expired, who raigned but two yeares, Emilianus which liue them both by ciuill sedition, succeeded in their place, who raigned but three months, and was also slaine. Next to whom Valerianus and his sonne Galienus were aduanced to the empire.

Gallus and Volusianus emperours slaine. Emilianus emperour three monthes. Valerianus and Galienus his sonne emperour. Persecution ceased for a time.

About the changing of these emperors the persecution which first began at Decius, and afterward slacked in the time of Gallus was now extinguished for a time, partly for the great plague raigning in all places, partly by the change of the emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the first entrance of the empire for the space of three or foure yeares was right courteous and gentle to the people of God, and well accepted to the senat. Neither was there any of all the emperours before him, no not of them which openly professed Christ, that shewen himselfe so louing and familiar toward the christians as he did: in so much that (as Dionysius writing to Hermam doth testifie) all his whole court was replenished with holy saints and seruants of Christ and godly persons, so that his house might seeme to be made a church of God. But by the malice of Satan through wicked counsell these quiet daies endured not very long. For in procelle of time this Valerian being charmed or incensed by a certaine Egyptian, a chiefe ruler of the heathen synagogue of the Egyptians, a matter of the charmes or inchantes, into which he was troubled so that he could not do his magicall feats for the christians, was solas enticed and beiotted, that through the detestable procuratrions of that diuelish Egyptian, he was wholly turned vnto abominable idols, and to execrable impietie, in sacrificing yong infants, and quartering bodies, and diuiding the intrails of children new borne, and so proceeding in his furie, moued the eight persecution against the christians, whom the wicked Egyptian could not

The chiefe occasions of this persecution.

What was the chiefe original cause of this persecution, partly is signified before, where mention was made of the wicked Egyptian: but as this was the outward and politicall cause, so S. Cyprian sheweth other causes more speciall and ecclesiasticall in his fourth booke, epist. 4. whose words be these: But we (saith he) must vnderstand and consider, that this turbulent oppression and calamitie, which hath wasted for the most part all our whole companie, and doth daily consume, riseth chiefely of our owne wicked nesse and sinnes, while we wothe not in the way of the Lord, nor obserue his precepts left vnto vs for our institution. The Lord obserued the will of his Father in all points, but we obserue not the will of the Lord, hauing all our minde and studie set vpon lucre and possessions, giuen to pride, full of emulation and dissension, void of simplicitie and faithfull dealing, renouncing this world in word onely, but nothing in deed, euery man pleasing himselfe, and displeasing all others. And therefore are we thus scourged, and worthily: for what stripes and scourges doe we not deserue, when the confessors themselues (such as haue bid the triall of their confession) and such as ought to bee an example to the rest of well doing, do keep no discipline? And therefore beeause some such there be, proudly puft vp with this swelling and vnmanerly bragging of their confession, these torments come, such as do not easily send vs to the crowne, except by the mercie of God, some being taken away by quicknesse of death, doe preuent the tediousnesse of punishment. These things doe wee suffer for our sinnes and deserts, as by the Lords censure we haue been forewarned, saying: If they shall forsake my law and will not walke in my iudgements; if they shall prophane my institutions, and will not obserue my precepts, I will visit their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges (saith he) wee feele, which neither cease God our good deeds, nor repent in our euil deeds. Wherfore the said Cyprian adding this exhortation withall, exhorted them to pray and entreat from the bottome of their heart and whole mind, the mercie of God, which promiseth, saying: But yet my mercie I will not scatter from them, &c. Let vs aske, and we shall obtaine; and though (saith Cyprian) it be with tariance, yet for so much as we haue grieuously offended, let vs continue knocking, for to him that knocketh it shall be opened, if our praiers, sighings & weepings knock stil at the doore with continuance, and if our praiers be ioined together with brotherly agreement, &c. Moreouer, what vices were then principally raigning among the christians, hee further specifieth in the said epistle, which chiefly were diuision & dissension among the brethren. For when it was spoken to them in a vision by these words, Petite & impetrabitis, that is, Pray, and ye shall obtaine; afterward it was required of the congregatio there present, to direct their prayers for certaine persons affigned to them by name: but they could not agree and condescend altogether of the names and persons of them which they should pray for, but were distonant in their consent and petition: which thing (saith Cyprian) did greatly displease him that spake vnto them; Pray, and ye shall obtaine, for that there was no vniforme equalitie of voice and heart, nor one simple and ioynt concord among the brethren, wherof it is written in the sixty and seuenth Psalme, God which maketh to dwell in the house together men of one accord, &c. And so by the occasion hereof, hee writeth vnto them in the foresaid epistle, and moueth them to prayer and mutuall agreement. For (saith he) if it be promised in the gospell to be granted whatsoeuer any two consenting together shall aske, what shall then the whole church do agreeing together? Or what if this vnanimity were among the whole fraternity? Which vnanimitie (saith Cyprian) if it had bin then among the brethren, Non vesisset fratribus hæc mala, si in vnum fraternitas fuisset animata, that is: These euils had not hapned to the brethren, if the brethren had ioyned together in brotherly vnanimitie, &c.

Psalm. 67.

A vision foretheuing persecution to come. Cypr. lib. 4. epist. 4.

After the causes thus declared of this or other persecutions, the said S. Cyprian moreouer in the forenamed epistle (worthie to be read of all men) declareth like vnto a certaine vision, wherein was shewed vnto them by the Lord before the persecution came, what should happen. The vision was this. There was a certaine aged father standing at whose right hand stood a yong man verie sad and pensiue, as one with an indignation sorrowfull, holding his hand vpon his breast, his countenance heauie and vncheerefull. On the left hand sate another person, hauing in his hand a net, which he threatned to lay to catch the people that stood about. And as he was marueilling that saw the sight thereof, it was said vnto him: The yong man whom thou seest sit on the right hand, is sad & sorie that his precepts be not of bishops or guides of the flocke. Of other sufferings or executions we doe not read, for the terrible pestilence following immediatlie kept the barbarous heathen otherwise occupied. Vnto this time of Gallus, rather then to the time of Decius, I refer the banishment of Cyprian, who was then bishop of Carthage, of the which banishment he himselfe testifieth in diuers of his epistles, declaring the cause thereof to rise vpon a commotion or sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himselfe, lest the sedition should grow greater; notwithstanding the said Cyprian though being absent, yet had no lesse care of his flocke and of the whole church, then if he had been present with them, and therefore neuer ceased in his epistles continuallie to exhort and call vpon them to be constant in their profession, and patient in their afflictions. Amongst diuers others whom he doth comfort in his banishment, although he was in that case to be comforted himselfe, writing to certaine that were condemned to mining for mettals, whose names were Nemesianus, Felix, Lucius, with other bishops, priests and deacons, declareth vnto them; How it is no shame but a glory not to be feared, but to be reioiced at, to suffer banishment or other paines for Christ; and confirming them in the same, or rather commending them, signifieth how worthily they doe shew themselues to be as valiant captaines of vertue, prouoking both by the confessions of their mouth, and by the suffering of their bodie, the hearts of the brethren to christian mayrydome, whose example was and is a great confirmation to many, both maids and children to follow the like: as for punishment and suffering, it is (saith he) a thing not execrable to a christian: for a christian mans brest, whose hope doth wholie consist in the tree, dreadeth neither bat nor club: wounds and skarres of the bodie be ornaments to a christian man, such as bring no shame nor dishonestie to the partie, but rather preferreth and feeth him with the Lord. And although in the mines where the mettals be digged there be no beds for christian mens bodies to take their rest, yet they haue their rest in Christ: and though their wearie bones lie vpon the coldground, yet is it no paine to lie with Christ. Their feet haue been fettered with bands and chains, but happilie he is bound of man, whom the Lord Christ doth loose: happilie doth he lie tied in the stocks, whose feet thereby are made swifter to run to heauen. Neither can any man tie a christian so fast, but he runneth so much the faster for his garland of life. They haue no garments to saue them from cold, but he that putteth on Christ is sufficientlie cloted. Doth bread lacke to their hungrie bodies? But man liueth not onlie by bread, but by euerie word proceeding from the mouth of God. Your deformitie (saith he) shall be turned to honor, your mourning to ioy, your paine to pleasure, and felicitie infinit. And if this doo grieue you that ye cannot now employ your sacrifices and oblations after your wonted maner, yet your sacrifice dailie conseth not, which is a contrite and humble heart, as when you offer vp dailie your bodies a liuelie and a glorious sacrifice vnto the Lord, which is the sacrifice, that pleaseth God. And though your trauell be great, yet is the reward greater, which is most certaine to follow: for God beholding and looking downe vpon them that confesse his name, in their willing mind approoueth them, in their striuing helpeth them, in their victorie crowneth them, rewarding that in vs which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in vs perfected. With these, and such like comfortable words he doth animat his brethren, admonishing them that they are now in a ioifull iourney, halting apace to the mansions of the martyrs, hereto inioy after this darknesse a stable light and brightnesse greater then all their passions, according to be apostles saying: These sufferings of this present time be nothing like comparable to the brightnesse of the glory that shall be reuealed in vs, &c.

And after the like words of sweet comfort and consolation writting to Seagrius and Rogatianus, which were in prison and bonds for the testimonie of truth, Doth encourage them to continue stedfast and patient in the way wherein they haue begun to run: for that they haue the Lord with them their helper and defender, who promiseth to be with vs to the worlds end, and therefore willeth them to set before their eies in their death immortalitie, in their paine euerlasting glory, of the which it is written: Pretious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Item, although before men they suffered torments, yet their hope is full of immortalitie, and being vexed in small things, they shall be well requited in great matters: for the Lord hath tried the as gold in the fire. And writeth moreouer, admonishing them that it is appointed from the beginning of the world, that righteousnesse heere should suffer in secular conflicts, for so iust Abel was slaine in the beginning of the world, and after him all iust and good men, the prophets also & the apostles sent of the Lord himselfe, vnto whom all, the Lord first gaue an example in himselfe, teaching that there is no comming to his kingdome, but by that way which he entred himselfe, saying by these words: He that loueth his life in this world shall lose it, &c. And againe, Feare ye not them that slaie the bodie, but haue no power to slaie the soule. And S. Paul likewise admonishing all them whosoeuer couet to be partakers of the promises of the Lord, to follow the Lord, saith: If we suffer togither with him, we shal reigne togither, &c.

Furthermore, as the same Cyprian doth encourage heere the holie martyrs which were in captiuitie, to persist: so likewise writing to the priests and deacons which were free, exhorteth them to be seruiceable and obsequious with all care and loue, to cherish and embrace them that were in bonds. Cypria. lib. 3. epist. 6. Wherebv maie appére the feruent zeale and care of this god bishop toward the church of Christ, although being now in exile in the time of this emperor Gallus.

In the same time and vnder the said Gallus reigning with his sonne Volusianus, was also Lucius bishop of Rome sent to banishment into, next succeded after Cornelius in that bishoprike, about the yeere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and six. Albeit in this banishment he did not long continue, but returned home to his church, as by the epistle of S. Cyprian, lib. 2. epist. 1. may appére. As to all other bishops of Rome in those primitiue daies certaine decretall epistles with seuerall ordinances be ascribed, bearing their names & titles as hath been afore declared: So also hath Lucius one epistle fathered vpon him, in the which epistle he writing to the brethren of France and of Spaine, appointeth such an ordenance for the time of the church as seemeth not to agree with the time then present: for so he declareth in that epistle that a bishop in all places whither so euer he goeth, should haue two priests with three deacons waiting vpon him to be witnesses of all his waies and doings. Which ordinance although I denie not but it may be and is conuenient, yet I see not how that time of Lucius could serue then for a bishop to carie such a pompe of priests and deacons about him, or to studie for any such matter: for so much as bishops commonlie in those daies were seldome srée to go abroad, vnlesse they neuer so secret, but either were in houses close and secret, or in prison, or els in banishment. Moreouer in the said epistle holy pompouslie writeth he to the church of Rome: This holie and apostolicall church of Rome (saith he) the mother of all churches of Christ, which by the grace of God omnipotet hath neuer been prooued to swarue out of the path of apostolicall tradition, neither hath euer fallen or been depraued with heretical innouations: but euen as in the first beginning it receiued the rule of the apostolicall faith by his first inductors, the princes of the apostles, so it continueth euer immaculat and vndefiled vnto the end.

Vnto this Lucius also is referred in the decrées of Gratian this constitution, that no minister what soeuer after his ordination, should at any time reenter to the chamber of his owne wife in paine of losing his ministerie in the church, &c. Eusebius in his seuenth booke making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his martyrdome, saith that he sat but eight months: but Damasus in his martyrologe holdeth that he sat three yéres, and was beheaded the second yére of Valerian and Galienus emperors, and so doth also Marianus Scotus and Nauclerus, with other that follow Damasus affirme the same.

After him came Stephanus next bishop of Rome following Lucius, whom Damasus, Platina, and Sabellicus, affirme to haue sit seuen yéres and fiue monthes, and to die a martyr. Contrarie Eusebius and Volaterranus holding with him, giue him but two yeers: which part cómeth most nére to the truth, I leaue to the readers iudgement. Of his two epistles decretal, and of his ordinances out of the same collected, I need not much to tarie for the respects, either for that cócerning these decretall epistles suspitionlie intituled to the names of the fathers of the primitiue church, suff cientlie hath been said before, or els because both the phrase barbarous and incongrue, and also the matter it selfe therein conteined is such, that although no testimonie came against it, yet it easilie refelleth it selfe. As where in the second epistle he decréeth, That no bishop being expulsed out of his seat, or depriued of his goods, ought to be accused of any, or is bound to answere for himselfe, before that by the law regularly he be restored againe fully to his former state, and that the primats and the synod render vnto him again all such possessions and fruits as were taken from him before his accusation, as is agreeing both to the lawes canon and also secular. First heere I would desire the reader a little to stay, and this to cónsider with himselfe, who be these here ment which either bled or might depriue these bishops of their goods, and expulse them from their seats for such wrongfull causes, but onely kings and emperors which at this time were not yet christened nor bled any such proceedings against these bishops, in such sort as either primats or synods could restore them again to their places and possessions again. What primat gods or possessions had bishops then to be taken from them, when as churches yet neither were indued with patrimonies nor possessions? And if any treasures were committed to the church, it pertained not properly to the bishop, but went in generall to the subuention of the poor in the church, as in the epistle of Cornelius to Fabius may appeare, alleaged in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. where he speaking of his church, and declaring how there ought to be but one bishop in the same, inferreth mention of foztie and six priests, seuen deacons, with seuen subdeacons, foztie two acolouthes, of widowes and poore afflicted persons to the number of fiftéene hundred and aboue, found and nourished in the same by the mercifull benignitie and prouidence of God: Eusebius. lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the end of the said canon, Which thing is forbidden both by the lawes ecclesiasticall, call, and also secular, &c. Now what lawes secular were in the time of Steuen for bishops not to be charged with any accusation before they were restored againe to their state, let any reader marking well the state of the heathen lawes that then were, iudge, and in iudging I doubt not but this matter alone though there were no other, will be enough to deserie the vntruth hereof.

Moreouer, by diuers other probable notes and arguments in the said second epistle of Stephanus it may be easily espied, this epistle to be feined and misauthorised, especially by the fift canon of the said epistle, where he so solemnely entreateth of the difference betweene primats, metropolitans, and archbishops, which distinction of degrées and titles sauouring more of ambition then of persecution, giueth me verily to suppose this epistle not to be written by this Stephan, but by some other man either of that name, or of some other time when the church began to be setled in more prosperitie, and orders therein to be taken for: euery man to know his degrée and limits of his authoritie, according as is specified by the first and seuenth canon of Nicen councell, decreeing of the same matter.

The like estimation may be conceiued also of the seuenth canon of the said epistle, where he willeth and appointeth all causes iudiciarie to be decided and determined within the precinct of their owne proper prouince, and not to passe ouer the bounds thereof, vnlesse (saith he) the appeale be made to the apostolicall sea of Rome, which fauoureth in my nose rather of a smacke of poperie, then of the veine of christiantie, especially in these times, bureing this terrible persecution among the bishops of Christ. And thus much of the second decretall epistle of Stephanus, although of the first epistle also written to Hilarius some thing may be said, as where he speaketh in the said epistle of holy vestiments, and holy vessels, and other ornaments of the altar seruing to diuine worship, and therefore not to be touched nor handled of any man, sauing of priests alone. Concerning all which implements, my opinion is this, that I thinke the church of Rome not to haue bin in so good state then, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him being occupied about other more earnest matters, and scarce able to vide their owne heads, had any mind or cogitation to studie vpon such vnnecessarie inuentions seruing in publike churches: neither do I see how the heathen in those daies would haue suffered these ornaments to be vnconfirmed, which would not suffer the bishops themselues to liue amongst them, notwithstanding Isidorus and Polydorus iudge the contrarie. Betweene this Stephan and Cyprian bishop of Carthage was a great contention about rebaptizing of heretikes, whereof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be said.

Besides these bishops afore specified, diuers others there were also sent into banishment vnder the forenamed emperors Gallus and Volusianus, as appeareth by Dionysius writing to Hermannus on this wise: That Gallus not seeing the euill of Decius, nor foreseeing the occasion of his seduction & ruine, stumbled himselfe also at the same stone, lying open before his eyes: for at the first beginning when his empire went prosperously forward, and all things went luckily with him, afterward he drawe out holy men, which prayed for his peace and safegard, and so with them reuoked also the prayers which they made for him, &c. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 1. Otherwise of any bloodshed or any martyrs that in the time of this emperor were put to death, we do not reade.

After the raigne of which emperour Gallus and of his son Volusianus being expired, who raigned but two yeares, Emilianus which slue them both by ciuill sedition, succeded in their place, who raigned but three months, and was also slaine. Next to whom Valerianus and his sonne Galienus were aduanced to the empire.

About the changing of these emperors the persecution which first began at Decius, and afterward slacked in the time of Gallus was now extinguished for a time, partly for the great plague raigning in all places, partly by the change of the emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the first entrance of the empire for the space of three or foure yeares was right curteous and gentle to the people of God, and well accepted to the senat. Neither was there any of all the emperours before him, no not of them which openly professed Christ, that shewed himselfe so louing and familiar toward the christians as he did: in so much that (as Dionysius writing to Herman doth testifie) all his whole court was replenished with holy saints and seruiants of Christ and godly persons, so that his house might séeme to be made a church of God. But by the malice of Satan though wicked counsell these quiet daies endured not verie long. For in processe of time this Valerian being charmed or incensed by a certaine Egyptian, a chiefe ruler of the heathen synagogue of the Egyptians, a master of the charmers or inchanters, who indeed was troubled for that he could not do his magicall feats for the christians, was so far instaunced to and bewitched, that through the detestable prouocations of that diuelish Egyptian, he was wholly turned into abominable idols, and to execrable impietie, in sacrificing yong infants, and quartering bodies, and diuiding the intrals of children new borne, and so proceeding in his furie, moued the eight persecution against the christians, whom the wicked Egyptian could not abide, as being the hinderers and destroyers of his magicall inchantings, about the yeare of our Lord, two hundred fiftie and nine.

The eight persecution.

In the which persecution the chiefe administers and executors were Emilianus president of Egypt, Paternus and Galerius Maximus, proconsuls in Africa. Bergomensis also maketh mention of Paternus viceregent of Rome, and of Perennius. Tiuicentius speaketh also of Nicetius and Claudius presidents, &c.

What was the chiefe originall cause of this persecution, partly is signified before, where mention was made of the wicked Egyptian: but as this was the outward and politicall cause to S. Cyprian the which other causes more speciall and ecclesiasticall in his fourth booke, epist. 4. whose words be these: But we (saith he) must vnderstand and confesse, that this turbulent oppression and calamitie, which hath wasted for the most part all our whole companie, and doth daily consume, riseth chiefely of our slowe wickednesse and sinnes, while we walke not in the way of the Lord, nor obserue his precepts left vnto vs for our institution. The Lord obserued the will of his Father in all points, but we obseue not the will of the Lord, hauing all our minde and studie set vpon lucre and possessions, giuen to pride, full of emulation and dissension, void of simplicitie and faithfull dealing, renouncing this world in word onely, but nothing in deed, euery man pleasing himselfe, and displeasing all others. And therefore are we thus scourged, and worthily: for what stripes and scourges doe we not deserue, when the confessors themselues (such as haue bid the triall of their confession) and such as ought to bee an example to the rest of well doing, do keep no discipline? And therefore because some such there be, proudly puft vp with this swelling and vnmannerly bragging of their confession, these torments come, such as do not easily send vs to the crowne, except by the mercie of God, some being taken away by quicknesse of death, doe preuent the tediousnesse of punishment. These things doe wee suffer for our sinnes and deserts, as by the Lords censure we haue been forewarned, saying: If they shall forsake my law and will not walke in my iudgements; if they shall prophane my institutions, and will not obserue my precepts, I will visit their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges (saith he) wee feele, which neither please God in our good deeds, nor repent in our euil deeds. Wherfore the said Cyprian adding this exhortation withall, exhorted them to pray and entreat from the bottome of their heart and whole mind, the mercie of God, which promiseth, saying: But yet my mercie I will not scatter from them, &c. Let vs aske, and we shall obtaine; and though (saith Cyprian) it be with tariance, yet for so much as wee haue grieuously offended, let vs continue knocking, for to him that knocketh it shall be opened, if our praiers, sighings & weepings knock till at the doore with continuance, and if our praiers be ioined together with brotherly agreement, &c. Moreouer, what vices were then principally raigning among the christians, hee further specifieth in the said epistle, which chiefly were diuision & dissension among the brethren. For when it was spoken to them in a vision by these words, Petite & impetrabitis, that is, Pray, and ye shall obtaine: afterward it was required of the congregatiō there present, to direct their prayers for certaine persons affigned to them by name: but they could not agree and condesend altogether of the names and persons of them which they should pray for, but were dissonant in their content and petition: which thing (saith Cyprian) did greatly displease him that spake vnto them; Pray, and ye shall obtaine, for that there was no vniforme equalitie of voice and heart, nor one simple and ioynt concord among the brethren, wherof it is written in the sixty and seuenth Psalme; God which maketh to dwell in the house together men of one accord, &c. And so by the occasion hereof, hee writeth vnto them in the foresaid epistle, and moueth them to prayer and mutuall agreement. For (saith he) it is be promised in the gospell to be granted whatsoeuer any two consenting together shall aske, what shall then the whole church do agreeing together? Or what if this vnanimity were among the whole fraternity? Which vnanimitie (saith Cyprian) if it had bin then among the brethren, Non ouenissent fratribus haec mala, si in omnem fraternitatem fuisset animata, that is: These euils had not hapned to the brethren, if the brethren had ioyned together in brotherly vnanimitie, &c.

After the causes thus declared of this or other persecutions, the said S. Cyprian moreouer in the forenamed epistle (worthie to be read of all men) describeth likewise a certaine vision, wherein was shewed vnto them by the Lord before the persecution came, what should happen. The vision was this. There was a certaine aged father sitting, at whose right hand sat a yong man verie sad and pensiue, as one with an indignation sorrowfull, holding his hand vpon his brest, his countenance heauie and vncheerefull. On the left hand sate another person, hauing in his hand a net, which he threatned to lay to catch the people that stood about. The peace of the church to come, foreshewed by the Lord.

Finally, in the latter end of the foresaid epistle mention also followeth of other reuelations or shewings: Wherein the Lord (saith Cyprian) doth vouchsafe in many of his seruants to foreshew to come the restauring of his church, the stable quiet of our health and safegard; after raine faire weather, after darknesse light, after stormie tempest peaceable calme, the fatherly helpe of his loue, the wont and old glorie of his diuine maiestie, whereby both the blasphemie of the persecutor shall be represt, and the repentance of such as haue fallen be reformed, and the strong and stable confidence of them that stand shal reioyce and glorie. Thus much hath S. Cyprian, writing of these things to the clergie. Lib. 4. epist. 4.

Crimes and faults falsely laid to the christians.

As touching now the crimes and accusations in this persecution laid to the charge of the christians, this was the principall: First, because they refused to do worship to their idols and to the emperours, for that they professed the name of Christ; to the emperours then, for that they professed the name of Christ; besides, all the calamities and euils that hapned in the world as warres, famine, and pestilence, were only imputed to the christians. Against all which marshalling accusations, Cyprian doth eloquently defend the christians in his booke Contra Demetrianum: like as Tertullian had done before, writing Contra Scapulam. And first touching the obiection for not worshipping idols, hee cleareth the christians both in his booke Contra Demetr. and also De vanitate idol. prouing those idols to be no true gods, but images of certaine dead kings, which neither could saue themselues from death, nor such as worship them. The true God to be but one, and that by the testimonie of Sosthenes, Plato, and Trismegistus, the which God the christians do truly worship. And as concerning that the christians were thought to be the causes of publike calamities, because they worshipped not the Gentiles idols, he purgeth the christians thereof, prouing that if there be any defect in increase of things, it is not to be ascribed to them, but rather to the decrease of nature, languishing now towards her age and latter end. Against, for that it hath been so foresaid and prophesied, that toward the end of the world should come warres, famine, and pestilence. Moreouer, if there be any cause thereof more proper then other, it is most like to be imputed to their vaine idolatrie, and to the contempt of the true God. Also that such euils be encreased by the wickednesse of the people, so that to speake in his own words, Famem maiorem facit rapacitas quàm faciebat, that is, Famine commeth more by auarice of men, then by drought of the aire, but especially the cause thereof to proceed of the cruell shedding of the innocent blood of the christians, &c.

The apologie of Cyprian for the christians.

Cyprianus De vanitate idol.

Thus with many other probations doth Cyprian defend the christians against the barbarous exclamations of the heathen gentiles. Of which Cyprian, for so much as he suffered in the time of this persecution, I mind (Christ willing) to recapitulate here in ample discourse the full summe, first of his life and bringing vp, then of his death and martyrdome, as the worthinesse of that man deserueth to be remembred. Of this Cyprian therefore, other wise named Statius, thus writeth Pontius, Nazianzenus, Iacobus de Voragine, Henricus de Erfordia, Iolaterranus, Hieronymus, and others, that he being an African and borne in Carthage, first was an idolater and gentile, altogether giuen to the studie and practise of the magicall arts, of whose parentage and education in letters from his youth, no mention is made but that he was a worthie rhetorician in Africa: of whose conuersion and baptisme he himselfe in his first booke and second epistle, writeth a flourishing and eloquent historie. Which his conuersion vnto the christian faith as Hieronymus affirmeth in his commentarie vpon Ionas, was through the grace of God and the meanes of Cecilius a priest, whose name after he bare, and through the occasion of hearing the historie of the prophet Ionas. The same Hierome moreouer testifieth how he immediatly vpon his conuersion distributed among the poore all his substance, and after that being ordained a priest, was not long after constituted bishop of the congregation of Carthage. But whether he succeded Agrippinus of whom he often maketh mention, which also was the first author of rebaptisation, or some other bishop of Carthage, it remaineth vncertain. But this is most true, he himselfe shined in his office and dignitie with such good gifts and vertues, that as Nazianzenus writeth, he had the gouernment of the whole east church, and church of Spaine, and was called the bishop of the christian men.

Cyprian made first priest, then bishop of Carthage.

The vertues of Cyprians life declared.

And to the further setting forth (to the praise of God) of his godly vertues wherewith he was endued, appearing as well in his owne works to them that list to peruse the same, as also described by other worthie writers: he was courteous and gentle, louing and full of patience, and therwithall sharpe and seuere in his office, according as the cause required, as appeareth in his first booke and third epistle. Furthermore, as he was most louing and kind toward his brethren, and took much paine in helping and relieuing the martyrs, as appeareth by his letters to the elders and deacons of his bishoprike, that with all study and endeuour they should gentlie entertaine and cherish pleasure vnto the martyrs in his absence, as partly is touched before.

The care of Cyprian toward the afflicted but christians.

The third epistle of his first booke doth declare of what stomache and godly courage he was in executing his office, and handling his matters. Neither was he void of prudence and circumspection, but was adorned with marueilous modestie, whereby he attempted nothing vpon his owne head and iudgement, but with the consent of his fellow bishops and other inferior ministers: and that chiefely (among others) doth the tenth epistle of his third booke witnesse. He was of a marueilous liberall disposition towards the poore brethren of other countries: for so often as he had cause of absence, he committed the care of those poore men to his fellow officers, and wrote vnto them, that of their owne proper goods they would helpe their banished brethren to that which was necessarie for them, as writeth the twentie and fourth epistle of his third booke. He reciteth among other gifts wherewith he was indued, as touching the visions and heauenly admonitions of the persecutions that should follow, and of other matters touching the gouernment of the church in his first booke and third epistle, and fourth booke and fourth epistle, where he reciteth and expoundeth the forme or manner of a certaine vision which we haue before sufficiently expressed.

The modestie of Cyprian in conferring with his fellow brethren.

Visions concerning the troubles and peace of the church, recited and expounded by Cyprian.

He had moreouer great skill in the foreknowledge of things that should chance, as may be gathered in the first epistle of his fourth booke. Also Augustine doth attribute vnto him many worthie vertues, who writeth much in setting forth his gifts of humilitie, in his second booke of baptisme, the fourth chapter, against the Donatists, and in his seuenth booke and eleuenth chapter, of his long sufferance and patience; also of his courtesie and meekenesse: by which vertues he concealed nothing that he vnderstood, but vttered the same meekely and patiently. Also that he kept the ecclesiasticall peace and concord with those that were of another opinion then he was of. Lastly, that he neither circumcised nor did preiudice any man, but setteth out that thing which seemed good in his iudgement, it is manifest in S. Augustine his first booke, De baptismo contra Donatistas. Neither is this to be passed with silence, that Hierome writeth that he was verie diligent in reading, especially the workes of Tertullian: for he saith that he saw a certaine old man whose name was Paulus, which told him he saw the notarie of blessed Cyprian, being then an old man when he himselfe was but a springall in the citie of Rome, and told him that it was Cyprians wont, neuer to let one day passe without some reading of Tertullian, and that he was accustomed oftentimes to say vnto him: Giue me my master, meaning thereby Tertullian.

Cyprian marke and pattent.

Cyprian a great reader of Tertullian.

Now a few words touching his exile and martyrdome. Of his epistles which he wrote backe to his congregation, treading his life in exile, mention is made aboue, wherein he sheweth the vertue beseeming a faithfull pastour, in that he tooke no lesse care as well of his owne church, as of other bishops being absent, then he did being present. Wherein also he himselfe doth signifie that voluntarily he abiected himselfe, lest he should do more hurt then good to the congregation, by reason of his presence, as is likewise declared before. Thus from the desolat places of his banishment, wherein he was oftentimes sought for, he writeth vnto his brethren, as in his third booke and tenth epistle is manifest, which thing seemeth to be done in the raigne of Decius or Gallus. But after that he returned againe out of exile in the raigne of this Valerianus, he was also after that the second time banished of Paternus the proconsull of Africa into the citie of Churbin, as the oration of Augustine touching Cyprian sheweth; or else as Pontius the deacon saith, into a citie named Furabilitana, or Cucabitana. But when Paternus the proconsull was dead, Galienus Marinus succeded in the rome and office of Paternus, who finding Cyprian in a garden, caused him to be apprehended by his sergeants, and to be brought before the idols to offer sacrifice. Which when he would not do, then the proconsull breaking forth in these words, said: Long hast thou liued in a sacrilegious mind, and hast gathered together men of a wicked conspiracie, and hast shewed thy selfe an enemie to the gods gods of the Romans, and to their holy lawes: neither could the sacred emperours Valerianus and Galienus reuoke thee to the feat of their ceremonies. At length the wicked tyrant condemning him to haue his head cut off, he patiently and willingly submitted his necke to the stroke of the sword (as Hieronymus affirmeth.) And so this blessed martyr ended this present life in the Lord, Iesus then being bishop of Rome, as Eusebius noteth, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred fiftie and nine. Sabellicus saith that he was martyred in the raigne of Galius and Volusianus, Lucius being bishop of Rome: but that seemeth not like.

The bookes of Cyprian.

Now remaineth to speake something likewise of his workes and bookes left behind him, although all peraduenture do not remaine that he wrote: whereof some are missing, some against which in the inuerie of his name and title, are not his: but such as be certainely his by the stile and sense may some be discerned: such is the eloquence of his phrase, and grauitie of his sentence, vigor of wit, power in perswasion, so much differing from many others, as hee can lightly be imitated but of fewe. Of the which his bookes with vs extant, as the flourishing eloquence is worthily commended, proceeding out of the schole of Rhetoricians, so is the authoritie thereof no lesse of reputation, not only among vs of this age of the church, but also among the ancient fathers. Whereof Saint Augustine speaking in his commendation, saith: Ego (inquit) litteras Cypriani non vt canonicas habeo, sed eas ex canonicis confidero: & quod in eis diuinarum scripturarum autoritati congruit cum laude eius accipio: quod autem non congruit, cum pace eius respuo, &c. By which words it may appeare that Augustine, although he did not repute the bookes and writings of Cyprian to be equiualent with the holy Scripture, yet notwithstanding next after the holy Scriptures he had the same in exceeding great admiration.

The iudgement of Augustine vpon the bookes of Cyprian. August. contra Cresconium. lib. 2. cap. 32.

Tertullus and Lazarus Celestinus reciting the names of diuers bookes, bearing the title of Cyprian (more perchance then he truly hath) do collect out of them a certaine extract of his most wholsome sentences, all which here to repeat were to tedious. To giue a taste of the speciall, I thought it not impertinent. As where he speaking of the treasures of a rich man, exhorteth, saying:

They which loue to paint themselues in this world other wise must beware in commending the doctors and writers of the church, and so commend them, that truth and consideration go with our commendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other blessed martyrs were holy men; yet notwithstanding they were men, that is, such as might haue, and had their falles and faults: men I say, and not angels, nor gods, saued by God, not saniours of men, nor patrons of grace. And though they were also men of excellent learning, and worthie doctors, yet with their learning they had their errours also annexed. And though their bookes be (as they ought to be) of great authoritie, yet ought they not to be equall with the Scriptures. And albeit they said well in most things, yet it is not therefore enough that what they said it must stand for a truth. What preheminence of authoritie only belongeth to the word of God, and not to the pen of man. For

The place of Scripture expounded, Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat. Tob. 4. Ex Cypr. lib. 4. epist. 2.

¶ Moreouer lest the papists here of should take an occasion by this text, grounded vpon the text of Tob. cap. 4. Almes (saith he) deliuereth from all sinne and death: to build vp the workes of satisfaction, the said Cyprian, lib. 4. epist. 2. more plainly expounded both himselfe, and that place of Scripture, writing in these words: Quia scriptum est, Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat: Tob. 4. Non vtique ab ea morte, quam semel Christi sanguis extinxit, & à qua nos salutaris baptismi & redemptoris nostri gratia liberauit, sed ab illa quæ per delicta postmodum serpit, &c. that is, Almes doe deliuer from all sinne and from death: Tob. 4. Not from that (saith Cyprian) which the blood of Christ hath once extincted, and from which the wholesome grace of our baptisme, and of our redeuer hath deliuered vs, but from that death which afterwards creepeth in by sinne, &c. Cyprian, lib. 4. epist. 2. By which words it is apparant, that Cyprian meaneth this deliuerance (which commeth by almes giuing) from death and sinne, not to be expounded nor to be taken for death euerlasting, from which only the blood of Christ doth saue vs: but for temporall or transitorie punishment, which is wont to be inflicted in this booke of sinne. For so it is nothing repugnant, but that temporall tortures may haue their temporall rewards in this life, and likewise sinnes committed may haue temporall punishments both of vs and in our families, ere eternall salnation standing euermore firme in Christ yet notwithstanding.

How far the authoritie of the doctors ought to extend.

The blemishes and errors of Doctors also.

The foresaid Vincentius moreouer speaking of another booke of Cyprian (although the said book be not numbred in the catalogue of his workes) maketh mention of twelue abuses, or absurdities in the life of man, which in order be these:

Twelue abuses in the life of man noted out of Cyprian.

1 Sapiens sine operibus. A wise man without good workes.
2 Senex sine religione. An old man without religion.
3 Adolescens sine obedictia. A yong man without obedience.
4 Diues sine eleemosyna. A rich man without almes.
5 Fœmina sine pudicitia. A woman shamelesse.
6 Dominus sine virtute. A guide without vertue.
7 Christianus contentiosus. A christian man contentious.
8 Pauper superbus. A poore man proud.
9 Rex iniquus. A king vnrighteous.
10 Episcopus negligens. A bishop negligent.
11 Plebs sine disciplina. People without discipline.
12 Populus sine lege. Subiects without law.

As the hue hitherto set forth the communion of Cyprian this blessed martyr: to muse we now take head again, that we do not here incur the old and common danger, which the papists are commonly accustomed to run into, whole fault is alwaies almost to be immoderat and excesse in their procedings, making too much almost of euery thing. So in speaking of the holy Sacraments, they make more of them then both the nature of Sacraments require; not vsing them, but abusing them, not referring or applying them, but adoring them, not taking them in their kind for things godly as they are, but taking them for God himselfe, turning religion into superstition, and the creature to the Creator, the things signifying to the things themselues signified, &c. To the church likewise and ceremonies of thy church, to general councels, to the blessed virgin Marie mother of Christ, to the bishop of Rome, and to all other in like case, not contented to attribute that which is sufficient, they exceed moreouer the bounds of iudgement and beritie, iudging so of the church, and general councels, as though they could neuer, or did neuer erre in any tot. That the blessed mother of Christ amongst all women was blessed, and a virgin full of grace, the Scripture and truth both giue; but to say that she was borne without all originall sinne, or to make of her an aduocat, or mother of mercie, there they runne further then truth will beare. The ceremonies were first ordained to serue but onlie for order sake, into the which they haue attributed so much at length, that they haue set in them a great part of our religion, yea and also saluation. And what thing is there else almost, wherein the papist haue not exceded?

The facte of papists to make too much of euerie thing.

The learning of Cyprian ioyned with his blemishes.

Wherefore to auoid this common error of the papists, lie must beware in commending the doctors and writers of the church, and so commend them, that truth and consideration go with our commendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other blessed martyrs were holy men; yet notwithstanding they were men, that is, such as might haue, and had their falles and faults: men I say, and not angels, nor gods, saued by God, not saniours of men, nor patrons of grace. And though they were also men of excellent learning, and worthie doctors, yet with their learning they had their errours also annexed. And though their bookes be (as they ought to be) of great authoritie, yet ought they not to be equall with the Scriptures. And albeit they said well in most things, yet it is not therefore enough that what they said it must stand for a truth. What preheminence of authoritie only belongeth to the word of God, and not to the pen of man. For of men and doctors, be they never so famous, there is none that is void of his reprehension. In Origen (although in his time the admiration of his learning was singular) yet how many things be there, which the church now holdeth not? But examining him by Scriptures, where he said well, they admit him, where otherwise they leave him. In Polycarpus y church hath corrected and altered that which he did hold in celebrating the Easter day after the Jewes. Neither can holy and blessed Ignatius be defended in all his sayings: as where he maketh the fasting upon the Sunday or the Sabbath day as great an offence, as to kill Christ himselfe: Ignat. epist. ad Philip. contrarie to this saying of Saint Paul, Let no man judge you in meat and drinke: also where the said Ignatius speaketh De virginitate, and of other things more. Irenæus did hold that man was not made perfect in the beginning. Hee seemeth also to defend free will in man, in those things also that be spirituall. He saith that Christ suffered after he was fiftie yeares old, abiding this place of the Gospell: Quinquaginta annos nondum habes, &c. Tertullian (whom Saint Cyprian never had out of his hands almost) is noted to be a Chiliast: also to have been of Montanus set. The same did hold also with Justine, Cyprian, and others, that the Angels fell first for the concupiscence of women: Lib. de habitu mulierum. He defendeth free will of man after the corruption of nature, inclining also to the errour of them, which defend the possibilitie of keeping Gods law. Concerning marriage; Vnum matrimonium (inquit) nouimus, sicut vnum Deum: that is, We know (saith he) one marriage, as we know one God; condemning the second marriage, Lib. de Monogam. Diuers other things of like absurditie in him be noted. Justinus also seemeth to have inclined vnto the errour of the Chiliasts, of the fall of certaine Angels by women, of free will of man, of possibilitie of keeping the law, and such others. Neither was this our Cyprian, the great scholler of Tertullian, vtterly exempt from the blot of them, who contrarie to the doctrine of the church, did hold with rebaptizing of such, as were before baptized of heretikes, whereof speaketh Saint Augustine, misliking the same errour of Cyprian, in these words contained in his second booke Contra Cresconium. Cypriani, inquit, laudem ego consequi non valeo, eius multis literis mea scripta non comparo, eius ingenium diligo, eius ore delector, eius charitatem miror, eius martyrium veneror: non accipio quod de baptisandis hæreticis & schismaticis sensit, &c. Vpon the which matter there was a great contestation betweene the said Cyprian, and Stephan bishop of Rome, as partly afore is noted. Of Augustine himselfe likewise, of Ambrose, Hierome, Chrysostome, the same may be said, that none of them all so clearely passed away, but their peculiar faults and errors went with them, whereof it were too long, and out of our purpose at this present to intreat. And thus much concerning the storie of Cyprian the holy learned martyr of Christ.

Contention between Cyprian and Stephan the bishop of Rome.

Albeit heere is to be noted by the way, touching the life and storie of Cyprian, that this Cyprian was not he whom the narration of Nazianzen speaketh of (as is aboue mentioned) who from art magicke was converted to be a christian, which Cyprian was a citizen of Antioch, and afterward bishop of the same citie, and was martyred vnder Diocletian: whereas this Cyprian was bishop of Carthage, and died vnder Valerianus, as is said, &c. By the decrees of Gratian, dist. 10. quoniam, it appeareth moreover that there was also a third Cyprian in the time of Julianus the emperour apostata, long after both these aforenamed: for so giueth the title prefixed before the said distinction, Cyprianus Iuliano imperatori: the distinction beginning: Quoniam idem mediator Dei & hominum homo Christus Iesus, sic actibus propriis, & dignitatibus distinctis officia potestatis vtriusque discernit, &c. Vpon the which distinction the glosse commeth in with these words, saying: that the popedome, and the seat imperiall, haue both one beginning of one, that is, Christ: who was both bishop, and king of kings. And that the said dignities be distincted, albeit the pope notwithstanding hath both the swords in his hand, and may exercise them both some time. And therefore although they be distincted, yet in exercise the one standeth lineally vnder the other, so that the imperiall dignity is subiect vnder the papal dignitie, as the inferiour is subiect vnder the superiour: that as there is one ruler ouer the whole world, which is God; so in the church is one monarch, that is, the pope, to whom the Lord hath committed the power and lawfull right of both the heauenly and terrene dominion. Hæc glossa.

Dist. 10. Quoniam.

Glossa. Alium glossæ challenging a deny these words to the pope's hand.

A distinction of Gratian disproued.

Thus much I thought heere to note by the way, because this distinction is fathered vpon Cyprian, which is false, for this Cyprian was not in the time of Julian, not by two hundred yeares, and so likewise by the other Cyprian, which died martyr vnder Diocletian. Of any Cyprian besides these two we reade not; neither is it credible, that if there were any such Cyprian, he would ouer haue written of any such matter, of the difference and mutuall need of christian emperours and christian popes: when as that emperour being an apostata, neither regarded Christ, nor cared for any pope.

Xistus the second bishop of Rome martyr.

About this time, and vnder the same emperour Valerianus suffered also Xistus, or Sixtus, the second of that name, bishop of Rome, who being accused of his aduersaries, to be a christian, was brought with his fiue deacons to the place of execution, where hee with Nemesius and other his deacons were beheaded and suffered martyrdome. Laurence in the same time being also deacon, followed after, complaining to Xistus (as one being grieued) that he might not also suffer with him, but to be secluded as the sonne from the father. To whom the bishop answering againe, declared that within three daies he should follow after. In the meane time he willed him to go home & to distribute his treasures, if he had any, vnto the poore. The iudge belike hearing mention to be made of treasures to be giuen to the poore, and thinking that Laurence had great store of treasure in his custodie, commanded him to bring the same to him, according as in the discourse of his storie here vnder written more fully may appeare. Which historie, because it is set forth more at large in Prudentius, Ambrose and other writers, and containeth in it more things worthie to be noted of the reader; we haue therefore with the more diligence here inserted the more ample description of the same, to the further admiration of his patience, and God his glorie thereof in hunt.

Six deacons with Xistus martyr.

Now then as order requireth, let vs enter the storie of that most constant and courageous martyr of Christ S. Laurence, whose words and workes deserue to be as freshly and greene in christian hearts, as is the flourishing laurell tree. This thirstie hart longing after the water of life, desirous to passe vnto it through the strait doore of bitter death, when on a time he saw his vigilant shepheard Xistus, led as an harmelesse lambe of harmefull tyrants to his death, cried out with open mouth and heart inuincible, saying; O deere father whither goest thou without the companie of thy deare sonne? Whither hastnest thou, O reuerend priest without thy deacon? Neuer vsedst thou wont to offer sacrifice without thy minister. What crime is there in me that offendeth thy fatherhood? hast thou proued me vnnaturall? Now trie (sweet father) whether thou hast chosen a faithfull minister or not? Denedt thou vnto him the fellowship of thy blood, to whom thou hast committed the distribution of the Lords blood? See that thy iudgement be not nullified, whilest thy fortitude is liked and lauded. The abasing of the scholar, is the disgracing of the master. What? Peter we not learned that worthie masters haue obtained most worthie fame by the worthie acts of their disciples and scholars? Finally Abraham sacrificed his onely begotten Isaac: Moued Stephan prepared the way to preaching Peter: euen so father declare thy manifold vertues by me thy sonne. Offer thou him that proffereth himselfe; grant that the bloud of thy scholar may be sacrificed, whose mind with good letters thou hast beautified. These words with teares Saint Laurence vttered, not because his master should suffer, but for that he might not be suffered to taste of deaths cup which hee tasted after.

The true treasure of Christ his church.

The loue and martyrdome of Laurence. Ex Ambros. lib. 1. offic. cap. 41. Ex Prudentio. lib. περὶ στεφ.

The words of Laurence to Xistus.

Then Xistus to his sonne shaped this answere: I forsake thee not O my sonne. I giue thee to wit, that a sharper conflict remaineth for thee. A feeble and weake old man am I, and therefore run the race of a lighter and easier death: but lustie and yong thou art, and more lustilie, yea more gloriously shalt thou triumph ouer this tyrant; thy time approcheth, cease to weepe and lament, three daies after thou shalt follow me: decent is it that this space of time come betweene the priest and the Leuit. It may not betseeme thee, O sweet pupill, to triumph vnder thy master, lest it be said he wanted an helper. Why eraued thou to be partaker with me in my passion? I frequently vnto thee the whole inheritance. Why requirest thou to enioy my presence? Let weake scholars go before, and the stronger come after, that those to whom master may ouer the victorie, which haue no need by master to be gouerned. So Helias left behind him his beloued Helisæus. I yeeld vp into thy hands the succession of my vertues. Such was their contention not vnmeet for so godly a paire, and so zealous a ministers, striuing with themselues who should first suffer for the name of Christ Jesus.

The answere of Xistus to Laurence.

In tragicall historie we haue it mentioned, that through ioy and admiration, people clapped their hands, when Pilades named himselfe Orestes; Orestes (as truth it was) affirmed himselfe to be Orestes: Pilades wishing to die for Orestes, Orestes not suffering Pilades to lose his life for his sake, but neither of them might escape death, for both these lours were guiltie of blood, the one committing the fact, the other consenting. But this our Laurence the martyr most constant, was by no meanes enforced to make this proffer, sauing only by his ardent zeale and feruent spirit, who thirsting after the cup of martyrdome, had it shortly after filled to the hard brim.

Now let vs draw neere to the fire of martyred Laurence, that our cold hearts may be warmed thereby. The mercilesse tyrant tenderlanding this vertuous Leuite, not onely to be a minister of the Sacraments, but a distributer also of the church riches (whereof mention is made before in the words of Xistus) promised to himselfe a double prey by the apprehension of one silly soule. First with the rake of auarice to scrape to himselfe the treasure of pore christians, then with the fierie fourke of tyrannie so to toste and turmoile them, that they should wax wearie of their cruell profession: with furious face and cruell countenance the greedie wolfe demanded where this this deacon Laurence had bestowed the substance of the church. Who craning three daies respite, promised to declare where the treasure might be had. In the meane time he caused a good number of poore christians to be congregated. So when the day of his answere was come, the persecutor strictly charged him to stand to his promise. Then valiant Laurence stretching out his armes ouer the poore, said: These are the pretious treasure of the church, these are the treasure indeed, in whom the faith of Christ raigneth, in whom Jesus Christ hath his mansion place. What more pretious iewels can Christ haue, then those in whom he hath promised to dwell? For so it is written, I was hungrie and ye gaue me to eat: I was thirstie, and yee gaue me to drinke: I was harborlesse, and ye lodged me. And againe: Loke what ye haue done to the least of these, the same haue ye done to me. What greater riches can Christ our master possesse, then the poore people, in whom he loueth to be seene? Oh, what tongue is able to expresse the furie and madnesse of the tyrants heart! Now he stamped, he skared, he ramped, he fared as one out of his wits: his eyes like fire glowed, his mouth like a boze fomed, his teeth like a helhound grinded. Now not a reasonable man, but a roaring lion he might be called. Kindle the fire (he cried) of wood make no spare. Hath this villaine deluded the emperour? Away with him, away with him: whip him with scourges, teare him with rods, buffet him with fists, braine him with clubs. Iesketh the tyrant to with the emperour? Pinch him with fire tongs, gird him with burning plates, bring out the strongest chaines, and the fire forks, and the greatest bed of iron: on the fire with it, bind the rebell hand and fot, and when the bed is fire hot, on with him: roll him, broile him, rosse him, turne him: on paine of our high displeasure do euery man his office. O ye tormentors. The word was no sooner spoken, but all was done.

Laurence tormented on the fierie gridiron.

After many cruell handlings, this mackle lambe was laid. I will not say on his firie bed of iron, but on his soft bed of downe. So mightily God brought with his martyr Laurence, so miraculously God tempered his element the fire, not a bed of consuming paine, but a pallet of nourishing rest was it vnto Laurence. Not Laurence, but the emperor might seeme to be tormented: the one broyling in the flesh, the other burning in the heart. When this triumphant martyr had been pressed downe with fire pikes for a great space, in the mightie Spirit of God he spake to the vanquished tyrant:

The singular patience of Laurence in his paines.

This side is now rosted enough, turne vp a tyrant great:
Assay whether rosted or raw, thou thinkst the better meat.

O rare and vnaccustomed patience! O faith inuincible! that not only not burneth, but by meanes vnspeakable doth recreat, refresh, stablish, and strengthen those that are burned, afflicted and troubled. And why so mightily comforteth thou the persecuted? Because though they be broyled in Gods pannies yet infallible. Vp thee this glorious martyr ouercommeth his torments, vanquisheth this tyrant, confoundeth his enemies, confirmeth the christians, sleepeth in peace, and raigneth in glorie. The God of might and mercie grant vs grace, by the life of Laurence to learne in Christ to liue, and by his death to learne for Christ to die, Amen.

The martyrdome and end of blessed Laurence.

Such is the wisedome and prouidence of God, that the bloud of his deare saints (like good seed) neuer falleth in vaine to the ground, but it bringeth some encrease: so it pleased the Lord to worke at the martyrdome of this holy Laurence, that by the constant confession of this worthie and valiant deacon, a certaine souldier of Rome being therewith compuncted and conuicted to the same faith, desired forthwith to be baptised of him: for the which he being called for of the iudge, was scourged, and afterward beheaded. Henr. de Erford.

Under the same Valerianus suffered also Dionysius bishop of Alexandria much affliction and banishment, with certaine other brethren: of the which he writeth himselfe, and is alledged in the ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius, lib. 7. cap. 11. the words whereof tend to this effect. Dionysius with three of his deacons, to wit, Maximus, Faustus, and Cheremon also with a certaine brother of Rome, came to Emilianus then president, who there declared vnto them in circumstance of words how he had signified vnto them the clemencie of his lords and emperors: who had granted them pardon of life, so that they would returne to them, and worship the gods and keepers (as he called them) of their emperie, asking them what answere they would giue him thereunto: trusting as he said that they would not shew themselues ingrateful to the clemencie of them which so gently did exhort them. To this Dionysius answering, said: All men worship not all gods. but diuers men diuers gods; so as euery one hath in himselfe a mind or phantasie to worship. But wee worship not many nor diuers gods, but only that one God, who is the Creator of all things, and hath committed to our lords Valerianus and Galienus the gouernement of their emperie, making to him our prayers incessantly for their prosperous health and continuance. Then the president said: And what hurt is it, but that you may both worship your God, what god soeuer he be, and yet our gods also? For you are commanded to worship such gods as all men know to be gods. Dionysius answered, We worship none other, but as we haue said. Emilianus the president said: I see you are ingrateful men, and consider not the benignitie of the emperor, therefore you shall remaine no longer in this citie, but shall be sent out to the parts of Libia, vnto a towne called Cephyo: for that place by the commandement of the emperor I haue chosen for you. Neither shall it be lawfull for you, to conuent your assemblies, or to resort, as ye are wont to your burial places. And if any of you shall be found out of your places whereunto you are appointed, at your perill be it. And thinke not contrarie, but ye shall be watched well enough. Depart therefore to the place as is commanded you. And it followeth more in the said Dionysius speaking of himselfe: And as for me (saith he) although I was sicke, yet he bided me so strictlie to depart, that he would not giue me one daies respit. And how (saith he, writing to Germanus) could I congregat or not congregat any assemblies? And after a few lines it followeth: And yet neither am I altogether absent from the copsoll societie of the Lords flocke, but I haue collected them together, which were in the citie, being absent, as though I had been present, absent in bodie, yet present in spirit. And in the same Cephyo, a great congregation remained with me, as well of those brethren which followed me out of the citie, as also of them which were remaining there out of Egypt. And there the Lord opened to me the doze of his word, although at the first entrance I was persecuted and stoned among them, yet afterward a great number of them fell from their idols and were conuerted vnto the Lord. And so by us the word was preached to them which before were infidels: which ministerie after that we had accomplished there, the Lord removed vs to another place. For Emilianus translated vs from thence to more sharpe and stricter places of Libia, commanded vs to meet all together at the citie Parcota, thinking there to separate vs seuerally into sundrie villages, or thinking rather to take and prevent vs by the way. After we were come thither, it was alleged to me (saith Dionysius) to go to Collusthion, which place I neuer heard of before: which was the more grieue to me, yet some solace it was to me, that the brethren told me it was neere to a citie named Paretonium. For as my being at Cephyo got me the acquaintance of many brethren of Egypt, so my hope was that the vicinitie of that place (where I should be) to the citie, might procure the familiaritie and concourse of certaine louing brethren, which would resort and assemble with vs, and so it came to passe, &c.

Infidels conuerted by Dionysius in the banishment. Ex Dionysio contra Germanum. Euseb. lib. 7.

Moreouer the said Dionysius in his epistle Ad Domitium & Dydimum, making mention of them which were afflicted in this persecution of Valerian, recordeth in these words, saying: It were superfluous (saith he) here to recite the names peculiarly of all our brethren slaine in this persecution, which both were many and to me vnknowne. But this is certaine, that there were men, women, young men, maidens, old wiues, soule piers, simple innocents, and of all sorts and ages of men. Of whom some with scourgings and fire, some with sword obtained victorie, and got the crowne. Some continued a great time, and yet haue been reserued. In the which number am I reserued hitherto to some other opportune time knowne vnto the Lord, which saith: In the time accepted I haue heard thee, and in the day of saluation I haue helped thee, &c. Now as concerning my selfe in what state I am, if thou desire to know first how I and Caius, and Faustus, Petrus and Paulus, being apprehended by the Centurion, were taken away by certaine of the towne of Pareota, I haue declared to you before. Now I and Caius, and Petrus alone are left here included in a well place of Libia, distant the space of three daies iourney from Paretonium, &c. And in proceasse further he addeth: In the citie (saith he) were certaine priuily which visit the brethren: of priests, Marinus, Dioscorus, Demetrius, and Lucius. For they which were more notable in the world, Faustinus and Aquila, do wander abroad in Egypt. Of the deacons he tides them whom sickenesse hath consumed, Faustus, Eusebius, and Cheremon, are yet alue. Eusebius hath God raised and stirred vp to minister to the confessors lying in bands, and to burie the bodies of the blessed martyrs, not without great peril. Neither doth the president cease yet to this day, cruelly murthering such as he bringht afore him, some tearing with torments, some imprisoning and keeping in custodie commanding that no man should come to them, enquiring also who resorted vnto them. Bet notwithstanding God with cheerefulnes and daily resort of the brethren doth comfort the afflicted. Hæc Dionysius.

Dionysius long persecuted, at last a martyr.

Concerning these deacons aboue recited, here is to be noted, that Eusebius afterward was made bishop of Laodicea in Syria. Maximus the priest afore said had the ministration of the church of Alexandria after Dionysius. Faustus long after continued in great age, vnto the latter persecution, where he being a verie old man at length was beheaded, and died a martyr.

As touching Dionysius himselfe, thus the stories report, that he surviuing all these troubles and persecutions, by the prouidence of God, continued after the death of Valerian vnto the twelfth yeare of the raigne of Galienus, which was about the yeare of our Lord two hundred threescore and eight. And so departed in peace in great age, after that he had gouerned the church of Alexandria the space of seuentene yeares, and before that had taught the schole of the said citie of Alexandria

In Cesarea Palestine suffered also the same time, Paulus, Malchus, and Alexander, the which three dwelling in the countrie, and good men, seeing the valiant courage of the christians, so boldly to venture, and constantly to stand, and patiently to suffer in this persecution, as men being grieued with themselues, began to repent and accuse their so great sluggishnesse, and towardly negligence, to see others so zealous and valiant, and themselues so cold and faint hearted, in laboring for the crowne of christian martyrdome: first consulting and agreeing with themselues, came to Cesarea, and there stepping to the iudge, declared themselues that they were, and obtained the end they came for, being giuen to the wilde beasts. After which like manner also and in the same citie of Cesarea, a certaine woman whose name Eusebius expresseth not, who had been before of the sect of Marcion was brought before the president, and likewise obtained the same martyrdome. Neither was the citie of Carthage all this while free from the stroke of this persecution, if credit should be giuen to the speculative glasse of Vincentius, who citing out of Hugo, recordeth of three hundred martyrs, of which three hundred martyrs the historie saith thus, that the president setting before them coales and incense to do sacrifice, by a lime kilne, which was there neere at hand, offered into them this condition, either to set incense to the coales for sacrifice to Jupiter, or else to go into the fornace of lime: whereupon they all together with a generall motion suddenly rushed into the kilne, and there with the dustie smoke of the lime were smothered. Vincent. Erford.

In Africa also in the citie of Tuburba, the said Vincentius out of the martyrologe inferreth mention of three constant virgins, Sarima, Donatilla, and Secunda, who in the persecution of this Valerian and Gallienus, first had giuen for their drinke vineger and gall, then with scourges were tried, after that upon the gibbet were tormented, and rubbed with lime: then were scorched upon the fierie gridiron, at last were cast to the wilde beasts, who being not touched of them, finally with the sword were beheaded. Bergomensis cognitus.

Moreouer in the same citie of Alexandria aforesaid, Bergomensis in his eight booke, writing of the storie of Valerianus emperor, maketh mention of Philippus, bishop of the said sect of Alexandria, who (as he saith) was vnder the said Valerian beheaded. But that is not to be found in any approued storie, nor standeth with the truth of time that any such Philip then was bishop of Alexandria, or any other except only Dionysius. After whom next succeeded Maximus, who remained eighteene yeares, and after him Theonas, &c. So that by the ancient records of old writers it appeareth not, that Philippus euer any other of that name was bishop of Alexandria, during this time signified by Bergomensis.

Although in some other latter writers, as Equilinus, Antoninus, and Bergomensis, I find a certaine historie of one Philippus president of Alexandria about the same time of Valerian and Gallienus, elected by the emperour and senat of Rome, to governe those quarters, where he was at length converted to the christian faith, and after made priest or bishop (as they say) of Alexandria: but that not to be so, the testimonie of ancient writers both resell. The hitstorie of this Philippus twitnessed in our latter chronicles, is this: Philippus being promoted to the presidentship of Alexandria, came downe with his wife Claudia, and his two sons, Acutus, and Sergius, and with his daughter named Eugenia, of the which Eugenia a long historie full of strange and prodigious miracles is written of Antoninus and others, whereof many things I will cut off, and briefly touch the effect of the storie, leauing to the iudgement of the reader the credit of mine authors, as he shall see cause.

Ex Antonino, part. 1. cap. 6.

The storie of Philippus and Eugenia.

Eugenia, Philippus, Claudius, Martirius, Emilenus.

This Eugenia daughter of Philippus, being of singular beautie, and diligently brought vp by her parents in the studie of science and learning, was by occasion of hearing christians, reduced and brought vp to christianitie, with two other eunuchs her schole-fellowes, called Protthus and Hiacinthus: with whom she taking counsell, vpon occasion, whether to auoid the danger of persecution, or refusing to marrie with a pagan, vnknowne to her parents and friends did flie away; and because she more boldly she might resist to heare the tydings of Helenus then an aged bishop and of others, changed her selfe into mans apparell, and named her selfe Eugenius, vnder the which name she was at length admitted into a certaine monasterie, of a societie of christians in the suburbs of Alexandria (although I hardly beleeue that any monasterie of christians was then in the suburbs of Alexandria permitted) where also at the last for her excellencie of learning and vertue, she was made head of the place.

Eugenia leauing her parents, changeth her selfe into mans apparell.

Helenus bishop of Hieropolis.

Here by the way I omit the miracles of the foresaid Helenus, bishop (as the storie saith) of Hieropolis) how he caried burning coales in his lap, and how he aduentured himselfe to go in the burning fire, to reuil wicked Zenas a pagan, remaining in the same vnburned. Here also I omit the carefull search of her parents for her, and of the answere of the bishop nisse againe vnto them, that she was taken vp to the heauen among the goddesses. I omit moreouer the miracles done by the said Eugenia, in healing the diseases and sicknesses of such as came to her, &c. The storie proceedeth thus: Among others which were by this Eugenius cured and restored, there was a certaine matrone of Alexandria named Melancia, who after she had sued the helpe and acquaintance of Eugenius, supposing her to be a man, fell into an inordinate loue, seeking by all meanes how to accomplish the lust of her concupiscence. In so much that in her daily visiting of her, at length she began secretly to breake her minde, and to entice her to her lewdnesse. Eugenius contrarie exhorted her to vertue and honestie, shewing her the miseries of this life, and the perill of that folly. Melancia seeing that by no meanes she would be allured nor by force drawne to her desire, and fearing moreouer that she in detecting of her would bring her to shame, beginneth first to make an outcrie of Eugenius, declaring how that she went about corrupthy to dessloure her, and so presenting her accusation before Philippus the president, as well against Eugenius, as also against the rest of that companie. This matter being heard, and the woman well knowne, the crime began to seeme suspicious, and so much the more, because it was obiected against the christians. By reason whereof Eugenius with her fellow christians was now not only in great hatred, but also in danger of present death and destruction. Then Eugenius purging her selfe and her houstie, although with sufficient probation, yet notwithstanding perceiuing that it could take no place, whatsoeuer she said, and seeing no time now to dissemble any longer, for the danger as well of her owne selfe, as specially of her brethren which troubled her more: desired of the iudge place and time to make manifest to him the truth, and to shewe her selfe that she was, and how she was his daughter, the other to be Protthus and Hiacinthus the two eunuchs, her schole-fellowes, uttering moreouer to him and to her brethren the cause of her departing from them. At the narration where of Philippus her father, and her two brethren comming to the knowledge of her, conceiued no little ioy, in receiuing their Eugenia againe, whom they thought had been lost. No lesse gladnesse was among the people, to see the exultation of the matter so plainly to trie out the truth of the one, and the falsenesse of the other. Whereat the malignant accuser was with double shame confounded, first for her dishonestie falsely cloaked, secondly so: the untruth of her accusation openly detected. Bergomensis addeth moreouer, that the said accuser was stricken presently with lightning. Thus Eugenia tryed her honestie to her parents and friends, not only was receiued of them again, but also by the grace of the Lord working with her, in the space of time did winne them to Christ. Whereby Philippus the father of her by nature, now by grace was begotten of his owne daughter to a more perfect life, and whom once he thought to haue been lost, not only he found again, but also with her found his owne soule, and his owne life, which before he had lost indeed. This Philippus (saith the storie) was made afterward bishop of Alexandria, and there suffered martyrdome. Concerning whose martyrdome I denie not but it may be true, but that he was bishop of Alexandria, that cannot be admitted, as is before sufficiently prooued out of Eusebius and other ancient historicians.

Likewise it is said, that Eugenia after the martyrdome of her father, returning to Rome with Protthus and Hiacinthus, by occasion of conuerting Basilla (who should haue been married to a pagan husband, and was then beheaded) to the christian faith, was assailed with sundrie kinds of death, first being tied to a great stone and cast into Tiber, where she was carried vp from drowning, then put in the hot baths, which were extincted, and the preserued: afterward by famishment in prison, where they say she was fed at the hand of our Saviour: all which legendarie miracles I leaue to the reader to iudge of them as shall seeme good vnto him. At last the storie saith, she was with the sword beheaded. Antonin. Bergom. Ado.

Gods punishment to be noted.

And because in this present historie mention was made of Helenus, whom Antoninus with his fellowes noteth to be the bishop of Hieropolis, here is to be vnderstood and obserued by the way, that as Philippus in the foresaid historie is falsely said to be bishop of Alexandria, so likewise untrue it is that Helenus was bishop of Hieropolis. For by Eusebius it appeareth, lib. 7. cap. 5. alledging the words of Dionysius, that he was bishop of Tarsus.

The first yere of Valerianus and Galienus we reade in the historie of Hertodienus, cited out of Iuardus, of Victor and Victorinus, who lying in prison the space of three yeares with Claudianus & Polla his wife, are said to haue sustained great torments and martyrdome for the testimonie and name of Christ. Ex Iuardo.

The punishment of God vpon Claudius persecutor of the emperor.

Aurelius Prudentius in his book intituled Peristephanon, inscreth mention of Fructuosius bishop of Tarracona in Spaine, who with his two deacons Augurius and Eulogius, suffered also martyrdome, being burned after six daies imprisonment vnder the foresaid emperors in this persecution. The cause of their punishment was for the profession of Christs name: their iudge and condemner was Emilianus; their imprisonment indured six daies; the kind of death minstred vnto them was fire; wherin they being all together cast with their armes bound behind them, their bands (as Prudentius writeth) were dissolued, their hands vntouched with the fire, and their bodies remaining whole. The charge of this iudge vnto the bishop was this, that he should worship the gods whom the emperor Galienus worshipped. To whom Fructuosius the bishop answering; Nay (said he) I worship no dumbe God of stocks and blocks, whom Galienus doth worship, but I worship the Lord and maker of Galienus, the father and creator of all things, and his only sonne sent hether to vs, of whose flocke I am here the pastor and shepheard. At this word Emilianus auaunting againe; Nay (saith he) say not thou art, but say thou wast. And forthwith commanded them to be committed to the fire, where (as is said) their bands and manicles being losed by the fire, they lifted vp their hands to heauen, praising the liuing God to the great admiration of them that stood by, praying also that the element which seemed to rise from them, might worke his full force vpon them, and speedilie dispatch them; which was after their request obtained. In the meane space as they were in the fire, there was a certaine souldier in the house of Emilianus, who did see the heauens aboue to open and these foresaid martyrs to enter in the same, which souldier likewise shewed the sight the same time vnto the daughter of Emilianus the president, who beholding the same sight with the souldier, was a present witnesse of the blessednesse of them whom her cruell father had condemned.

Ex Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 15.

At this godly bishop was preparing to his death (saith Prudentius) the brethren approching to him, brought him drinke, desiring him with much weeping to receiue and drinke with them; but that he refused to doe, requiring them moreouer to restraine their teares. With like readinesse the brethren also were diligent about him to plucke off his shoes and hose as he was addelling himselfe to the fire: but neither would he suffer any seruants helpe in that wherein he was no lesse willing as able to helpe himselfe. And thus this blessed and fruitfull bishop Fructuosius with his two deacons Augurius and Eulogius, being brought to the fire, witnessed the constant confession of the name of Christ with the shedding of their bloud. Aurel. Prudentius, Ado, Equilinus.

The ennobled of Fructuosius.

And this far continued wicked Valerian in his tyrannis against the saints of Christ. But as all the tyrants before, and oppressors of the christians had their deserued reward at the last hand of God, which tendeth to euery man according to his works: so this cruell Valerian, after he had raigned with his sonne Galienus the terme of five or seuen yeres, and about two yeres had afflicted the church of Christ, felt the full stroke of his hand, whose indignation before he had prouoked, thereof we haue to witnesse Eutropius, Pollio, Sabellicus, Volaterranus: for making his expedition against the Persians, whether by the fraud & treason of some about him, or whether by his owne rashnesse, it is doubtfull: but this is certaine, that he fell into the hands of his enemies, being about the age of foure score yeres, where he led his wretched age in a more wretched captiuitie. In so much that Sapores the king of the Persians vsed him (and well worthie) not for his riding sole, but for his riding blocke: for whensoeuer the king should light vpon his horse openlie in the sight of the people, Valerian emperor Quondam, was brought forth in stead of a blocke for the king to tread vpon his backe in going to his horseback. And so continued this blockish butcherlie emperour with shame and shoot enough vnto his finall end, as witnesseth Letus and Aurelius Victor.

Valerian a rich senatour and consulor.

Albeit Eusebius, in a certaine sermon to the congregation, declareth a more cruell handling of him, affirming that he was taine, writing in these words: Sed & tu Valeriane, quorum eandem homicidiorum seuitiam erga subditos Dei exercuisti, iustum Dei iudicium declarasti, dum captiuus ac vinctus vna cum ipsa purpura ac reliquo imperatorio ornatu abducêtus, ac tandem a Sapore Persarum rege excoriari iussus, saléque conditus, perpetuum infelicitatis tuæ trophæum erexisti, &c: that is, And thou Valerian for so much as thou hast exercised the same crudelitie in murthering of the subiects of God, therefore hast procured vnto vs the righteous iudgement of God, in that thy selfe hast been bound in chaines, and caried away for a captiue slaue with thy gorgeous purple, and thy imperiall attire, and at length also being commanded of Sapores king of the Persians to be slaine and powdered with salt, hast set vp vnto all men a perpetuall monument of thine otone wretchednesse, &c. Euseb.

Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 15.

The like seueritie of God by his terrible iudgement is also to be noted in Claudius his president and minister of his persecutions. Of which Claudius Henricus de Erfordia thus writeth, that he was possessed and vexed of the diuell, in such sort, that he biting off his owne tongue in many small peces, so ended his life. Erford.

Neither did Galienus the sonne of Valerian after the captiuitie of his father vtterly escape the righteous hand of God: for beside the vnstable captiuitie of his father, whom he could not rescue, such portents strange and out of the course of nature, such earthquakes did happen; also such tumults, commotions and rebellions did follow, that Trebellio doth reckon vp to the number of thirtie together, which in sundrie places all at one time take vpon them to be tyrants and emperors ouer the monarchie of Rome, by the means whereof he was not able to succor his father though he would. Notwithstanding the said Galienus being (as is thought) terrified by the example of his father, did renounce; at least did moderat the persecution stirred vp by the edicts of Valerian his father, directing forth his imperiall proclamation, the tenor whereof is recorded after this effect, as is to be seene in Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 13. Emperor and Cæsar, Publius Licinius, Galienus, Pius Fortunatus, Augustus, vnto Dionysius, to Pinna, and to Demetrian, and to all other the like bishops. > Anno 263 <

Ex Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 15.

By this it may appeare that some peace was grãted then vnder this Galienus to the church of Christ: albeit not so, but that some there were which suffered, of whom was one Marinus mentioned in Eusebius lib. 7. This Marinus being a warrior and a noble man in Cesarea, stood for the dignitie of a certaine order, which by alorder of course was next to fall vpon him by right, had not the enuious ambition of him that should follow next after him, supplanted him both of office and life: for he accused him to be a christian, and therefore did take that he was not to be admitted vnto their offices, which was against their religion. Whereupon Achæus then being iudge examined him of his faith, who finding him to be a christian in deede, and constantly to stand to his profession, gaue him three houres to deliberat and aduise with himself. There was the same time in Cesarea a bishop named Theotechnus, otherwise called Theotecnus bishop of Cesarea.

Theotechnus bishop of Cesarea.

Who perceiuing him to stand in doubtfull deliberation and perplexitie in himselfe, tooke him by the hand and brought him into the house or church of the christians, laying before him a sword (which he had vnder his cloke for the same purpose) and a booke of the new testament, and so willed him to take his free choice which of them both he would prefer. The souldier immediatlie without delay ran to the booke of the gospell, taking that before the sword. And thus he being animated by the bishop, presented himselfe boldlie before the iudge, by whose sentence he was beheaded, and died a martyr. Eusebius ibidem.

Warning and matter by the bishop to die.

Eusseb. ibid.

Whose bodie being dead, one Aspasius a noble senator of Rome, and a man very wealthie among the chiefe of that order (who in the same time was there present at his martyrdome) tooke vp and bare vpon his owne shoulders, wrapping it in a rich and sumptuous weed, and so honorable committed it to the buriall. Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 16.

Eusseb. lib. 7. cap. 16.

Of which Aspasius the said author writeth moreouer this storie: how that in the foresaid citie of Cesarea, the Gentils vsed there of an ancient custome to offer vp a certaine sacrifice by a fountaine side, the which sacrifice by the working of the diuell was wont suddenly to vanquish out of their eies, to the great admiration of the inhabiters by. Aspasius seeing this, and pitying the miserable error of the simple people, lifting vp his eies to heauen, made his prayer to almightie God in the name of Christ, that the people might not be seduced of the diuell any longer: by the vertue of whose prayer the sacrifice was seene to swim in the water of the fountaine, and to the strange wonder of that sight was taken away, and no such matter could be there wrought any more. And

And because mention is made here of Cesarea, there followeth in the next chapter of the same author a strange miracle if it be true, which he there reporteth; how that out of the same citie was the woman which in the gospell came to our saviour, and was healed of her bloudie issue, her house being in the citie of Cesarea. Before the doze thereof was set up a certaine pillar of stone, and upon the pillar an image was made of brasse, of a woman kneeling, kneeling on her knees, and holding up her hands as one that had some suite. Against the which there was another image also of a man proportioned of the same mettall, cunningly engraven in a short semelie vesture, and stretching forth his hand to the woman. At the foote of which pillar greew up a certaine herbe of a strange kind, but of a more strange operation, which growing up to the hem of his vesture, and once touching the same, is said to have such vertue, that it was able to cure all maner of diseases. This picture of the man they saw (reported) to have framed the image of Christ. The historie is written in Eusebius, as is said, the credit whereof I referre to the reader, whether he will thinke it true or false. If he thinke it false, yet I haue shewed him mine author: if he thinke it true, then must he thinke withall that this miraculous operation of the herbe proceeded neither by the vertue of the picture, nor by the prayer of the other, being both dumbe pictures, and ingrauen no doubt at that time by the hand of infidels, but to be wrought by some secret permission of God his wisedome, either to reduce the infidels at that time to the beleefe of the stone, or to admonish the christians to consider with themselues what strength, health was to be looked for only of Christ and no other aduocat, seeing the dumbe picture ingrauen in brasse, gaue his efficacy to a poore herbe to cure so many diseases. This picture (saith Eusebius) remained also to his time which was vnder Constantinus the great.

A miracle noted in Euse. lib. 7. cap. 18.

A miraculous gift which an herbe touching the hem of Christs vesture is said to haue had.

As touching the late and order of the Romane bishops hitherto intermitted, after the martyrdome of Xistus above prefixed, the gouernment of that church was committed next vnto one Dionysius, about the yeere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and fiue, who continued in the same the space of nine yeeres, as Eusebius saith; as Damasius recordeth but onlie fiue yeeres and two monethes. Of his decretall epistles because sufficient hath been said before concerning that matter, I omit to speake. After whom succeeded Felix in the first yeere of Probus the emperor, about the yeere of our Lord two hundred and eightie, who governed that church fiue yeeres, and died as Platina saith a martyr. After him followed Eutychianus, and then Caius, both martyrs, as the histories of some doe record.

Eutychianus bishop of Rome and martyr.

Caius bishop of Rome and martyr.

About the time of these bishops lived Theodorus bishop of Neocesarea, who is otherwise called Gregorius Magnus, whom also Nicephorus for his miracles calleth Θαυματοργὸν.

Claudius emperor. Anno 270.

Thus Galienus the foresaid emperor raigned as is declared, with his father Valerian seuen yeeres, after whose captiuitie he ruled the monarchie alone about nine yeeres, with some peace and quietnesse granted to the church.

The dates of this Galienus being expired, followed Claudius a quiet emperor, as most stories doe record. Although Nicentius affirmeth that he was a monster of persecution against the christians, and maketh mention of two hundred fortie and two martyrs, which in his time did suffer; but because no such record remaineth to be found in Eusebius, who would not haue omitted some memorial thereof if it had been true, therefore I refer the same to the free iudgement of the reader to find such credit as it may. This Claudius raigned but two yeeres, after whom came Quintilianus, his brother next emperor, and a quiet prince, who continued but only seuentéene dates, and had to his successor Aurelianus, vnder whom Dositus in his seuenth booke doth number the ninth persecution against the christians.

Quintilianus emperour.

The ninth persecution.

The ninth persecution raised vnder Aurelianus emperour.

HItherto from the captiuitie of Valerian the church of Christ was in some quietnesse till the death of Quintilianus, as hath been declared: after whom Aurelianus the next successor possessed the crowne, who in the first beginning of his raigne (after the common maner of all princes) shewed himselfe a prince inclined and diuerse, much worthie of commendation, if his good beginning had continued in a constant course agreeing to the same. Of nature hee was seuere and rigorous in conuersing, dissolute in maners, in so much that it was said of him in a vulgar prouerbe, that he was a good physician, sauing that he gaue to bitter medicines. This emperor being sicke, neuer sent for physician, but cured himselfe with abstinence, and as his beginning was not vnfruitfull to the commonwealth, so neither was he any great disturber of the christians, when he did not only tolerat in their religion, but also in their councell, & brung the same time assembled at Antioch, seemed not to be a gratuit them. Notwithstanding in continuance of time through sinister information and instigation of certaine about him (as commonlie such are neuer absent in all places from the cares of princes) his nature somewhat inclinable to seueritie, was altered to a plaine tyrannie, which tyrannie first he shewed beginning with the death of his owne sisters sonne, as witnesseth Eutropius. After that he proceeded either to mooue, or at least to purpose persecution against the christians; albeit that wicked purpole of the emperor, the mercifull working of God his hand did soone ouerthrow. For as the edit or proclamation should haue been denounced for the persecuting of the christians, and the emperor now readie to subscribe the edict with his hand, the mightie stroke of the hand of the Lord suddenly from aboue did stop his purpose, binding (as a man might say) the emperors hands behind him, declaring (as Eusebius saith) to all men, how there is no power to worke any violence against the seruants of God, vnlesse his permission do suffer them, and giue them leaue. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 30. Eutropius and Iornandes affirme, that as the said Aurelianus was purposing to raise persecution against vs, he was suddenly terrified with lightning, and so stopped from his wicked tyrannie. Not long after about the fift or sixt yeere of his raigne, he was slaine betweene Isdiance and Byzacales, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred seuentie and eight. Thus Aurelianus rather intended then moued persecution. Neither is there any more then this found concerning this persecution in ancient histories and records of the church: therefore I marueil the more that Vincentius collecting out of the martyrologies, hath comprehended such a great catalogue of so many martyrs, which in France and in Italy (saith he) suffered death and torments vnder this emperor Aurelianus, whereunto Dositus also seemeth to agree in numbring this to be the ninth persecution vnder the said Aurelian.

Ex Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 30.

No power against the people of God, except God giue leaue.

The death of Aurelianus. Anno 276

Next after Aurelianus the succession of the emperie fell to Publius Annius Tacitus, who raigned but fiue monethes. him succeeded his brother Florianus, who raigned but three score daies, and after him followed Marcus Aurelius, surnamed Probus. Of whom more hereafter (God willing) shall appeare.

Ex Eutropio: Tacitus emperour. Florianus emperour.

In the meane time within the compasse of these emperors raigne in a storie recorded of Eusebius, not vnworthie here to be noted, whereby to vnderstand the faithfull diligence of good writers, what good it may doe in a commonwealth.

Mention is made before of Eusebius the deacon of Dionysius, whom God stirred vp to visit and comfort the saints that were in prison and bands, & to burie the bodies of the blessed martyrs departed, not without great perill of his owne life, and after was made bishop (as is said) of Laodicea. But before he came to Laodicea to be bishop there, it chanced the said Eusebius remaining as yet at Alexandria, the citie to be besieged of the Romans, Pyrrhus being there captaine. In which siege halfe of the citie did hold with the Romans, the other halfe withstood them. In that part which went with the Roman captaine was Eusebius, being also in great fauor with the captaine for his worthie fidelitie and seruice shewed: with the other halfe that resisted the Romans, was Anatholius governor or moderator then of the schole of Alexandria, who also was bishop after the said Eusebius, of Laodicea. This Anatholius perceiuing the citizens to be in miserable distresse of famine and destruction, by reason of penurie and lacke of sustenance, sendeth to Eusebius being then with the Romans, & certifieth him of the lamentable penurie and perill of the citie, intreating him to procure that for hope in the matter. Eusebius vnderstanding the case, repaireth to the captaine, desiring of him so much fauour, that so many as would issue out of the city from their enemies, might be licenced to escape and freelie to passe; which was to him easilie granted. As Eusebius was thus labouring with the captaine, on the other side Anatholius for his part laboured with the citizens, mouing them to assemble together, and persuading them to giue themselues ouer, in yeelding to the force and might of the Romans. But when the citizens could not abide the hearing thereof: Yet (said Anatholius) this I trust you will be contented, if I shall counsel you in this miserable lacke of things to auoid out of your citie all such superfluities and vnnecessarie impediments vnto you, as old women, young children, aged men, with such other as be feeble and impotent, and not to suffer them here to perish with famine, whose presence can do no good to you if they die, and lesse if they liue, for spending the victuals which otherwise might serue them that be more able to defend the citie. The feruat hearing this sentence, and vnderstanding moreouer the grant of the captaine, promising them their safetie, were well consenting thereunto. Then Anatholius hauing a speciall care to them that belonged to the church of Christ, calleth them together with the rest of the multitude, and perswading them what they should do, and what had been obtained for them, caused them to hold the citie, and not onlie them, but also a great number of other mo, who perswaded by him vnder that pretense, changing themselues in womens apparell, or feining some impotencie, so escaped out of the citie. At whose comming out, Eusebius on the other side was readie to receiue them, and refreshed their hungrie and pined bodies, whereby not only they, but the whole citie of Alexandria was preserued from destruction. By this little hill ozie of Eusebius and Anatholius, described in the seuenth booke of Eusebius, cap. 32. and briefly here set forth to thee (gentle reader) thou maiest partly vnderstand the practise of the prelats, what it was in those daies in the church, which was then only employed in sauing of life, and labozing the common weales wherein they liued, as by these two godlie godly persons Eusebius and Anatholius may well appeare. Vnto the which practise if we compare the practise of our latter prelats of the church of Rome, I suppose no little difference will appeare.

Marcus Aurelius Probus emperor. Peace in the church.

The next emperour to Florianus (as is said) was Marcus Aurelius Probus, a prince both wise and vertuous, and no lesse valiant in martiall affaires, as fortunat in the successe of the same. During his time we read of no persecution greatly stirring in the church, but much quietnesse, as well in matters of religion, as also in the commonwealth. In so much that after his great and many victories, such peace insued, that his saying was, there needed no more souldiers, seeing there were no more enemies to the commonwealth to fight against. It was his saying also, that his souldiers need not to spend coyne and victuall, except they laboured to serue the commonwealth. And for the same cause he caused his souldiers to be set a worke about certain mountaines in Sirmyria and in Bessia to be planted with vines, and not so much as in winter suffered them to be at rest, therefore by them at length he was slaine, after he had raigned the space of fiue yeeres and foure monethes, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred eightie and foure: Eutrop.

Marcus Aurelius slaine. Anno 284

Carus with his two sonnes Carinus and Numerianus succeeded next after Probus in the empire, the raigne of which emperors continued in all but three yeeres. Of the which three first Carus, warring against the Persians, was slaine with lightning. Of Numerianus his sonne, being with his father in his warres against the Persians, we find much commendation in Eutropius, Vopiscus, and other writers, which testified of him to be a valiant warriour, an eloquent orator, as appeared by his declamations and writings sent to the senat; thirdlie, to be an excellent poet. This Numerianus sozowing and lamenting for the death of his father, through immoderat weeping fell into a great sozenesse of his eies, by reason where of he weping close, was slaine not long after of his father in law, named Aper, who straight vpon his slaying to the empire, dissembled his death with a faire excuse to the people, alleging for him, saying, for the pause of his eies he kept him from the wind and weather, till at length by the stinch of his bodie being carried about, his death was vttered.

Eutropius: Lactius emperour. Florianus emperour.

Correction of a certaine place of Eutropius, ex editione Probeniana.

In the life of this emperour Carus aforesaid, written by Eutropius in the latter edition set forth by Frobenius, I find (which in other editions of Eutropius doth not appeare) that Numerianus the sonne of this Carus, was he that slue Babylas the holy martyr, whose historie before we haue comprehended. But that seemeth not to be like, both by the narration of Chrysostom, and also for that Vrbegenius declaring the same historie, and in the same words, as it is in Eutropius, saith that it was Cyzillus whom Numerianus killed, the sozie wherof is this: That time Carus the emperour in his iourne going toward the Persians, remained at Antioch, Numerianus his son would enter into the church of the christians, to view and behold their mysteries. But Cyzillus their bishop would in no wise suffer him to enter into the church, saying that it was not lawfull for him to see the mysteries of God, who was polluted with sacrifices of idols. Numerianus full of indignation at the hearing of these words, not suffering that repulse at the hands of Cyzillus, in his furie did slay the godly martyr. And therefore iustly (as it seemed) was he himselfe slaine afterward by the hands of Aper.

Ex Chroni. Vrspergen.

Thus Carus with his sonne Numerianus being slaine in the east parts, as is declared, Carinus the other sonne raigned alone in Italie, where he ouercame Sabinus striuing for the empire, and raigned there with much wickednesse, till the returning home of the armie against to the Persians, who then set vp Diocletian to be emperor, by whom the foresaid Carinus for the wickednesse of his life, being forsaken of his bank, was ouercome, and at length slaine with the hand of the tribune, whose wife before he had defloured. Thus Carus with his two sonnes, Numerianus and Carinus, ended their liues, whose raigne continued not aboue three yeeres.

Carinus emperour slaine. Adulterie punished.

The wrath of God toward his people.

All this meane space we read of no great persecution stirring in the church of Christ, but was in meane quiet state and tranquillitie, vnto the nintenth yeere of the raigne of Diocletian, so that in counting the time from the latter end of Valerian, vnto this aforesaid yeere of Diocletian, the peace of the church which God gaue to his people, seemeth to continue aboue foure and fortie yeeres. During the which time of peace and tranquillitie, the church of the Lord did mightily increase and flozish, so that the more bodies it lost by persecution, the more honor and reuerence it won daily among the Gentiles in all quarters, both Greeks and barbarous, in so much that (as Eusebius in his seuenth booke describeth) amongst the emperours themselues, diuers there were which not onely bare singular good will and fauor to them of our profession, but also did commit vnto them offices and regiments ouer countries and nations, so well were they affeared to our doctrine, that they panished the same with libertie and indemnitie. What needeth to speake of them which not onely lined vnder the emperors in libertie, but also were familiar in the court with the princes themselues, intertained with great honor and speciall fauour beyond the other seruitors of the court? As was Dorotheus with his wife, children, and whole familie, highly accepted and advanced in the palace of the emperour, also Gorgonius in like manner with diuers others more, who for their doctrine & learning which they professed, were with their princes in great estimation. In like reuerence also were the bishops of cities and dioceses, with the presidents and rulers where they liued: who not onely suffered them to liue in peace, but also had them in great price and regard, so long as they kept themselues vpright, and continued in God his fauor. Who is able to number at that time the mightie and innumerable multitudes and congregations assembling together in euery citie, and the notable concourses of such as daily flocked to the common oratories to pray? For the which cause they being not able to be contained in their old houses, had large and great churches new builded from the foundation for them to frequent together. In such increasement (saith Eusebius) by processe of time did the church of Christ grow and shoot by daily more and more, profiting and spreading through all quarters, which neither enuie of men could infringe, nor any diuell could inchant, neither the craftie policie of mans wit could supplant: so long as the protection of God his heauenly arme went with his people, keeping them in good order, according to the rule of christian life.

But as commonly the nature of all men, being of it selfe vnruile and vntoward, alwaies seeketh and desireth prosperitie, and yet can neuer well vse prosperitie, alwaies would haue peace, and yet hauing peace alwaies abuseth the same: so here likewise it happened with these men, which through this so great libertie and prosperitie of life began to degenerat and languish into idlenesse and delicacie, and one to worke spite and contumelie against another, striuing and contending amongst themselues for euery occasion, with railing words after most despitefull maner: bishops against bishops, and people against people, mooting hatred and sedition one against another, byelines also cursed hypocrisie and dissimulation with all extremitie increasing more and more. By reason whereof the iudgement of God after his wonted maner (whilest yet the congregation began to multiplie) began by a little and a little to visit our men with persecution, falling first vpon our brethren which were aboade in warfare, but when that toucht the other nothing or very little, neither did they seeke to appease Gods wrath, and call for his mercie, but wickedlie thinking with our selues, that God neither regarded nor would visit our transgressions, we heaped our iniquities daily more and more one vpon another, and they which seemed to be our pastors, refusing the rule of pietie, were inflamed with mutuall contentions one against another. And thus whilest they were giuen onely to the study of contentions, threatnings, emulations, mutuall hatred, and discord, euerie man seeking his owne ambition, and perseuting one another after the manner of tyrannie: then, then, I say, the Lord according to the voice of Jeremie tooke away the beautie of the daughter of Sion, and the glozie of Israel fell downe from heauen, neither did he remember the footstoole of his feet in the day of his wrath. And the Lord ouerturned all the comelie ornaments of Israel, and destroyed all her goodlie buildings, and according to the saying of the psalme, subuerted and extinguished the testament of his seruant, and prophaned his sanctuarie in destruction of his churches, and in laying waste the buildings thereof, so that all passengers spoiling the multitude of the people, they were made an obloquie to all the diuellers about. For he hath exalted the strength of his enemies, and turned away the helpe of his sword from her, nor aided her in the battell, but eraled from the purging of her and her seat. He strooke downe to the ground, and diminished her dates, and ouer all this powred vpon her confusion. All these things were fulfilled vpon vs, when we saw the temples raced from the top to the ground, and the sacred scriptures to be burnt in the open market place, and the pastors of the church to hide themselues some here, some there, some other taken prisoners with great shame, were mocked of their enemies, when also according to the saying of the prophet in another place: Contempt was powred out vpon the princes, and they caused to goe out of the way, and not to keepe the straight path.

The tenth persecution.

The tenth persecution.

BY reason whereof (the wrath of God being hinded against his church) insued the tenth and last persecution against the christians, so horrible and grieuous, that mateth the pen almost to tremble to write vpon it; so tedious that neuer was any persecution before or since comparable to it for the time it continued, lasting the space of ten yeeres together. This persecution although it passed through the hands of diuers tyrants & workers more then one or two, yet principally it beareth the name of Diocletian, who was emperor as is aboue noted, next after Carus and Numerianus. This Diocletian euer hauing an ambitious mind, aspired greatlie to be emperour. To whom Dyuas his concubine said, that first he should kill a wild bore before he should be emperor. He taking effect at these words, vsed much with hands to kill wild boares: but seeing no successe to come thereof, vsed this prouerbe: Ego apros occido, alius pulpamento fruitur, that is: I kill the boars, but others do eat the flesh. At length the said Diocletian being nominated to be emperor, and seeing Aper (who had killed Numerianus the emperour) perour, standing thereby ſware to the ſouldiers that Numerianus was wrongfully killed, and forthwith running vpon Aper with his ſword, ſlue him: Vopiſc. After this he being ſtabbed in the empire, and ſeeing on every ſide diuers and lamentable commotions riſing vp againſt him, which he was not well able hiuſelfe to ſuſtaine, in the firſt beginning of his reigne he thruſteth foorth his callegue Maximianus ſurnamed Herculius, father of Serpentius. Which two emperors, becauſe of diuers warres that roſe in many prouinces, choſe to them two other noble men, Galerius and Conſtantius, whom they called Ceſars. Of whom Galerius was ſent into the eaſt parts againſt the Perſians. Conſtantius was ſent ouer to Britaine to take the iuriſdiction of England to recouer the tribute, where he ſojourned to wife Helena the daughter of king Coill, which was a maiden excelling in beauty, and no leſſe famouſlie brought vp in the ſtudie of learning, of whom was borne Conſtantinus the great.

All this while hitherto no perſecution was yet ſtirred of theſe foure princes againſt the church of Chriſt, but quietly and moderately they gouerned the commonwealth; wherefore according to God proſpered their doings & affaires, & gaue them great victories. Dioclesian in Egypt, Maximian in Aphrike and in France, Galerius in Perſia, Conſtantius in Scotland and in France alſo. By reaſon of which victories, Dioclesian and Maximian puft vp in pride, ordained a ſolemne triumph at Rome, after which triumph Dioclesian gaue commandement that he would be worſhipped as God, ſaying, that he was brother to the ſunne and moone, and adorning his ſhoes with gold and pretious ſtones, commanded the people to kiſſe his feet.

And not long after by the iudgement of God, for certaine occaſions vſed in the church, aboue touched, began the great and grieuous perſecution of the chriſtians, mooued by the ragious crueltie of Dioclesian, which was about the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, who in the moneth of March, when the feaſt of Eaſter was nie at hand, commanded all the churches of the chriſtians to be ſpoiled and caſt to the earth, and the bookes of holy ſcripture to be burned.

Thus moſt violent edicts and proclamations were ſet foorth, for the ouerthrowing, as is ſaid, of the chriſtians temples throughout all the Romane empire. Neither did there want in the officers any cruell execution of the ſame proclamations. For their temples were defaced euen when they celebrated the feaſt of Eaſter: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 2. And this was the firſt edict giuen out by Dioclesian. The next proclamation that came forth, was for the burning of the bookes of the holy ſcripture; which thing was done in the open market place as before: then next vnto it were edicts giuen foorth for the diſplacing of ſuch as were magiſtrats, and that with great ignominie, and all other whatſoeuer bare any office; impriſoning ſuch as were of the common ſort, if they would not abiure chriſtiantie, and ſubſcribe to the heathen religion: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & 8. Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 4. Zonoras alſo in his ſecond tome. And theſe were the beginning of the chriſtians euils.

It was not long after but that new edicts were ſent foorth, nothing ſo to their cruelties inferiour to the firſt: for the caſting of the elders and biſhops into priſon, and then conſtraining them with ſundrie kinds of puniſhments, to offer vnto their idols. By reaſon whereof inſued a great perſecution amongſt the gouernours of the church, amongſt whom many ſtood manfully, paſſing through many exceeding bitter torments, neither were ouercome therewith, being tormented and examined diuers of them diuerſlie, ſome ſcourged all their bodies euen with whips and ſcourges, ſome with ſtacks, a paſſing of the ſtaffe intolerable were cruciated; ſome one way, ſome another way put to death. Some againe violently were drawne to the impure ſacrifice, and as though they had ſacrificed, when indeed they did not, were let goe. Other ſome neither conuming at all to their altars, nor touching any peece of their ſacrifices, yet were borne in hand of them that ſtood by, that they had ſacrificed, and ſo ſuffering that falſe infamation of their enemies, quietly went awaie. Other as dead men were caried and caſt alway, being but halfe dead. Some they caſt downe vpon the pauement, and trailing them a great ſpace by the heles, made the people beleeue that they had ſacrificed. Furthermore, other there were which ſtoutly withſtood them, affirming with a loud voice that they had done no ſuch ſacrifice. Of whom ſome laid they were chriſtians, and gloried in the profeſſion of that name; ſome cried ſaying, that neither they had, nor would euer be partakers of that idolatrie: and thoſe being buffeted on the face and mouth with the hands of the ſouldiers, were made to hold their peace, and ſo thruſt out with violence. And if the ſaints did ſeeme nor ſo little to doe what the enemies would haue them, they were made much of: albeit all this purpoſe of the aduerſarie did nothing preuaile againſt the holy and conſtant ſeruants of Chriſt. Notwithſtanding, of the weake ſort innumerable there were, which for feare and infirmitie fell and gaue ouer, euen at the firſt brunt.

Sinceritie required in the true ſeruice of God.

At the firſt comming downe of theſe edicts into Nicomedia, there chanced a deed to be done much worth of memorie, of a chriſtian, being a noble man borne, which r. moued by the zeale of God, after the proclamation made at Nicomedia was ſet vp, by and by rent and teare downe the ſame, and openly tare and rent it in peeces, not fearing the preſence of the two emperours, then being in the citie. For which act he was put to a moſt bitter death, which death he with great faith and conſtancie endured euen to the laſt gaſpe. Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & 5.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 5.

After this the furious rage of the malignant emperours, being let looſe againſt the ſaints of Chriſt, proceeded more and more, making hauocke of Gods people throughout all quarters of the world. Firſt Dioclesian (which had purpoſed with himſelfe to ſubuert the whole chriſtian religion, executed his tyrannie in the eaſt) and Maximianus in the weſt. But while Dioclesian began very ſubtillie, for he put the matter firſt in practiſe in his owne campe, among whom the marſhall of the field, as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 4. affirmeth, put the chriſtian ſouldiers to this choice, whether they would obay the emperors commandement in that maner of ſacrifice he commanded, and ſo both to keepe their offices, and lead their bands, or elſe to lay away from them their armor and weapons. Whereunto the chriſtian men corragiouſlie anſwered, that they were not one iote readie to lay away their armour and weapons, but alſo to ſuffer death if it ſhould with tyrannie be enforced vnto them, rather then they would obay the wicked decrees and commandements of the emperor.

There might a man haue ſeene very many which were deſirous to liue a ſimple and poore life, and which regarded no eſtimation and honour in compariſon of true pietie and godlineſs. And this was no more but a ſubtill and wilie flatterie in the beginning, to offer them to be at their owne libertie, whether they would willingly abiure their profeſſion or not; as alſo this was another, that in the beginning of the perſecution, there were but a few tormented with puniſhment, but afterward by little and little he began more manifeſtlie to braſt out into perſecution. It can hardly be expreſſed with words what number of martyrs, and what bloud was thed throogh all cities and regions for the name of Chriſt. Euſebius in his eight booke and ſeuenth chapter ſaith, that he himſelfe ſuruied the worthie martyrs that were in Paleſtina. But in Tyre & Phenicia he declareth in the ſame a marueilous martyrdome made, there certaine chriſtians being giuen to moſt cruell wilde beaſts, were preſerued without hurt of them, to their great admiration of the beholders; and thoſe lions, beares and beaſts, kept hungry for that purpoſe, had no deſire to deuoure them, which notwithſtanding moſt behementlie raged againſt thoſe by whom they were brought into the ſtage, ſtanding as they thought without danger of them, ſuch were firſt deuoured. But the chriſtian martyrs becauſe they could not bee hurt of the beaſts, being ſlaine with the ſword, were afterward throwne into the ſea. At that time was martyred the biſhop of Sidon. But Syluanus the biſhop of Gazenſis with nine and thirtie others were ſlaine in the mettall mines of Phenicia. Pamphilus the elder of Ceſarea, being the glorie of that congregation, died a moſt worthie martyr, whoſe both life and moſt commendable martyrdome Euſebius oftentimes declareth in his eight booke and thirteenth chapter, in ſo much that he hath written the ſame in a booke by it ſelfe. In Scythia all the chiefe teachers of the congregation were firſt committed to priſon, as a moſt beaſtie and cruell ſpectacle to behold, as alſo the biſhops, elders, and deacons, which all were eſteemed as menquillers, and perpetrators of moſt wicked facts: Euſebius lib. 8. cap. 6. After that line peade of another, whoſe name was Tyrannion, which was made meate for the fiſhes of the ſea, and of Zenobius which was a very good phyſician, which alſo was ſlaine with hickbats in the ſame place: Euſebius lib. 8. cap. 13.

Furthermore he maketh mention in the ſame place of others which were not tormented to death, but euery day terrified and feared without ceaſing: of ſome others that were brought to the ſacrifices and commanded to doe ſacrifice, which would rather thruſt their right hand into the fire, then to touch the prophane or wicked ſacrifice; alſo of ſome others that before they were apprehended, would caſt downe themſelues from ſteepe places, leſt that being taken they ſhould commit any thing againſt their profeſſion. Alſo of two virgins very faire and proper, with their mother alſo which had ſtudiouſly brought them vp, euen from their infancie in all godlineſſe, being long ſought for, and at the laſt found, and ſtrictlie kept by their keepers, whileſt they made their excuſe to do that which nature required, they in themſelues doune headlong into a riuer: alſo of other two young maidens being ſiſters, and of worthipfull ſtocke, indued with many goodly vertues, which were caſt of the perſecutors into the ſea: and theſe things were done at Antioch, as Euſebius in his eight book and thirteenth chapter affirmeth. But Syluanus the biſhop of Emiſſa the notable martyr together with certaine others, were throwne to the wild beaſts: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 12.

paſſing and sharper torments, whereof I will hereafter make mention: Euſebius ibid. So outragious was the beginning of the perſecution which the emperor made in Nicomedia in Bythinia, as before is ſaid, that he refrained not from the ſlaughter of the children of emperors, neither yet from ſlaughter of the moſt chiefe princes of his court, who a little before he made as much of as if they had been his owne children. Such another was Peter, which among diuers and ſundrie torments (among whom he being naked was lifted vp, his whole bodie being beaten with whips and torne, that a man might ſee the bare bones, and after they had mingled vinegar and ſalt together, they powred it vpon the moſt tender parts of his bodie, & laſtly rolled at a ſoft fire, as a man would roſt fleſh to eate) as a victorious martyr ended his life. Dorotheus and Gorgonius being in great authoritie and office vnder the emperour, after diuers torments were ſtrangled with a halter, which both being of the priuie chamber to him, when they ſaw and beheld the grieuous puniſhment of Peter their houſhold companion: Wherefore (ſaid they) O emperor, do you puniſh in Peter that opinion which is in vs? Why is that accounted in him an offence, that all we confeſſe? We are of that faith, religion, and iudgement that he is of. Therefore he commanded them to be brought forth, and almoſt with like paines to be tormented as Peter was, and after wards hanged: Euſeb. Ruſin. lib. 8. cap. 6. After whom Anthimus the biſhop of Nicomedia, after he had made a notable confeſſion, and bringing with him a great company of martyrs, was beheaded. Theſe men being thus diſpatched, the emperour barely thought that he might cauſe the reſt to doe that euer him liſted. To this end came Lucianus the elder of the congregation of Antioch, and was martyred, after he had made his apologie before the emperor: Euſebius lib. 8. cap. 13.

Hermanus alſo, that monſter, cauſed Serena the wife of Dioclesian the emperor, to be martyred for the chriſtian religion: ſo much did the rage of perſecution bitterly forget all natural affects. Other martyrs of Nicomedia doth Nicephorus in his ſeuenth booke & fourteenth chapter recite, as Eulampius and Eulampia, Agape, Irene, Chionia, & Anaſtaſia, vnder Iſyricus chiefe officer, were bound hand & foote to a poſt & burnt: Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 66. And alſo Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. mentioneth ſuch another like matter full of horror & griefe. There aſſembled together in their temple many chriſtian men to celebrate the memorie of the natiuitie of Chriſt, of euery age and ſort ſome. There Sapinianus thinking to haue them giuen a very fit occaſion to execute his tyrannie vpon the poor chriſtians, ſent thither ſuch as ſhould ſhut the temple. He poſted being ſtuft & cloſed in on about; thither come they with fire, but firſt they commanded the crier with a lond voice to crie, that whoſoeuer would haue life, ſhuld come out of the temple, and doe ſacrifice vpon the next altar they came to of Jupiter; & vnleſſe they would doe this, they ſhould all be burnt with the temple. Then one ſtepping vp in the temple, anſwered in the name of all the reſt with great courage & boldnes of mind, that they were all chriſtians, & beleeued that Chriſt was their only God and king, & that they would doe ſacrifice to him, with his Father & holy ghoſt, & that they were now all ready to offer vnto him. With theſe words the fire was kindled & compaſſed about the temple, & there were burnt of men, women, and children certaine thouſands. There were alſo in Arabia very many martyrs ſlaine with axes, as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 12. There was in Phygia a city, vnto which the emperor ſent his edicts that they ſhould doe ſacrifice to the gods, and worſhip idols; all which citizens, the maior himſelfe, the queſtor and chiefe captaine confeſſed that they were all chriſtians. The citie vpon this was beſieged and ſet on fire, and all the people: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 11. In Melitina a region of Armenia, the biſhops and elders were caſt in priſon: Euſeb. eodem cap. 6. In Arabiace a region more adioining to Armenia Cuſtratius was martyred, as Nicephorus declareth, lib. 7. cap. 14. This Cuſtratius was that countele man borne, and very ſkilfull in the Greeke tongue, executing by the emperors commandement the thriffes office at Licia in the eaſt, which alſo vpo execution there vpon the chriſtians, and was a ſcribe of great eſtimation, called Ordinis ducalis. This man beholding the marueilous conſtancie of the martyrs, thirſted with the deſire of martyrdome, for that he had priuily learned the chriſtian religion. Therefore he not abiding for other accuſers, detected himſelfe, & voluntarilie profeſſed that he was a chriſtian, openly execrating the madnes and damnitie of the wicked etymiis. Ye therefore being carried away, was tied vp, being firſt moſt bitterly beaten. After that hee was parched with fire being put vnto his bowels, & then baſted with ſalt & vinegar, and laſtlie ſo ſcorched and benangled with the ſhards of charpe and cutting ſhels, that his whole bodie ſeemed to be all one continuall wound; howbeit, by Gods great goodnes afterward, it was reſtored to the firſt integritie. After this he was cauſed away to Sebaſtia, where with his cõpanion Dyoſcres he was burnt. At that time alſo ſuffered Eugenius, Aurentius, Nardarius: Nicephor. lib. 7. cap. 14. And in no leſſe wiſe raged this perſecution throughout all Egypt, where Euſebius in his eight booke & thirteenth chapter maketh mention of Peleus & Nilus martyrs & biſhops in Egypt. But at Alexandria eſpecially were declared moſt notable conflicts of chriſtian and true conſtant martyrs that ſuffered: which Philo as the biſhop of Thmuitan deſcribeth, as after God willing) ſhall be declared. In this perſecution of Alexandria, the principall that then ſuffred was Peter the biſhop of Alexandria with the elders of the ſame, moſt worthie martyrs, as Faultus, Dionis, Ammonius, alſo Phileas, Heſichius, Pathuminus, and Theodorus, which all were biſhops of the congregations within Egypt, & beſides them many other both famous & ſingular men. The whole legio of chriſtia ſouldiers, which lay at Thebes in Egypt, vnder the chriſtian captaine Mauritius, when they would not obay the emperors commandement touching the worſhipping of images, were tithed to death once, & then againe and at laſt through the exhortatiõ of Mauritius, died altogether like conſtant martyrs: Vincentius in ſpeculo, lib. 13. cap. 2. Likewiſe at Antino diuers chriſtian ſouldiers, notwithſtãding they were ſeriouſlie diſſuaded, ſuffered death together, among whom were Aſela, Philemon, & Apollonius, ibidẽ. cap. 50. And alſo in the other parts of Africa & Mauritania, was great perſecution, as Euſeb. li. 8. ca. 6. Alſo in Samnium, of which place Thonicon maketh mention, and Sicilia, where were 79. martyrs ſlaine for the profeſſion of Chriſt: Henr. de Erfordia.

Now let vs come into Europe. Nicephorus in his ſeuenth book and fourteenth chapter ſaith, that at Nicopolis in Thracia the martyrs were in moſt miſerable and pitifull caſe handled, where Lilias had the execution thereof. In Chalcedon ſuffered Euphemia vnder Pulcus the proconſull: Vincent. li. 12. ca. 77.

Henricus de Erfordia ſaith that at Rome, Johannes & Criſpus being prieſts, had the execution of martyrs. And at Boemia, Agricola, & Vitalis: Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 49. And at Aquileia the emperor commanded euery man to kill the chriſtians: Vincent. lib. eod. ca. 58. And among thoſe martyrs he maketh mention of Felices & Fortunatus. Reginus alſo writeth that in other places of Italie the perſecution became great, as at Florentia, Pergamus, Naples, Campania, Beneuentus, at Venuſa in Apulia, and in Thuſcia: Henricus de Erfordia ſaith alſo at Verona. In France doubtleſſe Rectonarus appointed to that office plaied the cruell bellhound, of whole great crueltie againſt the chriſtians many hiſtories are full. At Pedoladus ſuffered Victor. And at Maſſilia, Sparinianus ſet foorth by his decre, that either they ſhould all do ſacrifice vnto the gods of the gentils, or elſe be all ſlaine with diuers kinds of torments. Therfore many martyrs there died for the glorie of Chriſt: Antoninus & Vincent. lib. 12. ca. 2. In Belgacus ſuffered Lucian.

Tiuentius and Reginus with of many places in Spaine where was great perſecution, as at Emerita, where ſuffered Eulalia of whom more followeth hereafter, & Adula, where alſo ſuffered Vincentius, Sabina, & Chriſtina. At Toletum ſuffered Leucadia & virgin, at Ceſarea Auguſta, where were put to death eightẽne, beſide a great number of other martyrs, which ſuffered vnder Decianus the gouernor, which afflicted with perſecution all the coaſt of Spaine, as ſaith Vincent. li. 12. ca. 123. 124. 128. 130. 134. The foreſaid Rectonarus made ſuch perſecution at Treuers nere the riuer of Moſella, that the bloud of the chriſtia men that there ſlaine ran like ſmall brooks, and coloured great and maine riuers. Neither yet did this ſuffice him, but from thence ſent certain horſemen with his letters, commanding them to ride into euery place, and charge all ſuch as had taken and apprehended any chriſtians, that they ſhould immediatlie put them to death: Vincent. lib. 13. cap. 136.

Beda alſo ſaith, that this perſecution reached euen vnto the Britains, in his booke De tatione temporum. And the chronicle of Martinus, and the Poleſcay of time do declare that all the chriſtians in Britannie were vtterly deſtroyed: furthermore, that the kindes of death & puniſhment were ſo great and horrible, as no mans tongue is able to expreſſe. In the beginning, when the emperor by his ſubtilte and wilinelle rather baited then ſhewed his rigor, he threatned them with bands and impriſonment: but within a while, when he began to worke the matter in good earneſt, hee deuiſed innumerable ſorts of tormentes and puniſhments, as whippings and ſcourgings, racking, horrible ſcrapings, ſword, fire, and chybbotes, wherin a great number being put were ſunke and drowned in the bottom of the ſea: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. & 7. Alſo hanging them vpon croſſes, binding them to the bodies of dead trees with their heads downeward, hanging them by the middles vpon gallowſes, till they died for hunger, throwing them aliue to ſuch kind of wild beaſts as would deuour them, as lions, beares, libards, & wild buls: Euſeb. li. 8. cap. 8. pricking and thruſting them in with bodkins and talons of beaſts till they were almoſt dead, lifting them vp on high with their heads downward, euen as in Thebaide they did vnto the women being naked and vnclothed, one of their feet tied and lifted on high, and ſo hanging downe with their bodies, which thing to ſe was very pitifull, with other deuiſed ſorts of puniſhments moſt tragicall, or rather tyrannicall, and pitifull to deſcribe: as firſt, the binding of them to trees, and to the boughes thereof; the pulling and tearing aſunder of their members and ioints, bring tied to the boughes and armes of trees: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 9. the mangling of them with axes, the choking of them with ſmoke by ſmall and ſoft fires, dismembred of their handes, eares, and feet, with other tormets, as the holy martyrs of Alexandria suffered the scorching & broyling of them with coles, not vnto death, but euery day renewed. With such kind of torments the martyrs at Antioch were afflicted. But in Pontus other horrible punishments and fearefull to be heard, did the martyrs of Christ suffer, of which, some had their fingers ends vnder the nailes thrust in with sharpe bodkins, some all to besprinkled with boiling lead, hauing their most necessarie members cut from them, some other filthy most filthie, intollerable, and indurable torments and paines in their bowels and priuie members: Eusebius eodem cap. 12.

The persecution in Antioch.

The persecution in Alexandria.

To conclude, how great the outrage of the persecution which raigned in Alexandria was, and with how many and sundrie kinds of new deuised punishments the martyrs were afflicted: Phileas, the bishop of the Thmuitans, a man singularly well learned, hath described in his epistle to the Thmuitans, the copie whereof Eusebius hath in his eight booke and tenth chapter, out of the which we meane here briefly to recite somewhat. Because (saith he) euery man might torment the holy martyrs as they listed themselues, some beat them with cudgels, some with rods, some with whips, some with thongs, and some with cords, and this example of beating was in sundrie wise executed, and with much crueltie. For some of them hauing their hands bound behind their backes, were lifted vp vpon timber logs, and with certaine instruments their members and ioynts were stretched foorth, whereon their whole bodies hanging, were subiect to the will of the tormentors, who were commanded to afflict them with all manner of torments, and not on their sides only, (like as homicides were) but vpon their bellies, thighs, and legs, they scratched them with the talens and clawes of wild beasts. Some others were seene to hang by one hand vpon the engine, whereby they might feele the more grieuous pulling out of the rest of their ioynts and members. Some others were in such sort bound vnto pillars with their faces turned to the wall, hauing no stay vnder their feete, and were violently weighed downe with the peise of their bodies, that by reason of their strict binding, they being drawne out, might be more grieuously tormented. And this suffered they not onely during the time of their examination, and while the shiriffe had to doe with them, but also the whole day long. And whilest the iudge went thus from one to another, he by his authoritie appointed certaine officers to attend vpon those hee left, and not to be let downe, vntill either through the intollerablenesse of the paine, or by the extremitie of cold, they being neere the point of death, should be let downe: & so were they haled vpon the ground. And further they were commanded that they should shew not so much as one sparke of mercie or compassion vpon vs, but so extreamely and furiously die deale with vs, as though our soules and bodies should haue died together. And therfore yet another torment our aduersaries deuised, to augment our former plagues. After that they had most lamentably beaten them, they deuised moreouer a new kind of racke, wherein they lying vpright, were stretched by both the feete aboue the fourth stop or hole with sharpe shels or shares strowed vnder them, after a strange kind of engine to vs here vnknowne. Othersome were cast downe vpon the pauement where they were oppressed so thicke, and so grieuously with torments, that it is not almost to be thought what afflictions they suffered.

Strange kinds of torments.

Thus they lying in paines and torments, some died therewith, not a little shaming and confounding their enemies by their singular patience. Some halfe dead and halfe alue were thrust into prison, where shortly after by paines and wounds of their bodies they ended their bitter life. Some againe being cured of their wounds by their indurance in prison, were more confirmed, who being put to the choice whether they would come to their cursed sacrifice and inioy their wicked liberty, or else sustaine the sentence of death, did willingly and without delay abide the extremitie, remembring with themselues what is written in the scriptures, He that sacrificeth (saith he) to strange gods, shall be exterminat, &c. Item, Thou shalt not haue any strange gods beside me, &c. Thus much wrot Phileas to the congregation where hee was bishop, before hee receiued the sentence of death, being yet in bands, and in the same exhorteth his brethren constantly to perstil after his death, in the truth of Christ professed. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10. & Sabellicus, li. 7. cap. 9.

Sabellicus in his seuenth Ennead. and eight booke, saith that that chistened man, which tore and pulled downe the wicked edict of the emperor in Nicomedia, being stript and beaten that the bones appeared, and after washed in salt and vinegar, was then slaine with this cruell kind of torment. But Platina writeth that Dorotheus and Gorgonius exhorted him to die so constantly.

An holy martyr of Nicomedia tormented.

But as all their torments were so their horribleness, marueilous and notable, and there withall so studiously deuised, and no lesse grieuous and sharpe: so notwithstanding, therewith were these martyrs neither dismaid, nor ouercome, but rather thereby confirmed and strengthened, so merilie and ioyfullie sustained they whatsoeuer was put vnto them. Eusebius saith, that he himselfe beheld and saw the huge & great persecution that was done in Thebaide, in so much that the very swords of the hangmen and persecutors being blunt with the great and often slaughter, they themselues for wearinesse sat downe to rest them, and others were faine to take their places. And yet all this notwithstanding the murthered christians shewed their marueilous readinesse, willingnes, and diuine fortitude, which they were indued with, with stout courage, ioy, and smiling receiuing the sentence of death pronounced vpon them, & sung euen vnto the last gaspe hymnes and psalmes to God. So did also the martyrs of Alexandria, as witnesseth Phileas aboue mentioned. The holy martyrs (saith he) keeping Christ in their minds, being led with the loue of better rewards, sustained not only at one time whatsoeuer labour and deuised punishments they had to lay vpon them: but now also the second time haue done the same, and haue bene all the menaces of the cruell souldiers, not onely in words wherewith they threatned them, but also whatsoeuer in deed and worke they could deuise to their destruction, and that with most manly stomachs, excluding all feare, with the perfection of their vnspeakeable loue towards Christ, whose great strength and fortitude cannot by words be expressed. And Sulpitius saith in the second booke of his sacred historie, that then the christians with more greedie desire preached and sought for martyrdome, then now they doe desire bishoprikes.

The hangmen waxed blunt, and the hangmen waxed weary with slaughter.

The marueilous constancie of the martyrs of God in persecution and at the time of death.

Martyrdome more desired in the old time then bishoprikes be now.

Although some there were also, as I haue said, that with feare and threatnings, and by their owne infirmities were ouercome and went backe: Eusebius lib. 8. ca. 4. among whom Socrates nameth Pilerius, lib. 1. cap. 6. and Athanasius in his second apologie nameth the bishop of Licus, a citie in little Egypt, whom Peter the bishop of Alexandria excommunicated, for that in this persecution he sacrificed vnto the gentiles gods. Of the fall of Marcellinus the bishop of Rome, I will speake afterwards; for he being persuaded by others, and specially of the emperour Diocletian himselfe, did sacrifice, whereupon he was excommunicated; but afterwards he repenting the same, was againe received into the congregation, & made martyr, as Platina, and the compiler of the booke of the generall councels affirme. The number of the martyrs increased daily, sometimes ten, sometimes twentie were slaine at once, sometimes thirtie, and often times three score, and otherwhiles a hundred in one day, men, women, and children, by diuers kinds of death: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 9. Also Damasus, Beda, Orosius, Honorius, and others do witnes, that there were slaine in this persecution by the names of martyrs, within the space of thirtie daies, seuenteene thousand persons, besides another great number and multitude that were condemned to the metall mines and quaries with like cruelties.

At Alexandria with Peter the bishop, of whom I haue made mention before, were slaine with axes three hundred and aboue as Sabellicus declareth. Orosius was beheaded at Colonia Agrippina, with three hundred of his fellowes, as saith Henricus de Erfordia. Maurilius the captaine of christian religion, with his fellowes six thousand six hundred sixtie and six. Victor in the citie of Troy now called Xanthus, with his fellowes three hundred and threescore were slaine, as saith Otto Phrisingensis, lib. 2. cap. 45. Regino reciteth the names of many other martyrs, to the number of one hundred and twentie.

Maurilius with 6666. martyrs.

Victor with 360 martyrs slaine.

And for so much as mention here hath been made of Maurilius and Victor, the particular description of the same historie I thought here to insert, taken out of Ado and other storie writers, as insueth.

Maurilius came out of Syria into France and Italie, being captaine of the band of the Theban soldiers, to the number of six thousand six hundred & three score, being sent for of Maximianus, to goe against the rebellious Bangandes: but rather as it should seeme by the treason of the tyrant, which thought he might better in these quarters vse his tyrannie vpon the christians then in the east part. These Thebans with Maurilius the captaine, after that they had entred into Rome, who were there of Marcellus the blessed bishop confirmed in the faith, promising by oth, that they would rather be slaine of their enemies, then forsake that faith which they had receiued, who followed the emperors host through the Alpes euen into France. At that time the Cesarians were incamped not farre from the towne called Octodor, where Maximianus offred sacrifice to his diuels, and called al the souldiers both of the east and west to the same, strictly charging them by the altars of his gods, that they would fight against those rebels the Bangandes, and persecute the christian enemies of the emperors gods: which his commandement was shewed to the Thebans host, which were also encamped about the riuer of Rode, and in a place that was named Agaunse; but to Octodor they would in no wise come, for that euery man did certainely appoint and perswade with themselues rather in that place to die, then either to sacrifice to the gods, or beare armour against the christians. Which thing indeed bery stoutly and valiantly they affirmed, vpon their oth before taken to Maximianus when he sent for them. Wherwith the tyrant being wrathful and al moued, commanded euery tenth man of that whole band to be put to the sword, whereto strayngtie and with great reioycing they committed their necks. To which notable thing and great force of faith, Maurilius himselfe was a great incourager, who by and by with a most graue oration exhorted & animated his soulders both both to fortitude and constancie. Which being against called of the emperour, answered in this wise saying: We are ô emperor your soulditers, but yet also to speake freely, the seruants of God. We owe to thee seruice of warre, to him innocencie: of thee we receiue for our trauell wages; of him the beginning of life. But in this we may in no wise obey thee ô emperour, to denie God our author and Lord, and not only ours, but your Lord likewise, will ye, nil ye. If we be not so extreamely enforced that we offend him, doubtlesse as we haue hitherto before, we will yet obey you: but otherwise we will rather obey him then you. We offer heere our hands against any other enemies: but to defile our hands with the blood of innocents, that we may not do. These right hands of ours haue skill to fight against the wicked and true enemies: but to spoile and murther the godlie and citizens, they haue no skill at all. We haue in remembrance how we tooke armour in hand for the defence of the citizens, and not against them. We fought alwaies for iustice sake, pietie, and for the health of innocents. These haue been alwaies the rewards of our perils and trauell. We haue fought in the quarell of faith, which in no wise we can keepe to you, if we do not shew the same to our God. We first sware vpon the sacraments of our God, then afterward to the king: and doe you thinke the second will auaile vs, if we breake the first? By vs you would plague the christians, to do which feate we are onely commanded by you. We are heere readie to confesse God the author of all things, and believe in his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord. We see before our eyes our fellowes and partakers of our labours and trauels, to be put to the sword, and we sprinkled with their blood; of which our most blessed companions and brethren, their end and death we haue not bewailed nor mourned, but rather haue been glad, and haue reioyced thereat, for that they haue bin counted worthie so suffer for the Lord their God. The extreame necessitie of death cannot moue vs against your maiestie, neither yet any desperation, ô emperour, which is wont in ventrous affaires to do much, shall arme vs against you. Behold here we cast downe our weapons, and resist not, for that we had rather to be killed, then kill, and guiltlesse to die, then guiltie to liue. Whatsoeuer more yee will command, appoint and enioyne vs, we are heere readie to suffer, yea both fire and sword: and whatsoeuer other torments. We confesse our selues to be christians, we cannot persecute christians, nor will do sacrifice to your diuellish idols.

Maurelius and his compaine martyred.

With which their answere the king being altogether incensed and moued, commanded the second time the tenth man of them that were left to be in like case martyred. That cruelitie also being accomplished, at length when the christian soulditers would in no wise condescend vnto his mind, he set vpon them with his whole host, both footmen and also horsemen, and charged them to kill them all. Who with all force set vpon them, they making no resistance, but thoyping down their armour, yeelded their liues to the persecutors, and offered to them their naked bodies.

The constant boldnes of Victor in refusing to eat with the ensuit persecutors, for the which he was also slaine. Victor martyr.

Victor at the same time was not of that band, nor yet then any souldier, but one being an old souldier, and dismissed for his age. At which time he comming suddenly vpon them as they were banquetting and making merrie with the spoiles of this holy martyrs, was bidden to sit downe with them: and first allking the cause of that their so great reioycing, and vnderstanding the truth thereof, detested the guests, and refused to eate with them. And then being demanded of them whether happily he were a christian or no? openly confessed and denied not, but that he was a christian, and euer would be. And thereupon they rushing vpon him, killed him, and made him partner of the like martyrdome and honor.

The number of the christians executed for all this persecution.

Beda in his historie writeth, that this persecution being vnder Diocletian, endured vnto the seuenth yeare of Constantinus. And Eusebius lib. cap. 6. saith, that it lasted vntill the tenth yeare of Constantinus. It was not yet one yeare from the day in which Diocletian and Maximinian laying themselues together, began their persecution, when that they saw the number of the christians rather to encrease then to diminish, not withstanding all the cruelties that euer they could shew, and now were out of all hope for the vtter rooting out of them. Which thing was the cause of their first enterprise, & hauing now euen their fill of blood, and lothing as it were the shedding therof, they ceased at the last of their owne accord to put any more christians to death. But yet of a great multitude they did thrust out their right eyes, and maimed their left legges at the ham with a searing iron, condemning them to the mines of mettals, not so much for the vse of their labour, as for the desire of afflicting them. And this was the clemencie and release of the cruelties of those princes, which said ý it was not meet that the cities should be defiled with the blood of citizens, and to make the emperours highnesse to be distained with the name of cruelties, but to shew his princely beneficence and liberalitie to all men. Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 10.

When Diocletian and Maximinian had raigned together emperours one and twentie yeares (Nicephorus saith two and twentie yeares) at length Diocletian put himselfe from his emperiall dignitie at Nicomedia, and liued at Salona, Maximian at Mediolanum, and led both of them a priuat life in the three hundred and ninth yeare after Christ. This strange and marueilous alteration gaue occasion, and so came to passe, that within three space after, there were in the Roman common wealth many emperours at one time.

The names of the tyrants. Diocletian and Maximinal emperours deposed. Galerius Maximinus. Constantius raigneth.

In the beginning of this persecution, you heard how Diocletian being made emperour, take to him Maximinian. Also how these two governing as emperours together, chose other two Cesars vnder them, to wit, Galerius Maximinus, and Constantius the father of Constantine the great. Thus then Diocletian raigning with Maximinian, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, began his furious persecution against the christians, whose raigne after the same continued not long. For so it pleased God to put such a snaffle in the tyrants mouth, that within two yeares after, he caused both him and Maximinian (for what cause he knoweth) to giue ouer their emperiall function, and so to remaine not as emperours any more, but as priuat persons. So that they being now displaced and disposselled, the emperiall dominion remained with Constantius and Galerius Maximinus, which two diuided the whole monarchie betweixt them: so that Maximinus should gouerne the east countries, and Constantius the west parts. But Constantius as a modest prince, onely contented with the emperiall title, refused Italie and Aphrike, contenting himselfe only with France, Spaine, and Britaine. Wherefore Galerius Maximinus chose to him his two sonnes Maximinus and Seuerus. Likewise Constantius tooke Constantinus his sonne Cesar vnder him. In the meane time, while Maximinus with his two Cesars were in Asia, the Romane soulditers set vp for their emperour Maxentius the sonne of Maximinian, who had before deposed himselfe. Against whom Maximinus the emperour of the east sent his sonne Seuerus, which Seuerus was slaine in the same voyage of Maxentius, in whose place then Maximinus tooke Licinius. And these were the emperors and Cesars, which succeeding after Diocletian and Maximinian, prosecuted the rest of that persecution, which Diocletian and Maximinian before begunne, during neere the space of seuen or eight yeares, which was to the yeare of our Lord three hundred and eightéene: saue onely that Constantius with his sonne Constantinus, was no great doer therein, but rather a maintainer and a supporter of the christians. Which Constantius, surnamed Clorus for his paleneslie, was the sonne of Eutropius, a man of great nobilitie of the Romane nation, as Lelius affirmeth. He came of the line of Eneas and Claudia, the daughter of Claudius Augustus. This man had not the desire of great and mightie dominions, and therefore parted he the empire with Galerius, and would rule but in France, Britaine and Spaine, refusing the other kingdomes for the troublesome and difficult gouernment of the same. Wherefore he was appince, as Eutropius maketh description of him, verie excellent, ciuill, meke, gentle, liberall, and desirous to doe good vnto those that had any priuate authoritie vnder him. And as Cyrus once said, that he gat treasure enough, when he made his friends rich: euen so it is said that Constantius would often times say, that it were better that his subiects had treasure, then he to haue it in his treasure house. Also he was by nature suffered with a little, in so much that he vsed to eat and drinke in earthen vessels (which thing was counted in Agathocles the Sicilian a great commendation) and if at any time cause required to garnish his table, he would lend for plate and other furniture to his friends. To these vertues he added yet a more worthie ornament, that is, deuotion, loue, and affection towards the word of God, as Eusebius in his eight booke and thirteenth chapter affirmeth: after which vertues ensued great peace and tranquillitie in all his prouinces. By which word he being guided, neither tolerated any warres contrarie to pietie and christian religion, neither added he any other that did the same, neither destroyed he the churches, but commanded that the christians should be preserued and defended, and kept them safe from all contumelious iniuries. And when that in the other iurisdictions of the empire, the congregations were molested with persecution, as Sozomenus declareth in his first booke and first chapter, he only gaue licence vnto the christians to liue after their accustomed manner. This wonderfull act of his following, besides others, both shew that he was a sincere worshipper of the christian religion.

Constantius priuately vpon whose true christiana in his court, and who were not.

Those which bare the chiefe offices amongst the ethnikes, draue out of the emperours court all the godlie christians: whereupon this ensued, that the emperours themselues at the last were destitute of helpe, when such were driuen away: which dwelling in their courts, and liuing a godly life, powred out their prayers vnto God for the prosperous estate & health both of the empire and the emperor. Constantius therefore minding at a certaine time to trie what sincere and good christians he had yet in his court, called together all his officers and seruants in the same, fayning himselfe to chuse out such as would do sacrifice to diuels, and that those only should dwell there and keepe their offices; and that those which would refuse to do the same should be thrust out and banished the court. At this appointment, all the courtiers diuided themselues into companies: the emperor marked which were the constanter & godliest from the rest. And when some said that they would willingly do sacrifice, other some openly and boldly denied to do the saints, then the emperour sharpely rebuked those which were so readie to do sacrifice, and iudged them as false traytors vnto God, accounting them vnworthie to be in his court, which were such traytors to God, and forthwith commanded that they only should be banished the same. But greatly he commended them, which refused to do sacrifice and confessed God, affirming that they only were worthie to be about a prince, forthwith commanding them that thenceforth they should be the trustie counsellers and defenders both of his person and kingdome, saying thus much more, that they only were worthie to be in office, whom he might make account of as his assured friends, and that he meant to haue them in more estimation, then the substance he had in his treasurie. Eusebius maketh mention hereof in his first booke of the life of Constantinus, and also Sozomenus in his first booke and first chapter.

Diocletian an enemie to the Christians.

With this Constantius ioyned (as hath been afore said) Galerius Maximinus, a man, as Eutropius affirmeth, very cruell and a puffing god fouldier: furthermore, a fauourer of vnlearned and learned men, of a quiet disposition, not vitious, but in his drunkennesse, whereof he would some after repent him, as Victor writeth: whether he meaneth Maximinus the father, or Maximinus his sonne, it is vncertaine. But Eusebius far otherwise describeth the conditions of him in his eight booke and first chapter. For he saith he was of a tyrannicall disposition: the fearefullest man that might be, and curious in all magicall superstition, in so much that without the diuinations and answeres of diuels he durst doe nothing at all, and therefore he gaue great offices and dignities to inchanters. Furthermore that he was an exactor and extortioner of the citizens, liberall to those that were flatterers, giuen to surfetting and riot, a great drinker of wine, and in his furious drunkennesse most like a mad man, a ribaud, an adulterer, which came to no citie but he rauished virgins and defiled mens wiues. To conclude, he was so great an idolater, that he built vp temples in euery citie, and repaired those that were fallen in great decay: and he chose out the most worthie of his politicall magistrates to be the idols priests, and deuised that they should execute all their office with great authoritie and dignitie, and also with warlike pompe. But vnto christian pietie and religion he was most inexorable, and in the cast churches exercised cruell persecution, and vsed as executioners of the same, Venectius, Quintianus, and Theotechnus beside others.

The wicked deeds of Maximinus reuiued.

Maximinus a terrible blasphemer by Satans procurement.

Notwithstanding he was at length reuoked from his cruelties by the iust iudgement and punishment of God. For he was suddenly perced with a fatall disease most filthie and desperat, which disease to describe was very strange, taking the first beginning in his flesh outwardly, from thence it proceeded more and more to the inward parts of his bodie. For in the pruie members of his bodie there happened vnto him a sudden putrifaction, and after in the bottome of the same a botchie corrupt bile, with a filthie, consuming and eating vp his intrails, out of the which came swarming forth an innumerable multitude of lice, with such a pestiferous stinke that no man could abide him. And so much more, for that all the grossenesse of his bodie by abundance of meat before he fell sicke, was turned all to fat; which fat now putrified, and stinking, was so ougsome and horrible, that none that came to him could abide the sight thereof. By reason whereof, the physitians which had him in cure, some of them not able to abide the intollerable stinke were commanded to be slaine. Other some, because they could not heale him being so swollen and past hope of cure, were also cruelly put to death. At length being put in remembrance that his disease was sent of God, he began to bethinke the wickednesse that he had done against the Saints of God, and so comming againe to himselfe, first confesseth to God all his offences, then calling them vnto him which were about him, forthwith commanded all men to cease from the persecutions of the christians: requiring moreouer that they should set vp his emperiall proclamations, for the restoring and receiuing of their temples, and that they would ordaine this of the christians, in their assemblies (which without all feare and doubt they might be bold to make) that they would deuoutly pray to their God for the emperour. Then forthwith was the persecution stayed, and the emperiall proclamations in euery citie were set vp, containing the retraction or countermand of those things which against the christians were before decreed, the copie whereof ensueth.

Maximinus his countermand in the behalfe of the christians.

Amongst other things, which for the benefit and commoditie of the commonweale we haue established, we commanded to reforme all things according to the ancient lawes and publike discipline of the Romans, and also to vse this policie, that the christians, which had forsaken the religion of their forefathers, should be brought againe to the right way. For such phantasticall singularitie was amongst them, that those things which their elders had receiued and allowed, they reiected and disallowed, deuising euery man such lawes as they thought good, and obserued the same, assembling in diuers places great multitudes of people.

Therefore when our foresaid decree was proclamed, many there were that felt the penaltie thereof, and many being troubled therefore suffered many kinds of death. And because we see yet that there be many which persewere in the same, which neither giue due worship vnto the celestiall gods, neither receiue the God of the christians, we hauing respect to our accustomed benignitie, wherewith we are wont to shew fauour vnto all men, thinke good in this cause also to extend our clemencie, that the christians may be againe tollerated, and appoint them places where againe they may meet together, so that they doe nothing contrarie to publike order and discipline. By another epistle we meane to prescribe vnto the iudges, what shal be conuenient for them to do. Wherefore according as this our bountifull clemencie deserueth, let them make intercession to God for our health, commonweale, and for themselues; that in all places the state of the commonweale may be preserued, and that they themselues may be able safely to liue within their bounds.

But one of his seuerity officers, whose name was also Parminus, was not well pleased when this countermand was published throughout all Asia, and the prouinces where he had to do. Bethe being qualified by this example, that it was not conuenient for him to repugne the pleasure of those princes which had the chiefe authoritie, as Constantinus and Parminus, set forth of himselfe no edict touching the same: but commanded his officers in the presence of others, that they should somewhat stay from the persecution of the christians: of which commandement of the inferior Parminus, each of them gaue intelligence vnto their fellowes by their letters. But Sabinus, which then amongst them all had the chiefest office and dignitie, to the substitutes of euery countrie wrote by his letters the emperours pleasure in this wise.

Maximinus recountermand grauen in braste.

The maiestie of our most gratious and soueraigne lords the emperours, hath lately decreed with speciall diligence and deuotion, to enduce all men to an vniforme life, so that they which seemed to dissent from the Romane custome by a strange manner of liuing, should exhibit to the immortall gods their due and proper worship: but the wilfull and obstinate mind of diuers so much, and so pninually resisted the same, that by no law full meanes they might be reuoked from their purpose, neither made afraid by any terrour or punishment. Because therefore it so came to passe, that by this meanes many put themselues in perill and ieopardie: the maiestie of our soueraigne lords the emperours, according to their noble pietie, considering that it was far from the meaning of their princely maiesties that such things should bee, whereby so many men and much people should bee destroyed, gaue mee in charge that with diligence I should write vnto you, that if any of the christians from henceforth fortune to be taken in the exercise of their religion, that in no wise you molest the same, neither for that cause you do iudge anie man worthie of punishment: for that in all this time it hath euidently appeared, that by no meanes they might be allured from such wilfulnesse. It is therefore requisit that your wisdome write vnto the questors, captaines, and constables of euery citie and village, that they may know it not to be full for them, or any of them, to do contrarie to the prescript of this commandement, neither that they presume to attempt the same.

Persecution ceaseth for a time.

The gouernors therefore of euery prouince supposing this to be the determinat pleasure (and not fained) of the emperour, did first abuertise thereof, the rusticall and pagan multitude: after that they released and set at libertie all such prisoners as were condemned to the mettall mines, and to perpetuall imprisonment for their faith, thinking thereby (where indeed they were deceiued) that the doing therof would please the emperor. This therefore seemed to them as vnlooked for, and as light to trauellers in a darke night. They gather themselues together in euery city, they call their synods and councels, and much marueil at the sudden change and alteration. The infidels themselues extoll the only and true God of the christians. The christians receiue againe all their former liberties, and such as fell away before in the time of persecution, repent themselues, and after penance done, they returned againe to the congregation. Now the christians reioyced in euery citie, praysing God with hymnes and psalmes: Eusebius ibidem. This was a maruelous sudden alteration of the church, from a most vnhappie state into a better: but scarce suffred Maximinus the tyrant the same six moneths vnviolated to continue. For what soeuer seemed to make for the subuersion of the same peace (yet scarce) hatched, that did he only meditate. And first of all he take from the christians all libertie and leaue for them to assemble and congregat in churchyards vnder a certaine colour. After that he sent certaine miscreants vnto the Athenians, to solicit them against the christians, and to prouoke them to asse of him as a recompence and great reward, that he would not suffer any christian to inhabit in their countrie: and amongst them was one Theotechnus, a most wicked miscreant, an inchanter, and a most deadly enemie against the christians. He first made the way whereby the christians were put out of credit and accused to the emperour, to which fraud also he erected a certaine idoll of Iupiter to be worshipped of the inchanters and coniurers, and mingled the same worship with ceremonies full of detestable witchcraft. Lastly, hee caused the same idoll to giue this sound out of his mouth, that is: Iupiter commandeth the christians to bee banished out of the citie and suburbs of the same, as enemies vnto him. And the same sentence sentence did the rest of the gouernours of the prouinces publish against the christians, and thus at length persecution began to kindle against them. Maximinus appointed and instituted high priests and bishops in euery citie to offer sacrifice vnto idols, and exercised all those that were in great offices vnder him, that they should not only cease to pleasure them and to do so: them, but also that they should with new deuised accusations against them, at their pleasure, put as many to death as by any meanes they might. They also did counterfeit certaine practises of Pilat against our Sauiour Christ full of blasphemie, and sent the same into all the empire of Maximinus by their letters, commanding that the same should be published and set vp in euery citie and suburbs of the same, and that they should be deliuered to the schoolemasters, to cause their scholers to learne by rote the same.

After that, one named Præfectus castrorum, whom the Romans do call captaine, assured certaine light women, partlie by feare, and partly by punishment, dwelling at Damascus in Phœnicia, and taken out of the court, wherein they were accused, that they should openly say in writing that they were once christians, and that they knew what wicked and lasciuious acts the christians were wont to execute amongst themselues vpon the sundaies, and what other things they thought good to make more of their owne head, to the slander of the christians. The captaine sheweth vnto the emperour their words, as though it had been so indeed: and the emperour by and by commanded the same to be published throughout euerie citie. Furthermore, they did hang vp in the middest of euery city (which was neuer done before, the emperours edicts against the christians, grauen in tables of braste. And the children in the scholes with great noyse and clapping of hands did euerie day resound the contumelious blasphemies of Pilat vnto Iesus, and what other things soeuer were deuised of the magistrates, after a most despitefull manner. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 3.

The wicked and imbecill rebellion of mans mind (all obscuritie and blindnesse of ignorance set apart, which hitherto hath wrapped the minds of impious and miserable men in the pernicious darkenesse of ignorance) is now at the length able to discerne, that the same is gouerned, as also corroborated by the prouidence of the immortall gods the louers of vertue: which thing, how acceptable it is to vs, how pleasant and gratefull, and how much proofe the same hath declared of your well disposed willing minds, is incredible to be told: although this was not vnknowne before, with what diligence and deuotion ye serued the immortal gods, whose wonderfull and constant faith is not knowne by bare and naked words, but by your worthy & notable deeds. Wherefore worthily is your citie called the habitation and seat of the immortall gods, and by many examples it appeareth that the same flourisheth, & prospereth by the presence of the celestiall gods. For behold, your citie not regarding your priuat businesses, nor esteeming that which should haue bin for the speciall commoditie thereof, when it perceiued that cursed vanitie to begin againe to creepe, and as a fire negligently quenched, when the dead brands therof began to kindle & make a great flame: by and by without delay ye hauing recourse vnto our pietie, as vnto the metropolitan of all diuine worship & religion, craued remedy and help, which wholsome mind for your pieties sake, it is most manifest that the gods haue indued you with. Therefore he, euen that most mightie Iupiter, I say, which preserueth your most famous citie: to that intent he might deliuer and make free your countrie gods, your wiues and children, your houshold gods and houses, from all detestable corruption, hath inspired you with this wholesome and willing mind, shewing and declaring how worthie, notable, and healthfull a thing it is, to worship and to sacrifice to the immortall gods. For who is so void of reason and vnderstanding, that knoweth not that this thing hapneth vnto vs by the careful studie of the goodnesse of our gods, that the ground denieth not to giue her timely increase, nor maketh frustrate the husbandmans hope, nor that wicked war dare shew her face vpon the earth, nor that the corruption of the aire is now cause of pestilence, neither that the sea swelleth with immoderat winds, neither that sudden storms are cause of hurtfull tempests: to conclude, that the ground which is as the nurse and mother of all things, is not swallowed vp of her deep chaps and gapings, by terrible earthquake; neither that the hils made leuell with the earth, are not with gaping clifts deuoured: all which euils and greater then these, before this time to haue hapned, euery man knoweth. And all these mischiefes came vpon vs for the pernicious errors sake of the extreme follie of those wicked men the christians, when filthinesse is fesse (as I may call it) so occupied their minds, and ouerran the world. Let them behold the fields now all about full of corne, and ouerflowen as it were with ears of corne. Let them view the pleasant medows clothed with flowers, & moistned with showers from heauen, and also the pleasant and temperat weather. Therefore let all men reioyce, that by your pietie, sacrifices and worshipping, the maiestie of the most sterne god of battell Mars is appeased, and that therefore wee enioy pleasant and firme peace. And how many soeuer haue left that blind errour and straying

And that this thing may be accomplished, forthwith aske and haue. And this thing with all speed endeauour you to obtaine, which shall be a perpetuall testimonie of pietie exhibited of your citie to the immortal gods, and shal be a president to your children and posteritie, and wish all you shall obtaine of vs for this your willing desire of reformation, condigne and worthie reward. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 7.

Thus came it to passe that at the length persecution was as great as euer it was, and the magistrates of euery prouince were very vnbainefull against the christians which condemned some to death, and some to exile. Among whom they condemned three christians at Emisa in Phœnicia, with whom Sylvanus the bishop a very old man, being fortie yeares in the ecclesiasticall function, was condemned to death. At Nicomedia, Lucianus the elder of Antioch, brought thither, after he had exhibited to the emperor his apologie concerning the doctrine of the christians, was cast in prison, and after put to death. In Anasea a citie of Cappadocia, Binges the lieutenant of Parminius, had at that time the executing of that persecution. At Alexandria, Petrus a most worthie bishop was beheaded, with whom many other Egyptian bishops also died: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 7. Nicephi. li. 7. ca. 44. Dutinus the bishop of Sebastanus hauing a handmill tied about his neche, was throwne headlong from the bridge into the flood, and there a ring while floted aboue the water, and when he opened his mouth to speake to the lookers on that they should not be dismaid with that his punishment, was with much ado drowned: Chron. Euseb. At Rome died Marcellus the bishop, as saith Platina, also Timotheus the elder, with many other bishops and priests were martyred. To conclude, many in sundrie places euery where were martyred, whose names ye boke intituled Fasciculus temporum declareth, as Nicodemus, Symphorianus, Castorius with his wife, Castulus, Cesarius, Gennus Nobilis, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, and other innumerable martyrs. Crasinus, Bonifacius, Iuliana, Cosmas, Damianus, Callinus with seuen others. Dorothea, Theophilus, Theodosia, Ciriallis, Agricola, Acha. Philemon, Barcicus, Januarius, Festus, Desiderius, Gregorius Spoletanus, Agnes, Chionia, Hirenea. Theodora, & two hundred three score & ten other martyrs. Flauinius, Primus & Felicianus, Titus & Podestius, Crescentia. Albinius, Rogatianus, Donatianus. Pancratius, Catharina. Margarera, Lucia the virgin, & Anthesus the king with many thousand martyrs more. Simplicius. Faustinus, Beatrix, Pantaleon, Cerogius, Iustus, Leocandia, Anthonia, and other more (to an infinit number) suffred martyrdome in this persecution, whose names God hath written in the booke of life. Also Felix Otato with his parents, Lucia the widow Gemenianus with threescore and nineteene others, Sabinus, Anastasia, Cyprogonius, Felix and Audacius. Adrianus Natholia, Eugenia. Agnes also when she was but thirteene yeeres old was martyred. Eusebius in his eight booke and fifteenth chapter rehearseth these kinds of torments and punishments, that is to say, fire, wilde beasts, the sword, crucifixings, the bottome of the sea, the cutting and burning of members, the thrusting out of eyes, disnumbring of the whole bodie, hunger, imprisonment, and whatsoeuer other cruelties the magistrates could deuise. All which notwithstanding the godly ones, rather then that they would do sacrifice as they were bid, manfully endured. Neither were the women anything at all behind them. For they being enticed to the filthy vse of their bodies rather suffered banishment, or willingly killed themselues. Neither yet could the christians liue safely in the wildernesse, but were fetched euen from thence to death and torments, in so much that this was a more grieuous persecution vnder Maximinus the tyrant, then was the former cruell perfecution vnder Maximianus the prince: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 6.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 6.

And for so much as we haue heard the cruell edict of Maximinus proclamed against the christians grauen in braste which he thought perpetually should endure to the abolishing of Christ and his religion: now marke against the great handie worke of God, which immediatly fell vpon the same, checking the proud presumption of the tyrant, proning all to be false and contrarie that in the brasen proclamation was contained. For where the forsaid edict boasted so much of the prosperitie and plentie of all things in the same time of this persecution of the christians, suddenly befell such vnreasonable drought, with famine and pestilence among the people, besides also the wars with the Armenians. That all was found vntrue that he had bragged so much of before. By reason of which famine and pestilence the people were greatly consumed, in so much that one measure of wheat was sold for two thousand and five hundred pieces of money of Athens coine, by reason whereof innumerable died in the cities, but many more in the countrie and villages, so that most part of the husbandmen and countrimen died vp with the famine and pestilence. Diuers there were which bringing out their best treasure, were glad to giue it for any kind of sustenance, were it neuer so little. Others selling away their possessions, fell by reason thereof to extreame pouertie and beggerie. Certaine eating grasse, and feeding on other vnwholesome herbs, were faine to relieue themselues with such food as did hurt and poyson their bodies. Also a number of women in the cities, being brought to extreame miserie and penurie, were constrained to depart the citie, and fall to begging through the countrey. Some others were weake and faint (as images without breath) wandring vp and downe, and not able to stand for feeblenesse, fell downe in the middle of the streets, and holding vp their hands most pitifull, cried for some scrape or fragments of bread to be giuen them, and being at the last gaspe, readie to giue vp the ghost, and not able to vtter any other words, yet cried out that they were hungrie. Of the richer sort diuers there were, who being wearie with the number of beggers and askers, after they had bestowed largely vpon them, became hard hearted, fearing lest they should fall into the same miserie themselues, as they which begged. By reason whereof, the market place, streets, lanes, and allies lay full of dead and naked bodies, being cast out and vnburied, to the pitifull and grieuous beholding of them that saw them. Wherefore many were eaten of dogs, for which cause they that liued felt to the killing of dogs, lest they running mad, should fall vpon them, and kill them.

A terrible hunger among the creatures, prouided for mans sustenance.

Pestilence among the pestilent.

In like manner the pestilence scattering through all houses and ages of men, did no lesse consume them, especially those which through plentie of victuals escaped famine. Wherefore the rich princes and presidents, and other inmunerable of the magistrates, being the more apt to receiue the infection, by reason of their plentie, were quickly dispatched, and turned vp their heeles. Thus the miserable multitude being consumed with famine and with pestilence, all places were full of mourning, neither was there any thing else seene, but wailing and weeping in euery corner. So that death, what for famine and pestilence, in short time brake vp and consumed whole households, two or three dead bodies being borne out together from one house to one funerall.

These were the rewards of the vaine bragg of Maximinus and his edicts, which he did publish in all townes and cities against vs, when it was cuident to all men, how diligent and charitable the christians were to them all in this their miserable extremitie. For they only in all this time of distresse, shewing compassion vpon them, trauelled euery day, some in curing the sicke, and some in burying the dead, which otherwise of their owne sort were forsaken. Other some of the christians calling and gathering the multitude together, which were in ieopardie of famine, distributed bread vnto them, whereby they ministred occasion to all men to glorifie the God of the christians, and to confesse them to be the true worshippers of God, as appeared by their workes. By the meanes and reason hereof, the great God and defender of the christians, who before had shewed his anger & indignation against all men, for their wrongfull afflicting of vs, opened againe vnto vs the comfortable light of his prouidence, so that by meanes thereof peace fell vnto vs, as light vnto them that sit in darknesse, to the great admiration of all men, which easily perceiue God himselfe to bee a perpetuall diuider of our doings, who many times chastiseth his people with calamities for a time to exercise them, but after sufficient correction againe theweth himselfe mercifull and fauourable to them which with trust call vpon him.

The charitie of the christians to the enimies, Let your light so shine among men, that they may see your good workes, and glorifie your father which is in heauen.

By the narration of these things heretofore premixed, taken out of the storie of Eusebius, like as it is manifest to see, so is it wonderfull to marke and note, how these counsels and rages of the gentiles atchieued against Christ and his christians, when they seemed most sure against them, were most against themselues. And whereby they thought most to confound the church and religion of Christ, the same turned most to their owne confusion, and to the profit and praise of the christians (God of his marueilous wisedome so ordering and disposing the end of things.) For where the brasen edict of the emperour promised temperat weather, God sent drought: where it promised plentie, God immediatly sent vpon them famine and penurie: where it promised health, God strooke them euen vpon the same, with grieuous pestilence, and with other more calamities, in such sort, that the most reliefe they had, was chiefely by the christians, to the great praise both of them, and to the honor of our God.

The wisedome and policie of God ouerthrowne in his owne nature. Deus omnipotens in sapientia sua.

This most plainly and euidently was then verified the true promise of Christ to his church, affirming and assuring vs, that the gates of hell shall not preuaile against his church builded vpon his faith: as sufficiently may appeare by these ten persecutions aboue specified and described. Wherein as no man can denie, but that satan and his malignant world haue assayed the vttermost of their power and might to ouerthrow the church of Iesus: so must all men needs grant, that reade these stories, that when satan and the gates of hell haue done their worst, yet haue they not preuailed against this mount of Sion, nor euer shall. For else what was here to be thought, where so many emperours and tyrants together, Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximinus, Seuerus, Parentius, Licinius, with their captaines and officers, were let lose, like so many lions, vpon a scattered and vnarmed flocke of sheepe, intending nothing else, but the vtter subuersion of all christianity, and especially also when lawes were set vp in braue against the christians, as a thing perpetually to stand: what was here to be looked for, but a final desolation of the name and religion of christians? But what followed, partly ye haue heard, partly more is to be marked, as in the storie followeth.

The death and end of Maximinian.

I shewed before how Parentius, the sonne of Maximinian, was set vp at Rome by the pretorian souldiers to be emperour. Whereunto the senat, although they were not consenting, yet for feare they were not resisting. Maximinian his father, who had before deposed himselfe with Diocletian, hearing of this, take heart againe to him, to resume his dignitie, and so laboured to perswade Diocletian also to do the same: but when he could not moue him thereunto, he repaireth to Rome, thinking to wrest the empire out of his sonnes hands. But when the souldiers would not suffer that, of a craftie purpose he flieth to Constantinus in France, vnder pretence to complaine of Parentius his sonne, but in very deed to kill Constantinus. Notwithstanding that conspiracie being detected by Fausta the daughter of Maximinian, whom Constantinus had married, so was Constantinus through the grace of God preserued, and Maximinian retired backe. In the which his flight by the way he was apprehended, and so put to death. And this is the end of Maximinian.

The wicked nesse of Parentius discerned.

Now let vs returne to Parentius againe, who all this while raigned at Rome, with tyrannie and wickednesse intolerable, much like to another Pharao or Nero. For hee slew the most part of his noble men, and take from them their goods. And sometime in his rage he would destroy great multitudes of the people at home by his souldiers, as Eusebius declareth, Lib. 8. cap. 14. Also he left no mischeuous nor lasciuious act vnattempted, but was the vtter enemie of all womanly chastitie, which vsed to send the honest wiues, whom he had adulterated, with shame and dishonestie vnto their husbands (being worthie senators) after that he had rauished them. Hee abstained from no adulterous act, but was inflamed with the vnquenchable lust of deflouring of women. Letus declareth that he being at a time far in loue with a noble and chast gentlewoman of Rome, sent vnto her such courriers of his, as were meet for that purpose, whom also he had in great estimation then any others, and with such was wont to consult about matters for the commonweale. These first fell vpon her husband and murthered him within his owne house, then when they could by no meanes neither with feare of the tyrant, or with threatning of death pull her away from him: at length the being a christian desired leaue of them to go into her chamber, and after her prairs she would accomplish that which they requested. And when she had gotten into her chamber, vnder this pretence, she killed her selfe. But the courtiers when they saw that the woman tarried so long, they being displeased therewith, brake open the doores, and found her there lying dead. Then returned they and declared this matter to the emperour, who was so farre past shame, that in stead of repentance he was the more set on fire in attempting the like.

Eusseb. lib. 8. cap. 14.

A chamefull act of incontinencie.

An admonition concerning the materiall crosse not to be worshipped, but to be a meanes to bring Constantine to the faith of him which was crucified.

He was also much addict to the art magicall, which to execute, he was more fit then the emperiall dignitie. Also sometime he would rip women when they were in labor, and would search the place where the infant lay, being borne a little before. Often he would inuocate diuels in a secret manner, and by the answeres of them he sought to breake the wars, which he knew Constantinus and Licinius prepared against him. And to the end he might the rather perpetrate his mischieuous and wicked attempts, which in his vngratious mind he had conceiued, according to his purpose, in the beginning of his raigne he fained himselfe to be a fauourer of the christians. In which thing doing, thinking to make the people of Rome his friends, he commanded that they should cease from persecuting of the christians. And he himselfe in the meane season abstained from no contumelious veration of them, till that he began at the last to shew himselfe an open persecutour of them: at which time as Donatus writeth he most cruelly raged against the christians thereabouts, being them with all manner iniuries. Which thing he in no lesse wise did, then Maximinus, as Eusebius in his eight booke and fifteenth chapter seuenth to attaine. And Platina declareth in the life of Marcellus the bishop, that he banished a certaine noble woman of Rome, because shee gaue her goods to the church.

Eusseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Thus by the grieuous tyrannie and vnspeakeable wickednesse of this Parentius, the citizens and senatours of Rome being much grieued and oppressed, sent their complaints with letters vnto Constantinus, with much sute and most heartie petitions, desiring him to helpe and release their countrie and citie of Rome: who hearing and vnderstanding their miserable and pitifull state, and grieued therewith not a little, little, first sendeth by letters to Parentius, desiring and exhorting him to refraine his corrupt doings, and great cruelties. But when no letters nor exhortations would preuaile, at the length preparing the wofull case of the Romans, gathered together his power and armie in Britaine and France, wherewith to repell the violent rage of that tyrant. Thus Constantinus sufficiently appointed with strength of men, but especially with strength of God, entred his iourney comming towards Italie, which was about the last yeare of the persecution, three hundred and eightene. Parentius vnderstanding of the comming of Constantine, and trusting more to his diuelish art of magike, then to the god will of his subiects, which he little deserued, durst not shew himselfe out of the citie, nor encounter with him in the open field, but with priuie garrisons laid in wait for him by the way, in sundrie straits as he should come. Wherin when Constantine had diuers skirmishes, & by the power of the Lord did euer banquith them and put them to flight. Notwithstanding Constantinus yet was in no great comfort, but in great care and dread in his mind (approching now neere vnto Rome) for the magicall charmes and sorceries of Parentius, wherewith he had banquished before Seuerus sent by Galerius against him, as hath been declared, which made also Constantinus the more afraid. Wherefore being in great doubt and perplexitie in himselfe, and reuoluing many things in his mind, what helpe he might haue against the operations of his charming, which vsed to cut women great with child, to take his diuelliely charms by the entrails of yinfants, with such other like feates of diuelishnesse which he practised: these things (I say) Constantinus doubting and reuoluing in his mind, in his iourney drawing toward the citie, and calling by his eyes many times to heauen, in the south part, about the going downe of the sunne, saw a great brightnesse in heauen, appearing in the similitude of a crosse, with certaine starres of eyeall bignesse giuing this inscription like Latine letters, IN HOC VINCE, that is: In this ouercome. At the sight whereof when he was greatly astonied, and consulting with his men vpon the meaning thereof, behold in the night season in his sleepe Christ appeared to him with the signe of the same crosse, which he had seene before, bidding him to make the figuration thereof, and to carrie it in his wars before him, and so should he haue the victorie.

Now therefore as the Israelites with their Poses at the brimming of their Pharao, sang gloriously vnto the Lord, who miraculously had cast downe the horse and horsemen into the sea: so no lesse reioycing and exceeding gladnesse was here, to see the glorious hand of the Lord Christ fighting with his people, and banquishing his enemies and persecutors.

Exod. 15. The figure of the aforesaid mentioned in the new.

In histories we reade of many victories and great conquests gotten: yet we neuer reade, nor euer shall, of any victorie so wholesome, so commodious, so opportune to mankind as this was, which made an end of so much bloodshed, and obtained so much libertie and life to the posteritie of so many generations. For albeit that some persecution was yet stirring in the east countries by Maximinus and Licinius, as shall be declared: yet in Rome and in all the west parts, no martyr died after this heauenly victorie gotten. And also in the east parts the said Constantinus with the said crosse borne before him, consequently vpon the same so banquished the tyrants, and so established the peace of the church, that for the space of a full thousand yeares after that, we reade of no set persecution against the christias, vnto the time of John Wickliffe, when the bishops of Rome began with fire to persecute the true members of Christ, as in further processe of this history (Christ granting) shall appeare. So happie, (so glorious (as I said) was this victorie of Constantine, surnamed the great. For the ioy and gladnesse whereof, the citizens who had sent for him before, with exceeding triumph brought him into the citie of Rome, where he with the crosse was most honorably receiued and celebrated the space of seuen daies together, hauing moreouer in the market place, his image set vp, holding in his right hand the signe of the crosse, with this inscription: Hoc salutari signo, veraci fortitudinis indicio, ciuitatem nostram iugo tyranni ereptam liberaui: that is, With this wholesome signe, the true token of fortitude, I haue rescued and deliuered our citie from the yoke of the tyrant. By this heauenly victorie of Constantinus, and by the death of Parentius no little tranquillitie came vnto the church of Christ. Although notwithstanding in the east churches the storme of this tenth persecution was not yet altogether quieted, but that some taile thereof in those parts remained for the space of two or three yeares. But of this we minde to speake (Christ willing) hereafter. In the meane season to returne againe to the west parts here in Europe, where Constantine then had most to do, great tranquillitie followed, and long continued in the church without any open slaughter for a thousand yeares together (to the time of John Wickliffe and Waldenses, as is before touched) by the meanes of the godly beginning of good Constantinus, who with his fellow Licinius, being now established in their dominion, ekteames set forth their generall proclamation or edict, not constraining thereby any man to any religion, but giuing libertie to all men, both for the christians to persist in their profession without any danger, and for other men freely to adioyne with them, whosoeuer pleased. Which thing was very well taken and highly allowed of the Romans, and all wise men. The copie of the edict or constitution here ensueth.

The copie of the emperiall constitution of Constantinus and Licinius, for the establishing of the free worshipping of God, after the christian religion.

The copie of the emperiall constitution of Constantinus and Licinius. Eusseb. lib. 10. cap. 5

NOt long agone we weying with our selues, that the libertie and freedome of religion ought not in any case to be prohibited, but that free leaue ought to be giuen to euery man to do therin according to his wil and mind, we haue giuen commandement to all men to qualifie matters of religion as they themselues thought good, and that also the christians should keep the opinions and faith of their religion: but because that many and sundry opinions by the same our first licence spring and encrease through such libertie granted, we thought good manifestly to adde thereunto, and make plaine such things: whereby perchance some of them in time to come, may from such their obseruance be let or hindred. When therfore by prosperous successe, I Constantius Augustus, and I Licinius Augustus came to Mediolanum, and there sat in councel vpon such things as seemed for the vtilitie and profit of the commonweale, these things amongst others we thought would be beneficiall to all men, yea and before all other things we purposed to establish those things wherein the true reuerence and worship of God is comprehended, that is, to giue vnto the christians free choice to follow what religion they think good, and whereby the same sincerity and celestiall grace which is in euery place receiued, may also be imbraced & accepted of al our louing subiects. According therfore vnto this our pleasure vpon good aduisement and sound iudgement, we haue decreed, that no man so hardie be denied to chuse and follow the christian obseruance or religion: but that this libertie be giuen to euery man, that he may applie his mind to what religion he thinketh meet himselfe, whereby God may perfonne vpon vs all his accustomed care and goodnes. To the intent therefore you might know that this is our pleasure, we thought it necessarie this to write vnto you, whereby all such errors and opinions being removed, which in our former letters (being sent vnto you in the behalfe of the christians) are contained, and which seeme very vndiscreet and contrarie to our clemencie, may bee made frustrate and adnihilat. Now therefore firmely and freely we will and command, that euery man haue a free liberty to obserue the christian religion, and that without anie griefe or molestation he may bee fusered to doe the same. These things haue we thought good to signifie vnto you by as plaine words as we may, that we haue giuen to the christians free and absolute power to keep and vse their religion. And for so much as this libertie is absolutely giuen of vs vnto them, to vse and exercise their former obseruance, if anie be disposed, it is manifest that the same helpeth much to establish the publike tranquillitie of our time, euery man to haue licence and libertie to vse and chuse what kind of worshipping he list himselfe. And this is done of vs only for the intent, that we would haue no man to be enforced to one religion more then another. And this thing also amongst others we haue prouided for the christians, that they may haue againe the possession of such places, in which heretofore they haue been accustomed to make their assemblies; so that if any haue bought or purchased the same either of vs, or of any other: the same places without either money or other recompence, forthwith and without delay we will to be restored againe vnto the said christians. And if any man haue obtained the same by gift from vs, and shall require anie recompence to be made to them in that behalfe: then let the christians repaire to the president (being the iudge appointed for that place) that consideration may be had of those men by our benignitie: all which things we will and command, that you see to be giuen and restored freely, and with diligence vnto the societie of the christians, all delay set apart. And because the christians themselues are vnderstood to haue had not only those places wherein they were accustomed to resort together, but certaine other peculiar places also, not being priuat to any one man, but belonging to the right of their congregation and societie: you shall see also all those to be restored vnto the christians, that is to say, to euery fellowship and company of them, according to the decree, whereof we haue made mention, all delay set apart. Prouided that the order we haue take in the meane time be obserued, that if any (taking no recompence) shall restore the same lands and possessions, they shall not mistrust but be sure to be saued harmelesse by vs. In all these things it shall be your part to employ your diligence in the behalfe of the foresaid companie of the christians, whereby this our commandement may speedily be accomplished, and also in this case by our clemencie the common and publike peace may be preserued. For vndoubtedly by this meanes, as before we haue said, the good will and fauour of God towards vs (whereof in many cases we haue had good experience) shall alwaies continue with vs. And to the intent that this our constitution may be notified to all men, it shall be requisit that the copie of these our letters be set vp in all places, that men may reade and know the same, lest any should be ignorant thereof.

The effect of the decree which Maximinus made against the christians.

wherein he pretendeth to write to Sabinus afore mentioned, first repeating vnto him the former decree of Diocletian and Maximinian in few words, with the commandement therein contained touching the persecution against the christians. After that, he reciteth the decree which he himselfe made against them, when he came first to the emperiall dignitie in the east part ioyned with Constantius. Then the countermand of another decree of his again, for the ceasing of the christians, with such fained and pretended causes, as is in the same to be sene. After that, he declareth how he comming to Nicomedia, at the first and supplication of the citizens (which he also fained, as may appeare before) he applying to their sute, reuoked that his former edict, and granted them that no christian should dwell within their citie or territories. Vpon which Sabinus also had giuen forth his letters, rehearing withall the generall recountermand sent forth by him, for the persecution against of the christians. Last of all now he sendeth downe against another surrecountermand, with the causes therein contained, touching the safetie of the christians, and tranquillitie of them: commanding Sabinus to publish the same. Which edict of his is at large set forth of Eusebius, lib. 9. cap. 9. But this surrecountermand he then dissembled, as he had done in the other before. Howbeit shortly after, he making wars, and fighting a battell with Licinius, wherein he lost the victorie, comming home againe, take great indignation against the priests and prophets of his gods, whom before that time he had great regard vnto, and honoured: vpon whose answeres he trusting, and depending vpon their inchantments, began his war against Licinius. But after that he perceiued himselfe to be deceiued by them, as by wicked inchanters and deceiuers, and such as had betrayed his safetie and person, he killed and put them to death. And he shortly after, oppressed with a certain disease, glorified the God of the christians, and made a most absolute law for the safetie and preseruation of them, with franchise and libertie: the copie whereof ensueth.

The surrecountermand of Maximinus published. Ex Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9.

The vnfained repentance and small decree of Maximinus for the christians.

Imperator Cæsar, Gaius, Valerius, Maximinus, Germanicus, Pius, Fortunatus, Augustus. It is necessarie that we alwaies carefully prouide and see vnto the benefit and commoditie of such as be our subiects, and to exhibit such things vnto them, whereby they may best obtaine the same. But we suppose that there are none of you so ignorant, but know and vnderstand what things make best for the profit and commoditie of the commonweale, and best please euery mans disposition. But it is meet and conuenient that euery man haue recourse to that which they haue seene done before their eyes, & that all sorts of men consider the same, and beare it in their minds. When therefore, and that before this time, it came to our knowledge, vpon the occasion that Diocletianus, and Maximinianus, our progenitors of famous memorie, commanded the assemblies and meetings of the christians to be cut off, there were many of them spoiled and robbed of our officials: which thing we also perceiue is now put in practise against our subiects, that they in like case may bee spoiled of their goods and substance, which thing chiefely to preuent is our only endeuour. By our letters sent to the gouernors of euery prouince the yeare past, we ordained that if any man were disposed to leane vnto the christian religion, that he might without any iniurie done vnto him accomplish his desire, neither to be of any man either let or molested: and that he might without any feare or suspicion, do whatsoeuer he therein thought good. But now also we vnderstand that there be certain iudges which haue neglected our commandement, and haue put our subiects in doubt, whether that hath been our pleasure or not; which thing they did, that such men might be the better aduised, how they entred into such religion: wherin they followed their own phantasie. To the intent therefore that after this, all suspicion, doubt, and feare may be taken away: we haue thought good to publish this our edict, whereby it may be made manifest to euery man, that it shall be lawfull for all such as will follow that religion, by the benefit of this our grant and letters patents, to vse what religion they like best. And also hereby we grant to them licence to build them oratories or temples. And furthermore, that this our grant may more amplie extend vnto them, we vouchsafe to appoint and ordaine, that v. hatsoeuer lands and substance before belonging and appertaining to the christians, and by the commandement of our predecessors were transposed to our reuenue and exchequer, or else be in the possession of any citie, by meanes of the franchises of the same, or else otherwise sold or giuen to any man: all and euery parcell thereof we command shall be restored vnto the proper vse of the christians again, whereby they may all haue in this matter more experience of our godly deuotion and prouidence. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 10.

A large grant of Maximinus to the christians.

Maximinus thus being conquered of Licinius, and also plagued with an incurable disease in the guts, sent by the hand of God, was compelled by torments and aduersitie to confesse the true God, whom before he regarded not, and to write this edict in the fauour of those christians, whom before he did persecute. Thus the Lord doth make many times his enemies, be they neuer so sterne and stout, at length to stoope, and maugre their hearts to confesse him, as this Maximinus here did, who not long after, by the vehemencie of his disease ended his life. Whereby no more tyrants now were left aliue, to trouble the church, but only Licinius. Of which Licinius, and of his persecutions persecutions stirred vp in the east parts, against the saints of God, now remaineth in order of storie to prosecute.

The persecution of the church vnder Licinius.

An enemie to learning. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

This Licinius being a Dane borne, and made first Cesar by Galerius, as is aboue specified, was afterward ioined with Constantius in gouernment of the empire, and in setting forth the edicts, which before we haue described: although it seemeth all this to be done of him with a dissembling mind. For so is he in all histories described, to be a man passing all others in desire of vnsatiable riches, giuen to lecherie, ruffle, drunkennesse, and furious. To learning he was such an enemy, that he named the same a poison and a common pestilence, and especially the knowledge of the lawes. He thought no vice worse became a prince then learning, because he himselfe was vnlearned. Eutropius, Lætus, Ignatius, Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

There was betweene him and Constantinus in the beginning great familiaritie, and such agreement, that Constantinus gaue vnto him his sister Constantia in matrimonie, as Aurelius Victor writeth. Neither would any man haue thought him to haue been of any other religion then Constantinus was of, he seemed in all things so well to agree with him. Whereupon he made a decree with Constantinus in the behalfe of the christians, as we haue shewed: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9. And such was Licinius in the beginning: but after arming himselfe with tyrannie, began to conspire against the person of Constantinus, of whom he had receiued so great benefits, neither fainourable to the law of nature, nor mindfull of his oths, his bond, nor promises. But when he considered that in his conspiracies hee nothing preuailed, for that he saw Constantinus was preserued and safely defended of God: and partly being puffed vp with the vitorie against Parminus, he began vehemently to hate him, and not onely to raise the christian religion, but also deadly to hate the same. He said hee would become an enemie vnto the christians, for that in their assemblies and meetings they prayed not for him, but for Constantinus. Therefore first by little and little and that secretly, he went about to wrong and hurt the christians, and banished them his court, which neuer were by any means preiudicial to his kingdome. Then he commanded that all those should be depriued which were knights of the honorable order, vnlesse they would do sacrifice to diuels: Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8. The same persecution afterwards stretched hee from his court, into all his prouinces, which with most wicked and deuised lawes he set forth. First, that for no cause the bishops should in any matter communicat together: neither that any man should come at the churches nert vnto them, or to call any assemblies, and consult for the necessarie matters and vtilitie of the church.

A strict charge against the tarrying of the imprisoned christians.

After, that the men and women together should not come in companies to pray, nor that the women should come in those places where they vsed to preach and reade the word of God; neither that they should be after that instructed any more of the bishops, but should shut out such women amongst them as should instruct them. The third most cruell and wickedst of all was, that none should helpe and succour those that were cast in prison, nor should destroy any almes or charitie vpon them, though they should die for hunger: and they which shewed any compassion vpon those that were condemned to death should be as greatly punished, as they to whom they shewed the same should be: Eusebius libro primo de vita Constantini. These were the most horrible constitutions of Licinius, which went beyond and passed the bounds of nature.

Secret persecution for feare of Constantinus.

After this he vsed violence against the bishops, but yet not openly, for feare of Constantinus, but priuilie and by conspiracie: by which meanes he slue those that were the worthiest men amongst the doctors and prelats. And about Amasea and other cities of Pontus, he raced the churches euen with the ground. Other some he shut vp, that no man should come after their accustomed manner to pray and worship God: and there fore as we said before, his conscience accusing him, all this he did, for that he suspected they prayed for Constantinus, and not at all for him. And from this place in the east parts to the Lybians, which bordered vpon the Egyptians, the christians durst not assemble and come together for the displeasure of Licinius, which he had conceiued against them. Sozomenus, lib. 1. cap. 2.

Furthermore, the flattering officers that were vnder him, thinking by this meanes to please him, slue and made out of the way many bishops, and without any cause put them to death, as though they had been homicides and hainous offendors: and such rigorousnes vsed they towards some of them, that they cut their bodies into gobbets and small peeces in manner of a butcher, and after that threw them into the sea to feed the fishes. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8. What shall we speake of the exiles and confiscations of good and vertuous men? For he took by violence euery mans substance, and cared not by what meanes he came by the same: but threatned them with death, vnlesse they would forgo the same. He banished those which had committed none euill at all. Thee commanded that both gentlemen and men of honour should bee made out of the way; neither yet herewith content, but gaue their daughters that were vnmaried to harlets and to wicked ones to be defloured. And Licinius himselfe (although that by reason of his yeres his bodie was spent) yet shamefullie did he vitiate many women, mens wiues & maids. Euseb. lib. 1. de vita Constantini. Which cruell outrage of him caused many godly men of their owne accord to forsake their houses: and it was also seene, that the woods, fields, desert places and mountains were faine to be the habitations and resting places of the poore and miserable christians. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 14. Of those worthie men and famous martyrs, which in this persecution found the way to heauen, Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 10. first speaketh of Theodosius, who first by hanging vpon the crosse, had nailes thrust into his armes & feet, and after that his head stricken off. Also of another Theodorus being the bishop of Tyre: the third was a man of Pergæa: Basilius also the bishop of Amasenus, Nicholaus the bishop of Mirous, Gregorius of Armenia the great; after that Paul of Neocesaria, which by the impious commandement of Licinius had both his hands cut off with a fearing iron. Besides these were in the citie of Sebastia fortie worthie men, and christian souldiers in the vehement cold time of winter soiled and drowned in a horse pond, when Lucias as yet, of whom we spake before, and Agricolaus executing the thirstes office vnder Licinius in the east parts, were aliue: and were in great estimation, for inuenting of new and strange torments against the christians. The wiues of those fortie good men were carried to Heraclea a citty in Thracia, and there, with a certaine deacon whose name was Amones, were (after innumerable torments by them most constantly indured) slaine with the sword. These things writeth Nicephorus. Also Sozomenus in his ninth book and second chapter maketh mention of the same martyrs. And Basilius in a certaine oration semeth to intreat of their historie, saiuing that in the circumstances he somewhat varieth. And Eusebie Licinius was determined, for that the first face of this persecution fell out according to his desire, to haue ouerrun all the christians: to which thing neither counsell, nor good will, nor yet opportunitie perchance wanted; vnlesse God had brought Constantinus into those parts where he gouerned: there, in the warres which he himselfe began (knowing right well that Constantinus had intelligence of his conspiracie and treason) toyning battell with him, was most cowardly ouercome.

The wicked persecution of Eusebie Licinius, had the like not been pronounced by God and slaine by Constantinus.

Diuers battels betweene them were fought, the first fought in Hungarie, where Licinius was ouerthrowne: then he fled into Macedonia, and repairing his armie, was againe discomfited. Finally, being vanquished both by sea and land, he lastly at Nicomedia yeelded himselfe to Constantine, and was commanded to liue a priuat life in Thessalia, where at length he was slaine by the souldiers.

Licinius ouercome in battell by Constantinus.

Thus haue ye heard the end and conclusion of al the seuen tyrants which were the authors and workers of this tenth and last persecution against the true people of God. The chiefe captaine and meenteur of which persecution was first Diocletian, who died at Salena as some say, by his owne poison, in the yere of our Lord three hundred and nintene. The nert was Maximinian, who (as is said) was hanged of Constantine at Massilia, about the yere of our Lord three hundred and tenne. Then died Galerius, plagued with an horrible disease sent of God. Seuerus was slaine by Maximinus, father of Parentius the wicked tyrant, who was ouercome & vanquished of Constantine, in the yere of our Lord three hundred and eighteene. Maximinus the first tyrant tarried not long after, who being ouercome by Licinius, died about the yere of our Lord three hundred and twentie. Lastly, how this Licinius was ouercome by Constantine and slaine, in the yere of our Lord three hundred twentie and foure, is before declared. Vnele Constantius, the father of Constantine being a god and a godlie emperour, died in the third yere of the persecution, in the yere of our Lord three hundred and ten, and was buried at Yorke. After whom succeeded after his godly father Constantinus, as a second Moses sent and set vp of God to deliuer his people out of this so miserable captiuitie, into libertie most ioyfull.

The end and death of these tyrants which were the authors of this tenth persecution.

Now remaineth after the end of these persecutors thus described, to gather vp the names and stories of certaine particular martyrs, which now are to be set forth worthie of speciall memorie, for their singular constancie and fortitude, shewed in their sufferings and cruell torments. The names of all which that suffered in this foresaid tenth persecution, being in number infinit, in vertue most excellent, it is impossible here to compehend: but the most notable, and in most approued authors expressed, we thought here to insert, for the more edification of other christians, which may and ought to take vpon their examples, first beginning with Albanus, the first martyr that euer in England suffered death for the name of Christ.

A briefe note of the most notable martyrs that suffered in this tenth persecution.

At what time Diocletian and Maximinian the pagan emperours had directed out their letters with all seueritie, for the persecuting of the christians; Alban being then an infidell, receiued into his house a certaine clerke, fleeing from the persecutors handes, whom when Alban beheld, continuallie both day and night to persecure in watching and prayer, suddenlie by the great mercie of God, hee began to imitate the example of his faith and vertuous life: whereupon by little and little hee being instructed by his wholesome exhortation, and leauing the blindnesse of his idolatrie, became at length a perfect christian. And when the forenamed clerke had lodged with him a certaine time, it was informed the wicked prince, that this good man and confessour of Christ (not yet condemned to death) was harbored in Albanus house, or euery where vnto him. Whereupon vpon immediatly be gaue in charge to the souldiers, to make more diligent inquisition of the matter. Who as soone as they came to the house of Alban the martyr, by and by putting on the apparell where with his ghest and matter was apparelled (that is, a garment at that time vsed, named caracalla) offered himselfe in the stead of the other to the souldiers: who binding him, brought him forthwith to the iudge. It fortuned that at that instant when blessed Alban was brought into the iudge they found the same iudge at the altars offering sacrifice vnto diuels, who as soone as he saw Alban, was straightwaies in a great rage, for that he would presume of his owne voluntarie will, to offer himselfe to perill, and giue himselfe a prisoner to the souldiers, for safegard of his ghest whom he harbored; and commanded him to be brought before the images of the diuels whom he worshipped, saying: For that thou haddest rather hid and conueyed away a rebell, then to deliuer him to the officers, and that (as a contemner of our gods) he should not suffer punishment and merit of his blasphemie: loke what punishment he ghuld haue had, thon for him shalt suffer the same, if I perceiue thee any whit to reuolt from our manner of worshipping. But blessed Alban, who of his owne accord had bewraied to the persecutors that he was a christian, feared not at all the menaces of the prince, but being armed with spirituall armour, openly pronounced that he would not obay his commandement. Then said the iudge: Of what stocke or kindred art thou come? Alban answered, What is that to you, of what stocke so euer I came of, if you desire to heare the veritie of my religion, I doe yee to wit that I am a christian, and apply my selfe altogether to that calling. Then said the iudge, I would know thy name, and see thou tell me the same without delay. Then said he, My parents named me Alban, and I worship and honor the true and liuing God, which hath created all the world. Then said the iudge straight with furie, If thou will inioy the felicitie of this present life, doe sacrifice: and that out of hand, to these mightie gods. Alban replied: These sacrifices which ye offer vnto diuels, can neither helpe them that offer the same, neither yet can they accomplish the desires and prayers of their supplicants: but rather shall they, that soeuer they be, that offer sacrifice to these idols, receiue for their meed euerlasting paine of hell fire. The iudge, when he heard these words, was passing angrie, and commanded the tormentors to whip this holy confessour of God, indeuoring to ouercome the constancie of his heart with stripes, which had preuailed nothing with words. And when he was cruellie beaten, yet suffered he the same patiently, nay rather ioyfully for the Lords sake. Then when the iudge saw that he would not with torments be ouercome, nor be reduced from the worship of christian religion, he commanded him to be beheaded.

The rest that followeth of this storie in the narration of Beda, as of diuing vp the riuer, as Alban went to the place of his execution; then of making a welspaing in the top of the hill, and of the falling out of the eies of him that did behead him (with such other prodigious miracles mentioned in his storie) because they seeme more legendlike then truthlike: againe, because I see no great profit nor necessitie in the relation thereof, I leaue them to the free iudgement of the reader, to thinke of them as cause shall moue him.

The like estimation I haue of the long storie, wherein is written at large a fabulous discourse of all the doings and miracles of S. Alban, taken out of the librarie of S. Albans, compiled (as there is said) by a certaine pagan, who (as he saith) afterward went to Rome, there to be baptised. But because in the beginning of prologue of the booke, the said writer maketh mention of the ruinous walles of the towne of Verolamium, containing the storie of Albanus, & of his bitter punishments which walles were then falling downe for age, at the writing of the said booke, as he saith: thereby it seemeth this storie to be written a great while after the martyrdome of Alban, either by a Britaine, or by an Englishman. If he were a Britaine, how then did the Latine translation take it out of the English tongue, as in the prologue he himselfe doth testifie? If he were an Englishman, how then did he go vp to Rome for baptisme, being a pagan, when he might haue bin baptised among the christian Britains more neare at home?

But among all other euidences and declarations sufficient to dispproue this legendarie storie of S. Alban, nothing maketh more against it, then the very storie it selfe: as where he bringeth in the head of the holy martyr, to speake vnto the people after it was smitten off from the bodie. Also where he bringeth in the angels going vp and comming down in a pillar of fire, and singing all the night long. Item, in the riuer which he saith S. Alban made drie, such as were drowned in the same before in the bottome, were found aliue. With other such like monkish miracles and grosse fables, wherewith these abbie monks were wont in times past to deceiue the church of God, and to beguile the whole world for their owne aduantage. Notwithstanding this I write not to any derogation of the blessed and faithfull martyr of God, who was the first that I did euer find in this realme, to suffer martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ. And worthie no doubt of condigne commendation, especially of vs here in this land; whose christian faith in the Lord, and charitie toward his neighbour, I pray God all we may follow. As also I wish moreouer that the storyes both of him, and of all other christian martyrs might haue been deliuered to vs simple as they were, without the admixture of all these abbeyelike additions of monkish miracles, wherewith they were wont to paint out the glorie of such saints to the moll, by whose offerings they were accustomed to receiue most aduantage.

As touching the name of the clerke mentioned in this storie, whom Alban receiued into his house, I find in the English stories to bee Amphibalus, although the Latine authors name him not, saue the same time flying into Wales, was also set from thence against to the same towne of Verolamium, otherwise called Verlancaster, where he was martyred, hauing his bellie opened, and made to run about a stake, while all his bowels were drawne out, then thrust in with swords and daggers: and at last was stoned to death, as the foresaid legend declareth.

Moreouer the same time with Alban suffered also two citizens of the foresaid citie of Verlancaster, whose names were Aaron and Julius: besides others, whereof a great number the same time no doubt did suffer, although our chronicles of their names doe make no rehearsall.

The time of the martyrdom of this blessed Alban and the other, seemeth to be about the second or third yeere of this tenth persecution, vnder the tyrannie of Diocletian, and Maximianus Herculius, bearing then the rule in England, about the yeere of our Lord two hundred and one, before the conuming of Constantius to his gouernment. Where by the way is to be noted, that this realme of Britaine being so ordered before, yet neuer was touched with any other of the nine persecutions, before this tenth persecution of Diocletian and Maximian. In which persecution our stories and Polychronicon doe record, that all christianitie almost in the whole Iland was destroyed, the churches subuerted, all bookes of the scripture burned, many of the faithfull both men and women were slaine: amongest whom the first and chiefe ringleader (as hath been said) was Albanus. And thus much touching the martyrs of Britaine. Now from England to returne againe vnto other countries, where this persecution did more vehemently rage: we will adde hereunto (the Lord willing) the stories of others, although not of all that suffred in this persecution (which were impossible, but of certaine most principall, whose singular constance in their strong torments are chiefly reuolued in latter histories: beginning first with Romanus the notable and admirable souldier and true seruant of Christ, whose historie set forth in Prudentius, both thus proceed: so lamentablie by him described, that it will be hard for any man almost with drie cheekes to heare it.

Pitilesse Galerius with his grand captaine Asclepiades violentlie inuaded the citie of Antioch, intending by force of armes to driue all christians to renounce vtterly their pure religion. The christians as God would, were at that time congregated together, to whom Romanus hastily ran, declaring that the wolues were at hand which would deuoure the christian flocke: but feare not (said he) neither let this imminent perill disturbe you my brethren. Brought was it to passe, by the great grace of God working in Romanus, that old men and matrons, fathers and mothers, young men and maidens were all of one will and mind, most readie to shed their bloud in defence of their christian profession. Word was brought vnto the captaine, that the rout of armed souldiers was not able to wrest the staffe of faith out of the hand of the armed congregation, and all by reason that one Romanus so mightily did incourage them, that they sticke not to offer their bodies, willingly glorifie to die for the name of their Christ. Seeke out that rebell (quoth the captaine) and bring him to me that he may answer for the whole sect. Apprehended he was, and bound as a sheepe appointed to the slaughter house, was presented to the emperor, who with wrathfull countenance beholding him, said: What? Art thou the author of this sedition? Art thou the cause why so many shall lose their liues? By the gods I sweare thou shalt smart for it, and first in thy flesh shalt thou suffer the paines, whereunto thou hast incouraged the hearts of thy fellowes. Romanus answered: Thy sentence O emperour I ioyfully imbrace, I refuse not to be sacrificed for my brethren, and that by as cruell means as thou maist inuent: and whereas thy souldiers were repelled from the christian congregation, that so happened, because they are not in idolaters and worshippers of diuels, to enter into the holy house of God, and to pollute the place of true prayer. Then Asclepiades wholie inflamed with this stout answer, commanded him to be trussed vp, and his bowels drawne out. The executioners themselues more pitifull in heart then the captaine, said: Not so sir, this man is of noble parentage, vnlawfull is it to put a noble man to so vnnoble a death. Scourge him then with whips (quoth the captain) with knaps of lead at the ends. In stead of teares, sighs and grones, Romanus sung psalmes all the time of his whipping, requiring them not to fauour him for nobilitie sake; Not the bloud of my progenitors (said he) but christian profession maketh me noble. Then with great power of spirit he inueied against the captaine, laughing to scorne the false gods of the heathen, with the idolatrous worshipping of them, affirming the true God that created heauen and earth, before whose iudiciall seat all nations shall appeare. But the wholsome words of the martyr were as oile to the fire of the captains furie. The more the martyr spake, the madder was he, in so much that he commanded the martyrs sides to be lanced with knines, vntill the bones appeared white againe. Soone am I, O captaine (quoth he martyr) not for that my flesh shall be thus cut and mangled, but for thy cause am I sorowfull, who being corrupted with damnable errours, seducest others. The second time hee preached at large the liuing God, and the Lord Iesus Christ his welbeloued sonne, eternall life through faith in his blond, expelling therewith the abomination of idolatrie, with a vehement exhortation to worship and adore the liuing God. At these words Asclepiades commanded the tormentors to skrike Romanus on the mouth, that his teeth being stricken out, his pronunciatio at leastwise might be impaired. The commandement was obayed, his face buffeted, his eie lids torne with their nails, his cheeks scorched with knines, the skin of his beard was plucked by little and little from the flesh, finallie his seemely face was wholly defaced. The meeke martyr said: I thanke thee, O captaine, that thou hast opened vnto me many mouths, whereby I may preach my Lord and Sauiour Christ. Looke how many woundes I haue, so many mouths I haue lauding and praysing God. The captaine astonished with this singular constancy, commanded them to ceasse from the tortures. He threatneth cruell fire, he reuileth the noble martyr, he blasphemeth God, saying: Thy crucified Christ is but a pestredaess God, the gods of the gentiles are of most antiquitie.

Heere against Romanus taking good occasion, made a long oration of the eternitie of Christ, of his humane nature, of the death and satisfaction of Christ for all mankind. Which done, he said: Giue me a child, O captaine, but seuen yeeres of age, which age is free from malice and other vices, wherewith riper age is commonly infected, and thou shalt heare what he will say. His request was granted. A pretie boy was called out of the multitude, and set before him. Tell me my babe (quoth the martyr) whether thou thinke it reason that we worship one Christ, and in Christ one father, or els that we worship infinit gods? Vnto whom the babe answered: That certainly, what soeuer it be that men affirme to be God, must needs be one: which with one, is one & the same: and in as much as this one is Christ, of necessitie Christ must be the true God; for that there be many gods, we children cannot beleeue. The captaine hereat cleane amazed, said: Thou young villaine and traitor, where and of whom learnedst thou this lesson? Of my mother (quoth the child) with whose milke I sucked in this lesson, that I must beleeue in Christ. The mother was called, and the gladly appeared. The captaine commanded the child to be hoysed vp, & scourged. The pitifull beholders of this pitilesse act, could not temper themselues from teares: the ioyfull and glad mother alone, flood by with drie cheeks: yea, she rebuked her tender babe for craning a draught of cold water. She charged him to thirst after the cup that the infants of Bethlem once dranke of, forgetting their mothers milke and paps: she willed him to remember little Isaac, who beholding the sword wherewith, and the altar whereon he should be sacrificed, willingly proffered his tender necke to the dint of his fathers sword. Whilest this counsell was in giuing, the butcherly tortor plucked the skin from the crowne of his head haire and all. The mother cried, Suffer my child, anon thou shalt passe to him that will adorne thy naked head with a crowne of eternall glorie. The mother counselleth, the child is counselled: the mother incourageth, the babe is incouraged, and received the stripes with smiling countenance. The captaine perceiuing the child inuincible, and himselfe vanquished, committeth the sillie soule, the blessed babe, the child vncherished, to the stinking pitlon, commanding the torments of Romanus to bee renewed and increased, as chiefe author of this euill.

Thus was Romanus brought forth again to new stripes and punishments, to be renewed & receiued vpon his old sores, in so much as the bare bones appeared, the flesh al tone awaie wherein no pity was sheweth, but the raging tyrant puffing out of his blasphemous mouth, like a mad man these words, cried out to the tormentors, saying:

Where is (quoth the captaine) where is your might?
What? are yee not able one bodie to spill?
Scant may it, so weake is it, stand vpright:
And yet in spite of vs, shall it liue still?

The griph with talen, the dog with his tooth,
Could soone ye dastards, this corps rent and teare:
He scorneth our gods in all that he dooth,
Cut, pricke, and pounce him, no longer forbeare.

Yea, no longer could the tyrant forbeare, but nedes he must draw nearer to the sentence of death. Is it painefull to thee (said he) to tarrie so long alue? A flaming fire doubt thou not shall be prepared for thee by and by, wherein thou and that boy thy fellow of rebellion shall be consumed into ashes. Romanus and the babe were led to the place of execution. As they laid hands on Romanus, he loked backe, saying: I appeale from this thy tyrannie, O Iudge vniust, vnto the righteous throne of Christ that ypright iudge: not because I feare thy cruell torments and merciless handlings, but that thy indgements may be knowne to be cruell and bloudie. Now when they were come to the place, the tormentor required the child of the mother, for he had taken it vp in her armes: and the onelie kissing it, deliuered the babe; Farewell, she said, my sweet childe. And as the hangman applied his sword to the babes necke, she sang on this manner:

All laud and praise with heart and voice,
O Lord we yeeld to thee:
To whom the death of all thy saints,
We know most deare to bee.

The innocents head being cut off, the mother wrapped it vp in her garment, and laid it to her breast. On the other side a mightie fire was made, whereinto Romanus was cast, who said, that he should not burne: whereuppon a great storme arose (if it be true), and quenched the fire. The captaine gaue in commandement that his tongue should be cut out. But was it plucked by the hard roots and cut off: neuertheless he spake, saying: He that speaketh Christ shall neuer want a tongue; thinke not that the voice that vttereth Christ, hath need of the tongue to be the minister. The captaine at this, halfe out of his wit, bare in hand that the hangman deceiued the sight of the people by some subtill sleight and craftie conueiance. Not so (quoth the hangman) if ye suspect my deed, open his mouth and diligently search the rots of his tongue. The captain at length being confounded with the fortitude and courage of the martyr, straitly commandeth him to be brought backe into the prison, and there to be strangled. Where his sorowfull life and paines being ended, he now inioyeth quiet rest in the Lord, with perpetuall hope of his miserable bodie to be restored againe with his soule into a better life: where no tyrant shall haue any power: Prudentius in hymnis de coronis martyrum.

Gordius was a citizen of Cesaria, a worthie souldier, and captaine of an hundred men. He in the time of extreame persecution, refusing any longer to execute his charge, did choose of his owne accord willing exile, and liued in the desert many yeeres a religious and solitarie life. But vpon a certaine day when a solemne feast of Mars was celebrated in the citie of Cesarea, and much people were assembled in the theatre to behold the games: he left the desert, and got him vp into the chiefe place of the theatre, and with a loud voice uttered this saying of the apostle: Behold I am found of them which sought me not, and to those which asked not for me haue I openlie appeared. By which words he let it to be vnderstood, that of his owne accord he came vnto those games. At this noise, the multitude little regarding the sights, loked about to see who it was that made such exclamation. As soone as it was knowne to be Gordius, and that the crier had commanded silence, hee was brought vnto the thirsiffe, who at that instant was present, and ordained the games. When he was asked the question who he was, from whence, and for what occasion he came thither, he tellethe the truth of euery thing as it was; I am come, saith he, to publish, that I set nothing by your decrees against the christian religion, but that I professe Iesu Christ to be my hope and safetie; and when I vnderstood with what cruelties ye handle other men, I tooke this as a fit time to accomplish my desire. The thirsiffe with these words was greatly moued, and reuengeth all his displeasure vpon poore Gordius, commanding the executioners to be brought out with scourges, while gibbets, and whatsoeuer torments els might be deuised. Wherevnto Gordius answered, saying, that it should be to him an hinderance and damage if he could not suffer and endure diuers torments and punishments for Christ his cause. The thirsiffe being more offended with this his boldnesse, commanded him to feele as many kind of torments as there were. With all which Gordius notwithstanding could not be mastered or ouercome: but lifting vp his eies vnto heauen, singeth this saying out of the psalmes: The Lord is my helper, I will not feare the thing that man can doe to me: and also this saying, I will feare none euill, because thou Lord art with me.

After this, he against himselfe prouoketh the extremity of the tormentors, and blameth them if they fauour him any thing at all. When the thirsiffe saw that hereby he could win but little, he goeth about by gentleneese and inticing words, to turne the stout and valiant mind of Gordius. He promiseth to him great and large offers if he will new Christ: as to make him a captaine of as many men as any other is, to giue him riches, treasure, and what other thing soeuer he desireth. But in vaine (as the prouerb is) pipeth the minstrell to him that hath no eares to heare, for he deriding the foolish madnesse of the magistrat saith, that it lieth not in him to place any in authoritie, which he worthie to haue a place in heauen. The magistrat with these words throughlie angred and vexed, prepareth himselfe to his condemnation. Whom after that he had condemned, he caused to be had out of the citie to be burnt. There run out of the citie great multitudes by heapes to see him put to execution, some take him in their armes, and lowlingly kisse him, him, perswading him to take a better way, & leaue himselfe and that with weeping teares. To whom Gordius answered, Weep not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which alwaies make warre against the christians; weep, I say, for them which prepare for vs a fire, purchasing hell fire for themselues in the day of vengeance: and cease off further, I pray you, to molest and disquiet my soule and mind. Truly (saith he) I am ready for the name of Christ, to suffer & endure a thousand deaths if need were. Some other came vnto him, which perswaded him to denie Christ with his mouth, and to keepe his conscience to himself. My tongue, saith he, which by the goodnes of God I haue, cannot be brought to denie the author and giuer of the same: for with the heart we beleeue vnto righteousnesse, and with the tongue we confesse vnto saluation. Many mo such like words he spake: but especially inciting to them such matter, whereby he might perswade the beholders to death, and to the desire of martyrdome. After all this, with a merrie and glad countenance, neuer changing so much as his colour, his twilingliе gaue himselfe to be burnt. Basilius in sermone in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

Genas martyr. Ex Simeon. Metaphrast. 10. sep.

Not much vnlike to the storie of Gordius is the storie also of Genas an Egyptian, who being likewise a souldier by his profession, in this persecution of Diocletian forsooke all, and went into the desert, where a long time he gaue himselfe to abstinence, watching, and meditation of the scriptures. At length returning againe to the citie Cotis, there in the open theatre, as the people were occupied vpon their spectacles or pastimes, he with a loud voice openly proclaimed himselfe to bee a christian, & vpon the same was brought to Pyrrhus the president: of whom he being demanded of his faith, made this answer: Conuenient it is that I should (saith he) confesse God, in whom to light and no darkenesse, for so much as Paul the preacher of truth hearteneth vs to right confidence, with mouth confession is giuen to saluation. After this the innocent martyr was most painefully pinched and cruciat with sundry punishments. In all which notwithstanding he declared a constant heart, and faith inuincible, hauing these words in his mouth being in the midst of his torments: There is nothing in my mind that can bee compared to the kingdome of heauen; neither is all the world, if it were weied in balance, able to bee conferred with the price of one sorle and said, Who is able to separate vs from the loue of Jesus Christ our Lord? shall affliction or anguish? And moreouer (said he) I haue thus learned of my Lord and my king, not to feare them which kill the bodie and haue no power to kill the soule, but to feare him rather, who hath power to destroy both bodie and soule in hell fire. To make the storie short, after manifold torments borne of him, and suffered, then the last sentence of death was vpon him pronounced, which was to be beheaded; Genas being then had to the place of execution said: I giue thee thanks my Lord God, which hast so accepted me to be found a partaker of thy precious death, and hast not giuen me to be deuoured of my fierce enemies, but hast made mee to remaine constant in thy pure faith vnto thy last ende. And so this blessed souldier fighting valiantly vnder the banner of Christ, lost his head, and wonne his soule. Simeon Metaphrast. rom. 5. The storie of fortie martyrs.

Basilius in a certaine sermon of fortie martyrs rehearseth this storie not vnworthie to be noted. There came, saith he, into a certaine place (of which place he maketh no mention) the emperours marshall or officer, with the edict which the emperour had set out against the christians, that whosoeuer confessed Christ, should after many torments suffer death. And first they did priuily sibeare certaine, which should detect and accuse the christians whom they had found out, or had laid wait for. Vpon this the sword, the gibbet, the wheele, and the whips were brought forth at the terrible sight whereof the hearts of all the beholders did shake and tremble. Some for feare did flee, some did stand in doubt what to doe: certaine were so terrified at the beholding of these engins and tormenting instruments, that they denied their faith. Some others began the game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agonie of martyrdome, but vanquished at length, by the intollerable paine of their torments, made shipwracke of their consciences, and lost the glorie of their confession. Among others, fortie there were at that time, young gentlemen, all souldiers, which after the marshall had shewed the emperors edict, and required of all men the obedience of the same freely and boldly of their owne accord confessed themselues to be christians, & declared to him their names. The marshal seeing that amazed at this their boldnes of speech, stood in doubt what was best to doe. Yet forthwith he goeth about to win them with faire words, admonishing them to consider their youth, neither that they should change a cruell and untimely death for a sweete and pleasant life: after that he promiseth them manie, and honorable offices in the emperors name. But they little esteeming all these things, brake forth into a long and bold oration, affirming that they did neither desire life dignitie, nor many, but onely the celestiall kingdome of Christ, saying further that they are ready for the loue and faith they haue in God, to endure the affliction of the whole, the crosse and the fire. The rude marshall being herewith offended, deuiseth a new kind of punishment. He shed out in the middle of the citie a certaine great pond, which lay full vpon the cold northerne wind, for it was in the winter time, wherin he caused them to be put all that night: but they being merrie and comforting one another, receiued this their appointed punishment, and said, as they were putting off their cloths: We put off (said they) now not our clothes, but we put off the old man corrupt with the deceit of concupiscence; we giue the thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparell wee may also put off by thy grace the sinfull man: for by meanes of the serpent wee once put him on, and by the meanes of Jesus Christ wee put him off. When they had thus said, they were brought naked into the place where they felt most vehement cold: in so much that all the parts of their bodies were starke and stiffe therewith. All one as it was day, they yet hauing breath, were brought into the fire, wherin they were consumed, & their ashes throwne into the flood. By chance there was one of the company more lively, and not so neere dead as the rest, of whom the executioners taking pitie, laid vnto his mother standing by, that they would saue his life. But she with her owne hands taking her sonne, brought him to the pile of wood, where the residue of his fellowes (crooked for cold) did lie ready to be burnt, & admonished him to accomplish the blessed iournie hee had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

A like storie of fortie martyrs, which were maried men, we reade of in Nicephorus and Sozomenus, lib. 9. ca. 2. which were killed likewise in a lake or pond at Sebastia, a towne of Armenia, vnder Licinius; if the storie bee not the same with this: Nicep. Sozom.

Another storie of fortie martyrs in a cold pond at Sebastia.

Tyrus, Joannes.

In this fellowship and company of martyrs cannot bee left out and forgot the storie of Tyrus. This Tyrus was a physicion borne in Alexandria, which liuing into Egypt, in the persecution of Diocletian, and Maximian, lead a solitarie life in Arabia, being much spoken of for his learning and miracles, vnto whose companie after a certaine time did Joannes borne in the citie of Sodis, beyond the riuer Euphrates, ioyne himselfe, leaning the souldiers life which before that time he had exercised. But whilest as yet the same persecution raged in a citie in Egypt called Cainope, there was cast into prison for the confession of their faith, a certaine godly christian woman, called Athanasia, and her three daughters, Theoctiste, Theodata, and Eudoxia: with whom Tyrus was well acquainted. At whose infirmities hee much fearing, accompanied with his brother John, came and visited them for their better confirmation: at which time Lucianus was chiefe captaine and lieutenant of Egypt, of whose wickednesse and cruelnie, especially against women and maidens, Athanasius maketh mention in his apologie. And in his epistle in those that lead a solitarie life. This Tyrus therefore and Joannes, being accused and apprehended of the heathen men, as by whose perswasions the maidens and daughters of Athanasia contumeliously despised the gods and the emperors religion, and could by no meanes be brought to doe sacrifice, were after the publication of their constant confession put to death by the sword: Athanasia also and her three daughters being condemned to death. This historie writeth Simeon Metaphrastes.

Tyrus to doe others good lost his life.

Sebastian being borne in the part of France called Gallia Narbonensis was a christian, and was lieutenant generall of the vaward of Diocletian the emperour, who also incouraged many martyrs of Christ by his exhortations vnto constancie, and kept them in the faith. He being therefore accused to the emperor, was commanded to be apprehended, and that he should be brought into the open field, where of his owne souldiers he was thrust through the body with innumerable arrowes, and after that his bodie was thrown into a lake or sinke. Ambrosius maketh mention of his Sebastian the martyr in his commentarie vpon the hundred and eighteenth psalme; and Simeon Metaphrastes amongst other martyrs that suffered with Sebastian numbreth also these following: Nicostratus with Zoe his wife, Tranquillinus with Martia his wife, Tragilinus, Claudius, Castor, Tiburtius, Castellius, Marcus, and Marcellinus, with others mo.

The storie of Sebastian martyr. A worthie example of a captaine to bee followed. Marcus, Marcellinus, Nicostratus with Zoe his wife. Tranquillinus with Martia his wife. Tragilinus, Claudius, Castor, Tiburtius, Castellius, martyrs.

Basilius in another sermon also maketh mention of one Barlaam being a noble and famous martyr, which abode all the torments of the executioners cuen to the point of death; which thing when the tormentors saw, they brought him and laid him vpon the altar, where they did vse to offer sacrifices to their idols, and put fire and frankincense into his right hand, wherein he had put some strength, thinking that the same his right hand, by the heat and force of the fire, would haue scattered the burning incense vpon the altar, and so haue sacrificed. But of that their hope the pestiferous tormentors were disappointed: for the flame eat round about his hand, and the same indured euen as though it had been couered with hot embers, when as Barlaam recited out of the psalmes this saying: Blessed is the Lord my God, which teacheth my hands to fight.

To this narration of Basilius touching the martyrdome of Barlaam, wee will annex consequently another storie of Ambrose. He making a certaine exhortation to certaine virgins, in the same oration commendeth the martyrdoms of Agricola and Vitalis, who suffered also in the same persecution vnder vnder Diocletian and Maximian (as they to affirme) at Bonone. This Vitalis was seruant to Agricola, who both together betweene themselues had made a compact to giue their liues with other martyrs for the name of Christ. Whereupon Vitalis being sent before of his maister to offer himselfe to martyrdome, fell sick into the hands of persecutors, who laboured about him by all meanes to cause him denie Christ. Which when he would in no case doe, but stoutly perstibed in the confession of his faith, they began to exercise him with all kind of torments, so vnmercifully that there was no whole skin left on all his bodie. So Vitalis in the middest of the agonie and painefull torments, after he had in a short prayer commended himselfe to God, gaue vp his life. After him the tormentors set vpon Agricola his master, whose vertuous manners and gentle conditions, because they were singularly well liked and knowne to the enemies, his suffering therfore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abiding the long delay and driuing off, and prouoking moreouer the aduersaries to quicker speed, at length was fastned vnto the crosse, and so finished his martyrdome, which he so long desired. Ambrof. in exhortatione ad virgines.

So lesse worthie of commemoration is the lamentable martyrdome of Cincentius, whose historie here followeth. This Cincentius was a Spaniard, and a Leuite most godly and vertuous, who at this time suffered martyrdome at Valence vnder Dacianus the president, as we may gather by Prudentius in his hymne Bergomensis in his supplement receiteth these words concerning his martyrdome, out of a certaine sermon of Saint Augustine: Our heart conceiued not a paine and fruitlesse sight (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies, but certainly a great sight and maruellous, and therewith singular pleasure receiued it, when the painefull passion of victorious Vincentius was read vnto vs. Is there any so heauie hearted, that will not be moued in the contemplation of this vnmooueable martyr, so manly, or rather so godlie, fighting against the craft and subtitie of that serpent, against the tyrannie of Dacianus, against the horrors of death, and by the mightie spirit of his God conquering all? But let vs in few words rehearse the degrees of his torments, though the paines thereof in many words cannot be expressed. First, Dacianus caused the martyr to be laid vpon the torture, and all the ioynts of his bodie to be distended and racked out, vntill they cracht againe. This being done in most extreame and cruell manner, all the members of his painfull and pitifull bodie were grieuously indented with deadly wounds. Thirdly, that his dolors and griefes might be augmented, they miserably wered his flesh with iron combs sharply filed. And to the end the tormentors might vomit out all their vengeance on the meeke & milde martyrs flesh, the tormentors themselues also were busie scourged at the presidents commandement. And lest his passion through want of paines might seeme imperfect or else to ease, they laid his bodie being all out of ioynt, on a grate of iron, which when they had opened with iron hooks, they seared it with fiery plates, with hot burning salt sprinkling the same. Last of all into a vile dungeon was this mightie martyr driuen, the floore whereof first was thicke spred with the sharpest shels that might be gotten, his feete then being fast locked in the stockes, there was he left alone without all worldlie comfort: but the Lord his God was with him, the holie spirit of God (whose office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his heart with ioy and gladnesse. But thou prepared a terrible rache (O cruel tyran) to deuouring lion) for the martyrs bed. The Lord shall make that bed soft and sweet vnto him. Rackest thou his bones and ioynts at aliuder? his bones, his ioynts, his haires are all numbred. Tormentest thou his flesh with mortall wounds? The Lord shall powre abundantlie into all his sores of his oile of gladnesse. Thy scraping combes, thy sharpe fleshhookes, thine hote searing irons, thy parched salt, thy stinking prison, thy cutting shelles, thy pinching stockes shall turne to this patient martyr to the best. All together shall worke contrary to thine expectation, great plentie of ioy shall he reape into the barne of his soule, out of this mightie harueit of paines that thou hast brought him into. Yea thou shalt prooue him Cincentius in deede: that is, a banquisher, a triumpher, a conqueror, subduing thy madnesse by his meekenesse, thy tyranny by his patience, thy manifold meanes of tortures by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he is plentifullie inriched.

The martyrs tormented to confesse the christians.

The comfort of the Lord vpon his saints.

The contrarie and brideright exhibited an example of an vnconstant christian.

In this catalogue or companie of such holy martyrs, as suffered in this forsaid tenth persecution, many mo and almost innumerable there be expressed in authors, beside them whom we haue hitherto comprehended. As Philoxonius, a man of noble birth and great possessions in Alexandria, who being perswaded by his friends to fauour himselfe, to respect his wife, to consider his children and familie, did not onely reiect the counsels of them, but also neglected the threats and torments of the iudge, to keepe the confession of Christ inuiolat vnto the death, and losing of his head: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 9. Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 9. of whom Eusebius beareth witnesse that he was there present himselfe.

Of like estate and dignitie was also Procopius in Palestina, who after his conuersion hyalse his images of siluer and gold, and distributed the same to the poore, and after all kind of torments, of racking, of cording, of tearing his flesh, of going and stabbing in, of fiering, at length had his head also smitten off, as witnesseth Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 15.

To this may be ioyned also Georgius a young man of Cappadocia, who stoutly inueying against the impious idolatry of the emperours, was apprehended and cast into prison, then tone with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, stretched with cords, after that his hands and feet with other members of his bodie being cut off, at last with a sword had his head cut off: Nicephorus ibid.

With these aforenamed adde also Sergius and Bacchius, Panthaleon a physitian in Nicomedia, mentioned in Supplem. lib. 8. Theodorus of the citie of Amasia in Hellespant, mentioned of Vincentius, lib. 3. Faustus a martyr of Egypt, mentioned of Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 5. Gereon with three hundred and eightene fellow martyrs, which suffered about Colour: Petr. de nat. lib. 9. cap. 49. Hermogenes the president of Athens, who being conuerted by the constancy of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, suffered also for the like faith. Item, Samonas, Gurias and Abibus, mentioned in Simeon Metaphrast. Pieron also with certaine of his confessors, vnder Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphrastes. Judes and Domnus, who suffered with many other martyrs aboue mentioned at Nicomedia, as recordeth Metaphrastes. Eustachius, Maximinus the emperors officers, whom Faustia the virgin in her torments conuerted. Also Chirsius, Lucius Callinicus, Apollonius, Philenton, Atlas, Leonides, with Arrianus president of Thebaide, Cyprianus likewise a citizen of Antioch, who after he had continued a long time a filthie magician or sorcerer, at length was conuerted and made a deacon, then a priest, and at last the bishop of Antioch. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 120. of whom partlie wee touched somewhat before. This Cyprian with Justina a virgin suffered among the martyrs. Item Glicerius at Nicomedia, Felix a minister, Fortunatus, Achilleus, deacons in the citie of Valent. Arthemius of Rome, Cyriacus deacon to Marcellus the bishop, Carpophorus priest at Thuscia, with Abundus his deacon. Item Claudius, Sirinus, Antoninus which suffered with Marcellinus the bishop: Sabel. Enead. 7. lib. 8. Cucufatus in the citie Barcinona. Felix bishop of Aquila, with Audaxius and Tamarius his priest, Fortunatus and Septimius his readers, who suffered in the city Venusina vnder Diocletian: Bergom. lib. 8.

Sergius, Bacchius, Damphaleon, Theodorus, Faustus, Gereon, with 318. fellowes. Hermogenes, Menas a man of Athens, Eugraphus. Saimonas, Surias, Abibus, Pieron with his fellowes, Judes, Domnus. Eustachius, Maximinus, Lucius, Callinicus, &c. as is in the text.

It were too long a trauell or trouble to recite all and singuler names of them particularly, whom this persecution of Diocletian did consume. The number of whom being almost infinit, is not to be collected or expressed. One storie yet remaineth not to be forgotten of Cassianus, whose pitifull trage-rie being described of Prudentius we haue here inserted, vending metre for metre, as followeth.

The lamentable storie of Cassianus martyr. Ex Aurel. Prudent. lib. peristephan.

THrough Forum, as in Italie, I passed once to Roome,
Into a church by chance came I, and stood fast by a toome.
Which church sometime a place had been, where causes great in law
Were scand and tried, and iudgement giuen, to keep brute men in awe.
This place Sylla Cornelius, first built, he rais'd the frame;
And call'd the same Forum; and thus, that citie tooke the name.
In prayer feruent as I stood, casting mine eie aside,
A picture in full pirious mood (imbrude) by chance I spide:
A shotshard wounded marks full bad, all mangled, rent, and torne;
The skin appear'd as though it had been iagd and prickt with thorne.
A scull of pictured boies did band, about that lothsome sight,
That with their sharpned gads in hand, his members thus had dighte.
These gads were but their pens, wherewith their tables written were,
And such as scholars often sith, vnto the scholes doe beare.
Whom thou seest here thus pictur'd sit, and frimeke doest behold,
No fable is, I doe thee wit, vnaskt a prelat told
That waike thereby: but doth declare, the historie of one,
Which written, would good record beare, what faith was long agone.
A skilfull schoolemaster this was, that here sometime did teach:
The bishop once of Brixia was, and Christ full plaine did preach.
He knew well how to comprehend, long talke in a few lines:
And it at length how to amend, by order and by times.
His sharpe precepts and his sterne looks, his beardles boies did feare:
When hate in heart (yet for their bookes) full deadlie they did beare.
The child that learnes, I doe yee weet, termes aie his tutor crule:
No discipline in youth seemes sweet, count this a common rule.
Behold the raging time now here, oppressing so the faith,
Doth persecute Gods children deere and all that Christ bewraith.
This truste teacher of the swarme, profest the liuing God:
The chiefe good thing they count their harme, perhaps he stakes his (rod.
What needs (aske the parties) is he I beare so loud?
Vnto our youth an instrument, they say, and low they bowd.
Go bring the caitiffe foorth, he bids, and make no long delay:
Let him be set the boies amids: they doe as he doth say.
Let him be giuen vnto them all, and let them haue their will,
To doe to him what spite they shall, so that they will him kill.
Euen as they list let them him fray, and him deride so long,
Till weariuesse prouoke their play, no longer to prolong.
Let them I say then vncontroll'd, both pricke and scorch his skin:
To bathe their hands let them be bold, in the hot bloud of him.
The scholars hereat make great game, it pleaseth them full well:
That they may kill and quench the flame, they thought to them a hell.
They bind his hands behind his backe, and naked they him strip:
In bodkin wise at him they nacke, they laugh to see him skip.
The priuie hate that each one hath in heart, it now appeares:

They

They powre it foorth in gawly wrath, they wreak them of their teares:
Some call great flames, some other breakes, their tables on his face:
Lo here thy Latine and thy Greeke (oh barren boies of grace)
The blood runs downe his cheeks, and doth imbrue the boxen leams:
Where notes by thē were made (though loth) & wel proponed theams.
Some whet, some sharpe their pensels points, feruing to write withall:
Some other gage his flesh and ioynts, as with a pointed nall.
Sometime they pricke, sometime they rent, this worthie martyrs flesh:
And thus by turnes they doe torment this constellar afresh.
Now all with one consent on him their bloudie hands they lay:
To lee the blood from him to lan, drop downe they make a play.
More painefull was the pricking pang, of children oft and thicke,
Then of the bigger boies that clang, and neere the heart did thicke.
For by the reebl strokes of th'one, death was denied his will:
Of smart that made him wo begon, he had the better skill.
The deeper strokes the great ones gaue, and neerer touch't the quick:
The weleomer he thought the paine, whom longing death made sick.
God make you strong, he saith, I pray, God giue you might at will:
And what y want in yeeres I lay, let cruelte fulfil.
But whilst the hangman breatheth still, and me with you do match,
That weakely worke, yet want no will, my life for to dispatch;
My griefs wax great: what gron'st thou now sir lad some of them againe,
In schoole, adsiled well are th'ou, whom there thou purst to paine?
Behold we pay, and now make good as many thousand fripes,
As when with weeping eies we flood, in danger of thy gripes.
Art thou now angrie at thy hand, that alwaies crieds write, write,
And neuer wouldst that our right hand should rest in quiet plite?
We had forgot our playing times, thou churle deniedst vs oft:
We now but pricke and point our lines, and thus they grin and scof.
Correct good sir your viewed verse, it ought a miss there be:
Now we thy power and then rehearse, that haue not marked thee.
Christ pitye thē sir hangman, with torments torne and tired,
Commands his heart to break euen then, and life that was then hired,
He yeeldy again to him that gaue, and thus he makes exchange:
Immortall for mortall to haue, that in such paine did range.
Thus saith he, that this picture, thou so beholdst, oh gheft,
Of Cassianus martyr pure, doth preach I doe protest.
If thou prudence haue ought in store, in peece to dwelle,
In hope of iust reward therefore, now shew thy louing zeale:
I could not but entreate, I weepe, his tombe I doe imbrace:

Cassianus martyr.

No lesse admirable then wonderfull was the constancie also of women and maidens, who in the same persecution gaue their bodies to the torments, and their liues for the testimonie of Christ. with no lesse boldnes of spirit, then did the men themselues aboue specified, to whom how much more insertion they were in bodilie strength, so much more worthie of praise they be, for their constant standing. Of whom some examples here wil mind (Christ willing) to infer, such as in our stories y chanceles seeme most notable, first beginning with Eulalia, whose storie we haue taken out of Prudentius as followeth.

In the west part of Spaine called Portingall, is a citie great and populous, named Emerita, wherein dwelt and was brought vp a virgin, borne of noble parentage, whose name was Eulalia: which Emerita although for the apt situation thereof, was both rich and famous, yet more adorned and famous was the renowme thereof, by the martyrdome, bloud, and sepulchre of this blessed virgin Eulalia. Twelue yeres of age was she, and not much aboue, when shee refused great and honorable offers in mariage, as one not stirred, nor yet delighting in courtly dalliance, neither yet taking pleasure in purple and gorgious apparell, or else in pretious balmes, or costlie ornaments and iewels: but forsaking and despising all these and such like pompous allurements, then vnloued thee her selfe most busie in preparing her iournie to her hoped inheritance, and heauenly patronage. Which Eulalia as thee was modeft and discreet in behauiour, sage and sober in conditions, so was shee also wittie and sharpe in answering her enemies. But when the furious rage of perfecution inkored her to vowe her selfe amongst Gods children in the houshold of faith, and when the christians were commanded to offer incense and sacrifice to diuels or dead gods: then began the blessed spirit of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a prompt and readie wit, thought forthwith (as a couragious captaine) to giue a charge vpon this so great and disordered a battell: & so thee fillie woman, powring out the bowels of her innocent heart before God, more prouoketh thereby the force and rage of her enemies against her. But the godlie care of her parents, fearing lest the willing mind of the damsell, so readie to die for Christs cause, might make her guilte of her owne death bid her and kept her close at their house in the countrie, being a great way out of the citie. Shee yet misliking that quiet life, as also detesting to make such delay, softly stealeth out of the doores (no man knowing thereof) in the night; and in great hast leauing the common way, openeth the hedge gaps, and with weary feet God knoweth passed through the thornie and bitrie places, accompanied yet with spirituall gard: and although darke and dreadfull was the silent night, yet had shee with her the Lord and guider of light. And as the children of Israel comming out of Egypt, had by the mightie power of God, a cloudie piller for their guide in the day, and a flame of fire in the night; so had this godly virgin, trauelling in this darke night, when thee flying and forsaking the place where all filthie idolatrie abounded, and hastened her heauenlie iourny, was not oppressed with the dreadfull darknesse of the night: but yet thee before the day appeared in this her speedie iournie, with her selfe considered and mused on a thousand matters and more.

Eulalia martyr.

In the morning betime, with a bold courage shee goeth vnto the tribunall or iudgement seat, and in the midst of them all with a loud voice crying out, said: I pray you what a shame is it for you thus rashly and without aduisement to destroy and kill mens soules, and to throw their bodies alme & gainst the rocks, and cause them to deny the omnipotent God? Would you know (O you vnfortunat) what I am? Behold, I am one of the christians, an enemie to your diuellish sacrifices. I spurne your idols vnder my feet. I confesse God omnipotent with my heart and mouth. Iliis, Apollo, and Venus, what are they? Mariminus himselfe, what is he? The one a thing of nought, for that they be the workes of mens hands; the other but a cast away, because he worshipped the same worke. Therefore friuolous are they both, and both not worthie to bee set by. Mariminus is a lord of substance, and yet he himselfe falleth downe before a stone, and boweth the honour of his dignitie vnto those that are much inferior to his vassals. Why then doth he oppresse to tyrannicall lie, more worthie stomachs and courages then himselfe? He must needs be a good guide and an vpright iudge, which feedeth vpon innocent blood: and breathing in the bodies of godlie men, both rent and teare their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in defroying and subuerting the faith.

Eulalia disputeth with the heathen iudge.

The godly confession of Eulalia.

Goe to therefore thou hangman, burne, cut and mangle thou these earthie members. It is an easie matter to breake a brittle substance, but the inward mind shalt thou not hurt for any thing thou canst doe. The peeter then of indge, with these words of hirs, set in a great rage, saith, hangman take her and pull her out by the haire of her head, and torment her to the vttermoft: let her feele the power of our countrie gods, and let her know what the imperiall gouernment of a prince is. But yet, O thou sturdie girle, faine would I haue thee (if it were possible) before thou die, to reuoke this thy wicked rnelle. Behold what pleasures thou maieft inioy by the honorable house thou canieft of, thy fallen house and progenie followeth thee to death with lamentable teares, and the beanie nobilitie of thy kindred maketh dolefull lamentation for thee. What meaneft thou? Wilt thou kill thy selfe so young a flower, and so neere the honorable mariages and great dolonies thou maift inioy? Doth not the glittering and golden pomp of the lode bo moue thee? Doth not the reuerend parle of thine ancestors pricke thee? Whom is it not, but that this thy rathnesse and weakines grieueth? Behold here the furniture readie prepared for thy terrible death: Either thalt thou be beheaded with this sword, or else with the fe wild beasts thalt thou be pulled in peeces, or else thou being caft into the fierie flames, thalt be (although lamentable brwailed of thy friends & kinsfolks) consumed to ashes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to escape all this? If thou wilt but take and put with thy fingers a little salt and incense into the censers, thou thalt be deliuered from all these punishments. To this Eulalia made no answere, but being in a great furie, thee spitteth in the tyrants face, thee throweth downe the idols, and spurneth abrode with her feet the heape of incense prepared to the censers. Then without further delay the hangmen with both their strengths took her, and pulled one vpon from another, and with the talons of wild beasts scotched her sides to the hard bones: the all this while singing and praising God in this wise; Behold O Lod I will not forget thee: what a pleasure is it for them O Christ y remember thy triumphant victories, to attaine vnto these high dignities, and still calleth vpon that holy name, all stained and imbrued with her owne bloud. This sung she with a bold stomach, neither lamentingle nor yet weepinghe, but being glad and merrie, abandoning from her mind all beauinesse and grefe, when as out of a warme fountaine her mangled members with freth bloud bathed her white & faire skin. Then pecred they to flaff and finall torment, which was not onely the gozing and wounding of her mangled bodie with the iron grate and hurdle, and terrible harowing of her flesh, but burned on euery side with flaming torches her tormented breffs & sides: her haire hanging about her shoulders in two parts diuided (wherwith hir shamefaft chaftity and virginitie was couered) reached downe to the ground. But when the cracking flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her haire, and reacheth the crolune of her head: then thee desiring swift death, opened her mouth and swallowed the flame, and so rested she in peace.

Eulalia put in the fire. The end and martyrdome of Eulalia.

The said Prudentius and Ado, also Equilinus admonet. writing of a white doue flying out of her mouth at her departing, and of the fire quenched about her bodie, also of her bodie couered miraculoulie with snow, with other things more, whereof let euery reader vse his owne iudgement.

Ex Prudent.

As ye haue heard now the christian life and constant death of Eulalia, much worthie of praise and commendation: so no lesse commendation is worthilie to be giuen to blessed Agnes, that constant damsell and martyr of God, who as she was in Rome of honorable parents begotten, so lieth there as honorably intombed & buried. Which Agnes, for her vnspotted and undefiled virginitie, deserueth no greater praise, and commendation then for hir willing death and martyrdome. Some writers make of hir a long discourse, more in my iudgement then necessary, reciting diuers and sundrie strange miracles by hir done in the processe of hir history; which partly for tedioulnesse, partly for the doubtfulnesse of the author; (whom some father vpon Ambrose) partly for the strangenes & incredibilitie therof I omit, being satisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of hir, as followeth: She was (saith he) young and not mariageable, when first she being dedicated to Christ, boldly resisted the wicked edicts of the emperor; lest that through idolatry she might haue yeelded and so forsaken the holy faith; but yet first proued by diuers and sundrie policies to induce hir to the same (as now with the flattering a inticing words of the iudge, now with the threatnings of the scorning executioner) stood notwithstanding stedfast in all courageous strength: and willingly offered hir body to hard and painfull taments, not refusing (as she said) to suffer what soeuer it should bee, yea though it were death it selfe. Then said the cruell tyrant: If to suffer paine and torment be so easie a matter and lightly regarded of thee, and that thou accountest thy life nothing worth, yet the shame of thy dedicated or vowed virginitie is a thing more regarded I know, and esteemed of thee. Wherefore this is determined, that vnlesse thou wilt make obeisance to the altar of Iphis, and asse forgiuenesse of hir for thy arrogancy, thou shalt be sent or abandoned to the common stewes or brothel-house. Agnes the virgin with more spirit & vehemencie inueieth against both Minerua and hir virginitie: the youth in skuls flocke and run together, and craue that they may haue Agnes their vndiuious prey. Then, saith Agnes, Christ is not forgetfull of those that be his, that he will suffer violently to be taken from them their golden and pure chastitie, neither will he leaue them so destitute of helpe: he is alwaies at hand and readie to fight for such as are shamefall and chall virgins, neither sufferreth he his gifts of holy integritie or chastitie to bee polluted. Thou shalt, saith thee, willingly bath thy sword in my blood if thou will, but thou shalt not defile my body with filthie lust for any thing thou canst do. She had no sooner spoken these words, but pee commanded that she should bee set naked at the corner of some street (which place at that time, such as were strumpets commonly vsed) the greater part of the multitude both for owing and shaming to see so shameleste a sight, went their wales, some turning their heads, some hiding their faces. But one amongst the rest, with vncircumcised eyes beholding the damsell, and that in such oppzobious wise, beheld a flame of fire like into a flash of lightening falleth vpon him, & rifleth his eyes out of his head, whereupon hee fo dead falling into the ground, sprafleth in the kennell durt, whose companions taking him vp, and carying him away, bewailed him as a dead man: but the virgin for this his miraculous deliuerie from the danger & shame of that place, singeth praises to God & Christ.

Eulalia stirreth and prayeth God in hir torments.

There be (saith Prudentius) that report, how that the being desired to pray vnto Christ for the partie, that a little before was with fire from heauen for his incontinencie was stricken, was restored by hir prayer both vnto his perfect health and sight. But blessed Agnes after that she had climed this hir first greese and step vnto the heauenly palace, forthwith began to climbe another: for furie ingendring now the mortall wrath of hir bloudie enemie, wringing his hands crieth out, saying: I am vndone, O thou the executioner draw out thy sword, and do thine office that the emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes saw a sturdie and cruell fellow (to behold) stand behind hir, or approching neere to hir with a naked sword in his hand: I am now gladder, saith she, and reioyce, that such a one as thou being a stout, fierce, strong, and sturdy soulder art come, then one more feeble, weake, and faint should come, or else any other yong man sweetly inhabited, and wearing gay apparell that might deliroy me with funerall shame. This, euen this is hee, I now confesse, that I beleue. I will make haft to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing desire. I will willingly receiue into my paps the length of his sword, and into my breaft will drawe the force thereof euen vnto the hilts, that thus I being married vnto Christ my spouse, may surmount and escape all the darkenesse of this world, that reacheth euen vnto the skies. O eternall gouernour vouchsafe to open the gates of heauen once that I may go against all the inhabitants of the earth, and receiue (oh Christ) my soule that seeketh thee. Thus speaking and kneeling vpon hir knees, she prayeth vnto Christ aboue in heauen, that hir neeke might bee the readier for the sword, now hanging ouer the same. The executioner then with his bloodie hand finished hir hope, and at one stroke cutteth off hir head, and by such short and swift death doth hee present hir of the paine thereof.

The historie of Katharine martyr. All things be true and probable that be written of Saints liues.

I haue often times before complained, that the stories of saints haue been powdred and sauced with diuers untrue additions and fabulous inuentions of men, who either of a superstitious deuotion, or of a subtill practise, haue so mingle-mangled their stories and lines, that almost nothing remaineth in them simple and vncorrupt, as in the vsuall portues wont to be read for daily seruice is manifeft and euident to bee seene, wherein few legends there be able to abide the touch of histo-rie, if they were throughly tried. This I write vpon the occasion especially of good Katharin, whom now I haue in hand. In whom although I nothing doubt, but in hir life was great holinesse, in hir knowledge excellencie, in hir death constancie: yet that all things be true that be found of hir, neither dare I affirme, neither am I bound so to thinke: so many strange fictions of hir be fained diuerlie of diuers writers, whereof some seeme incredible, some also impudent. As where Petrus de natalibus writing of hir conuersion declareth, how that Katharine slee- Petrus de natalibus, lib. 10.

ping before a certaine picture or table of the crucifix, Christ with his mother Mary appeared vnto hir: and when Marie had offered hir vnto Christ to be his wife, he first refused hir for hir blackneffe. The next time, she being baptised, Marie appearing againe, offred hir to marrie with Christ, who then being liked, was espoused to him & married, hauing a golden ring the same time put on hir finger in hir sleepe, &c. Bergomenlis writeth thus, that becatse she in the sight of the people openly resisted the emperor Maxentius to his face, and rebuked him for his cruelte, therefore she was commanded and commanded vpon the same to prison: which semeth hitherto not much to digresse from truth. It followeth moreouer, that the same night an angell came to hir, comforting & exhorting hir to be strong and constant vnto the martyrdome, for that she was a maid accepted in the sight of God, and that the Lord would be with hir, to whose honor she did fight, and that he would giue hir a mouth and wisdome which his enemies should not withstand: with many other things more which I here omit. As this also I omit concerning the fifte philosophers, whom she in disputation conuicted, and conuerted vnto our religion, & died martyrs for the same. Item of the conuerting of Porphyrius himself to Parentius & Faustina the emperors wife. At length (saith the storie) after the proued the rache, and the force thereof cutting wheles, hauing at last hir head cut off with the sword, so she finished hir martyrdome, about the yeere of our Lord, as Antoninus affirmeth) three hundred & ten. Symeon Metaphrastes, writing of hir, discourseth the same more at large, to whom they may resort which couet more therein to be satisfied.

Katharine restrayned by the emperor openly to his face.

Katharine committed to prison and comforted by an angell.

Among the workes of Basil a certaine oration is extant concerning Iulitta the martyr, who came to hir martyrdome (as he witnesseth) by this occasion. A certaine auaricious and greedie person of great authozite, and (as it may appeare) the emperors deputie, or other like officer (who abused y decrees and lawes of the emperor against the christians, to his owne lucre and gaine) violently take from this Iulitta all hir goods, lands, cattels, and seruants, contrarie to all equitie and right. She made hir pitifull complaint to the iudges: a day was appointed when the cause should be heard. The spoiled woman and the spoiling extortioner God both together, the woman lamentable declareth hir cause, the man frowningly beholdeth hir face. When she had proued that of god right the goods were hir owne, and that wrongfully he had dealt with hir: the wicked and bloodthirstie wretch preferring his worldly substance, before the precious substance of a christian body, affirmed hir action to be of no force, for that the was as an outlaw in not seruing the emperors gods, since hir christian faith hath been firft abiured. His allegation was allowed as good and reasonable. Thereupon incense and fire were prepared for hir to worship the gods, which vnlesse shee would doe, neither the emperors protection, nor lawes, nor indgement, nor life should shee inioy in that common weale. When this barbarous bo of the Lord heard these words, thee said; Farewell life, welcome death; farewell riches, welcome pouerte. All that I haue, if it were a thousand times more, would I rather lose, then to speake one wicked and blasphemous word against God my creator. I yeld thee thankes most heartie, O my God, for this gift of grace, that I can contemne and despise this fraile and transitorie world, esteeming christian profession aboue all treasures. Hereofoth when any question was demanded, hir answere was: I am the seruant of Iesus Christ. Hir kindred & acquaintance flocking to hir, admertised hir to change hir mind. But that vehemently shee refused, with detestation of their idolatrie. Forthwith the iudge with the sharpe sword of sentence, not onely cutteth off all hir gods and possessions, but iudgeth hir also to the fire vnleft cruelly. The loyfull martyr imbraceth the sentence as a thing most sweete and delectable. She addresseth hirselfe to the flames, in countenance, gesture, and words, declaring the ioy of hir heart, coupled with singular constancie. To the women beholding hir, sententiously she spake: Stricke not, O sisters, to labour and trauell after true pietie and godlinesse. Cease to accuse the fragilitie of femenine nature. What? are not wee created of the same matter that men are? Yea, after Gods image and similitude are we made, as liuely as they. Not flesh onely God vsed in the creation of the woman, in signe and token of hir infirmitie and weaknesse, but bone of bones is she, in token that she must be strong in the true and liuing God, all false gods forsaken; constant in faith, all fidelitie renounced; patient in aduersitty, all worldly ease refused. Stay weary (my deere sisters) of your liues led in darkenesse, and bee in loue with my Christ, my God, my redeemer, my comforter, which is the true light of the world. Perswade your selues, or rather bee ye perswaded, that there is a him, perswading him to take a better way, & save himselfe and that with weeping teares. To whom Sophius answered, Weep not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which assaile & make war against the christians; weep, I say, for them which prepare for us a fire, purchasing hell fire for themselues in the day of vengeance: and cease off further, I pray you, to molest and disquiet my soule mute. Euip saith he) I am ready for the name of Christ, to suffer & endure a thousand deaths if need were. Some other came unto him, which perswaded him to denie Christ with his mouth, and to keepe his conscience to himself. My tongue, saith he, which by y goodnes of God I have, cannot be brought to denie the author and giuer of the same: for with the heart we believe unto righteousnesse, and with the tongue we confesse unto salvation. Many no such like words he spake: but especially uttering to them such matter, whereby he might perswade the beholders to death, and to the desire of martyrdome. After all which, with a merrie and glad countenance, never changing so much as his colour, he willingly gave himselfe to be burnt. Basilius in sermone in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

Not much unlike to the storie of Sosbius is the storie also of Menas an Egyptian, who being likewise a soulder by his profession, in this persecution of Diocletian forsake all, and went into the desert; where a long time he gave himselfe to abstinence, watching, and meditation of the scriptures. At length returning again to the citie Cotyæa, there in the open theatre as the people were occupied upon their spectacles or pastimes, he with a loud voice openly proclaimed himselfe to bee a christian, & upon the same was brought to Pyrrhus the president of whom hee being demanded of his faith, made this answer: Concerning it is that I should saith he) confesse God, in whom is light and no darknesse, for so much as Paul doth teach that with heart we believe to righteousnesse, with mouth confession is given to salvation. After this the innocent martyr was most painefully pinched and cruciat with sundry punishments. All which notwithstanding he declared a constant heart, and faith invincible, having the scriptures in his mouth setting in the midst of his torments: There is nothing in my mind that can bee compared to the kingdome of heaven; neither is all the world, if it were weied in balance, able to become ferred with the price of one soule and saie, Who is able to separate us from the love of Jesus Christ our Lord? shall affliction or anguish? And no more (said he) I have thus learned of my Lord and my king not to feare them which kill the bodie and have no power to kill the soule, but to feare him rather, who hath power to destroy both bodie and soule in hell fire. To make the storie short, after manifold torments borne of him, and suffered, when the last sentence of death was upon him pronounced, which was to be beheaded; Means being then had to the place of execution said: I give the thanks my Lord God, which hast so accepted me to be found a partaker of thy precious death, and hast not given me to be devoured of my fierce enemies, but hast made me to remaine constant in thy pure faith unto this my last end. And so this blessed soldier fighting valiantly under the banner of Christ, lost his head, and wonne his soule. Simeon Metaphrast. tom. 5. In the which author there followeth a long narration of the miracles of this holy man, which here for prolixitie I doe omit.

Basilius in a certaine sermon of his the martyrs thereof, this storie not untowardly to be noted. There came, saith he, into a certaine place (of which place he maketh no mention) the emperors marshall or officer, with the edict which the emperour had set out against the christians, that whosoever confessed Christ, should after many torments suffer death. And first they did privily subborne certaine, which should detect and accuse the christians whom they had found out, or had laid wait for. Upon this the famous, the gilded, the noble, and eighteenth pilgrim, brought forth at the terrible sight whereof the hearts of all the beholders did shake and tremble. Some for feare did flie, some did stand in doubt what to doe: certaine were so terrified at the beholding of these engins and tormenting instruments, that they denied their faith. Some others began the game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agonie of martyrdome, but vanquished at length, by the intolerable paine of their torments, made shipwracke of their consciences, and lost the glorie of their confession. Among others, forth there were at that time, young gentlemen, all souldiers, which after the marshall had the bed the emperors edict, and required of all men the obedience of the same, fresh and lolde of their olune accord confessed themselues to be christians, & declared to him their meanes. The marshal seme what amazed at this their boldnes of speech, stunderth in doubt what was best to doe. Pet forthwith he goeth about to win them with faire words, admiralling them to consider their youth, neither that they should change a cruell and unmerciful death for a quiet and pleasant life: after that he promiseth them manie, and honorable offices in the emperors name. But they little esteeming all these things, brake forth into a long and bold oration, affirming that they did neither desire life dignitie, nor manie, but onely the celestiall kingdome of Christ, saying further that they are ready for the love and faith they have in God, to indure the affliction of the whole: the crosse and the fire. The rude marshall being herewith offended, beat fetch a new kind of punishment. He shed out in the middle of the citie a certaine great pond, which lay full upon the cold northerne wind, for it was in the winter time, wherin he caused them to be put all that night: but they being merrie and comforting one another, received this their appointed punishment, and said, as they were putting off their clothes (The put off shall they) now not our clothes, but we put off the old man, corrupt with the deceit of concupiscence; we give the thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparell wee may also put off by thy grace the sinfull man: for by means of the serpent wee once put him on, and by the means of Jesus Christ wee have put him off. When they had thus said, they were brought naked into the place where they felt most vehement cold: in so much that all the parts of their bodies were starke and stiffe therewith. Alsoone as it was day, they yet having breath, were brought into the fire, wherin they were consumed, & their ashes throwne into the flood. By chance there was one of the company more lively, and not so neere dead as the rest, of whom the executioners taking pitie, laid unto his mother standing by, that they would save his life. But she with her owne hands taking her sonne, brought him to the pile of wood, where the residue of his fellowes (crooked for cold) did lie readie to be burnt, & admonished him to accomplish the blessed journie hee had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

A like storie of twelve martyrs, which were married men, we reade of in Nicephorus and Sozomenus, lib. 9. ca. 2. which were killed likewise in a lake or pond at Sebastia, a towne of Armenia, under Licinius; if the storie bee not the same with this: Nicep. Sozom.

In this fellowship and company of martyrs cannot bee left out and forgot the storie of Cyprus. This Cyprus was a physician borne in Alexandria, which flying into Egypt, in the persecution of Diocletian, and Maximian, lead a solitarie life in Arabia, being much spoken of for his learning and miracles, unto whose companie after a certaine time did Joannes borne in the citie of Dacia, beyond the river Euphrates, ioyne himselfe, leaving the soulders life which before that time he had exercised. But whilest as yet the same persecution raged in a citie in Egypt called Caliope, there was cast into prison for the confession of their faith, a certaine godly christian woman, called Aglaonia, and her three daughters, Theoctiste, Theodata, and Eudoxia: with whom Cyprus was well acquainted. At whose infirmities he much feared, and therefore went with his brother John, came and visited them for their better confirmation: at which time Licinius was chiefe captaine and lieutenant of Egypt, of whose wicked nesse and cruelnie, especially against women and maidens, Athanasius maketh mention in his apologies, and in his epistle to those that lead a solitarie life. This Cyprus Eutrope and Joannes, being accused & comprehended of the heathen men, as by whose perswasions the maidens and daughters of Athanasia contemptuously despised the gods and the emperors religion, and could by no means be brought to doe sacrifice, were after the publication of their constant confession put to death by the sword: Athanasia also and her said daughters being condemned to death. This history writeth Simeon Metaphrastes.

Sebastian being borne in the part of France called Gallia Narbonensis was a christian, and was lieutenant generall of the ward of Diocletian the emperour, who also incouraged many martyrs of Christ by his exhortations unto constancie, and kept them in the faith. He being therefore accused to the emperor, was commanded to be apprehended, and that he should be brought into the open field, where of his olune souldiers he was thrall through the body with innumerable arrowes, and after that his bodie was thrlowne into a lake or sinke. Ambrosius maketh mention of this Sebastian the martyr in his sermon of Easter day, and eighteenth pilgrim: and Simeon Metaphrastes amongst other martyrs that suffered with Sebastian numbereth also these following: Nicostratus with Zoe his wife, Tranquillinus with Partia his wife, Tragilnus, Claudius, Castor, Tiburtius, Castellius, Marcus, and Marcellinus, with others mo.

Basilius maketh another also maketh mention of one Varlaam being a noble and famous martyr, which abede all the torments of the executioners cuen to the point of death; which thing when the tormentors saw, they brought him and laid him upon the altar, where they did vse to offer sacrifices to their idols, and put fire and frankincense into his right hand, wherein he had yet some strength, thinking that the same his right hand, by the heat and force of the fire, would have scattered the burning incense upon the altar, and so have sacrificed. But of that their hope the pestiferous tormentors were disappointed: for the flame eat round about his hand, and the same inbred cuen as though it had been coured with hot embers, when as Varlaam recieb out of the plames this saying: Blessed is the Lord my God, which teacheth my hands to fight.

To this narration of Basilius touching the martyrdome of Varlaam, wee will anner consequently another storie of Ambrose. He making a certaine exhortation to certaine virgins, in the same oration commendeth the martyrdome of Agricola and Vitalis, who suffered also in the same persecution under Diocletian and Maximian (as they so affirme) at Bononie. This Vitalis was seruant to Agricola, who both together betweene themselues had made a compact to giue their lives with other martyrs for the name of Christ. Whereupon Vitalis being sent before of his master to offer himselfe to martyrdome, fell first into the hands of persecutors, who laboured about him by all meanes to cause him denie Christ. Which when he would in no case doe, but flourthy persisted in the confession of his faith, they began to exercise him with all kind of torments, so unmercifully that there was no whole skin left on all his bodie. So Vitalis in the middest of the agonie and painefull torments, after he had in a short prayer commended himselfe to God, gave up his life. After him the tormentors set upon Agricola his master, whose vertuous manners and gentle conditions, because they were singularly well liked and knowne to the enemies, his suffering therfore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abiding the long delay and driuing off, and provoking moreouer the aduersaries to quicker speed, at length was fastned unto the crosse, and so finished his martyrdome, which he so long desired. Ambros. in exhortatione ad virgines.

So lesse worthie of commemoration is the lamentable martyrdome of Vincentius, whose historie here followeth. This Vincentius was a Spaniard, and a Leuite most godly and vertuous, who at this time suffered martyrdome at Valence under Dacianus the president, as we may gather by Prudentius in his hymne. Bergomensis in his supplement recitech those words concerning his martyrdome, out of a certaine sermon of Saint Augustine: Our heart conceiued not a vaine and fruitlesse sight (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies) but certainly a great sight and marueilous, and therewith singular pleasure received it, when the painefull passion of blessed Vincentius was read unto us. Je there any so beanie hearted, that will not be moued in the contemplation of this unmooueable martyr, so manly, or rather so godlie, fighting against the craft and subtilie of that serpent, against the tyrannie of Dacianus, against the horors of death, and by the mightie spirit of his God conquering all? But let us insted words rehearse the degrees of his torments, though the paines thereof in many words cannot be expressed. First, Dacianus caused the martyr to be laid upon the torture, and all the ioynts of his bodie to be dilended and racked out, untill they cracked againe. This being done in most extreame and cruell manner, all the members of his painfull and pitifull bodie were grieuously indented with deadly wounds. Whereby (that he might the more grieue) it was ordered, that he vnmercifully bored his flesh with iron combs sharply filed. And to the end the tormentors might vomit out all their vengeance on the meeke & milde martyrs flesh, the tormentors themselues also were bitle scourged at the Presidents commandement. And lest his passion (though want of paines might seme imperfect or elle to cease, they laid his bodie being all out of ioynt, on a grate of iron, and (when they had opened it with iron hooks, they seared it with fiery plates, with hot burning salt sprinkling the same. Last of all into a vile dungeon was this mightie martyr drawne, the flore whereof first was thicke spred with the sharpest shels that might be gotten, his feete then being fast locked in the stockes, there was he left alone without all worldlie comfort: but the Lord his God was with him, the holie spirit of God (whose office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his heart with ioy and gladnesse. Hall thou prepared a terrible racke (O cruel tyrant, O deuouring lion) for the martyrs bed: The Lord shall make that bed soft and sweet unto him. Racked thou his bones and ioynts all asunder: his bones, his ioynts, his haires are all numbred. Tormented thou his flesh with mortall wounds: The Lord shall powre abundantlie into all his fozes of his oile of gladnesse. Thy scraping combes, thy sharpe fleshhookes, thine hote searing irons, thy parched salt, thy stinking prison, thy cutting thelles, thy pinching stockes shall turne to this patient martyr to the best. All together shall worke contrary to thine expectation, great plentie of ioy shall he reape in to the barne of his soule, out of this mightie haruest of paines that thou hast brought him into. Yea thou shalt procure him Vincentius in deede: that is, a banquisher, a triumpher. A conquero, subduing thy madnesse by his meekenesse, thy tyranny by his patience, thy manifold meanes of tortures by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he hath plentifullie inriched.

In this recital of the triumphs of such holy martyrs, as suffered in this foresaid tenth persecution, many mo and almost innumerable there be expressed in authors, beside them whom we haue hitherto comprehended, as Philozomus a man of noble birth and great possessions in Alexandria, who being perswaded by his friends to fauour himselfe, for respect his wife, to conserue his children and familie, did not onely reiect the counsels of them, but alle neglected the threats and torments of the iudge, to keepe the confession of Christ inuiolat unto the death, and losing of his head: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 9. Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 9. of whom Eusebius bearerh witnesse that he was there present himselfe.

Of like estate and dignitie was also Procopius in Palestina, who after his conuersion brake his images of silver and gold, and distributed the same to the poze, and after all kind of torments, of racking, of cosbing, of tearing his flesh, of gosing and stabbing in, of sieruig, at length had his head also smitten off, as testifieth Nicep. lib. 8. cap. 15.

To this may be ioyned also Georgius a young man of Cappadocia, who stoutly inueying against y impious idolatry of the emperours, was apprehended and cast into prison, then tone with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, stretched with rodes, after that his hands and feet with other members of his bodie being cut off, at last with a sword had his head cut off: Nicephorus ibid.

With these aforenamed adde also Sergius and Bacchius, Panthaleon a physitian in Nicomedia, mentioned in Suidas. lib. 8. Theophanes of the citie of Amasia in Hellespont, mentioned of Vincentius, lib. 3. Faustus a martyr of Egypt, mentioned of Nicep. lib. 8. cap. 5. Cereon with three hundred and eighteene fellow martyrs, which suffered about Colour: Petr. de nat. lib. 9. cap. 49. Hermogenes the president of Athens, who being converted by the constancy of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, suffered also for the like faith. Item, Saturninus, Cyrias and Abibus, mentioned in Simeon Metaphrast. Hieron also with certaine of his confessors, under Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphrastes. Judes and Dominus, who suffered with many other martyrs above mentioned at Nicomedia, as recordeth Metaphrastes. Eustasius, Maximius, the emperors officers, whom Faustus the virgin in her torments converted. Also Cyrius, Lucius, Callinicus, Apollonius, Philemon, Atlas, Leonides, with Arrianus president of Thebaide. Cyprianus likewise a citizen of Antioch, who after he had continued a long time a filthie magician or sorcerer, at length was converted and made a deacon, then a priest, and at last the bishop of Antioch. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 120. of whom particular mention hath been made before. This Cyprian with Justina a virgin suffered among the martyrs. Item Gliceria at Nicomedia, Felix a minister, Fortunatus, Achilleus, deacons in the citie of Valent. Artemius of Rome, Cyriacus deacon to Marcellus the bishop, Carpophorus priest at Thusia, with Abundus his deacon. Item Claudius, Sirinus, Antonius which suffered with Marcellinus the bishop: Sabel. Emad. 7. lib. 8. Tuculatus in the citie Barcinona. Felix bishop of Apulia, with Adauctus and Januarius his priest. Fortunatus and Septimus his readers, who suffered in the city Venusina under Diocletian: Bergom. lib. 8.

It were too long a trauell or trouble to recite all and singular names of them particularly, whom this persecution of Diocletian did consume. The number of whom being almost infinit, is not to be collected or expressed. One storie yet remaineth not to be forgotten of Castianus, whose pitifull storie being described of Prudentius we haue here inserted, rendring metre for metre, as followeth.

THrough Forum, as in Italie, I passed once to Roome,
Into a church by chance came I, and stood fast by a toome.
Which church sometime a place had been, where causes great in law
Were scand and tried, and judgement given, to keep brute men in awe.
This place Sylla Cornelius, first built, he rais'd the frame;
And call'd the same Forum, and thus, that citie tooke the name.
In prayer fervent as I stood, casting mine eie aside,
A picture in full pitious mood (Embrude) by chance I spide:
A thousand wounded marks full bad, all mangled, rent, and torne;
The skin appear'd as though it had been iagd and prickt with thorne.
A scull of pictured boies did band, about that lothsome sight,
That with their sharpened gads in hand, his members thus had dight.
These gads were but their pens, wherewith their tables written were,
And such as scholars often sith, vnto the scholes doe beare.
Whom thou seest here thus pictur'd fit, and firmelie doest behold,
No fable is, I doe thee wit, vnaske a prelat told
That walk thereby: but doth declare, the historie of one,
Which written, would good record beare, what faith was long agone.
A skilfull schoolemaster this was, that here sometime did teach:
The bishop once of Brixia was, and Christ full plaine did preach.
He knew well how to comprehend, long talke in a few lines:
And it at length how to amend, by order and by times.
His sharpe precepts and his sterne looks, his beardles boies did feare:
When haste in heart (yet for their bookes) full deadlie thy did beare.
The child that learnes, I doe yet weet, termes all his sorrowe crude:
No discipline in youth seemes sweet, count this a common rule.
Behold the raging time now here, oppressing so the faith;
Doth persecute Godschildren deere and all that Christ bewraith.
This trustie teacher of the swarme, profest the living God:
The chiefe good thing they counte their hanne, perhaps he shakes his What rebels (aske the president) is he I heare so loud? (rod.
Vnto our youth an instrument, they say, and low they bowd.
Go bring the caitiffe foorth, he bids, and make no long delay:
Lee him he fet the boies amids that they doe as he doth say.
Let him be giuen vnto them all, and let them haue their will,
To doe to him what spite they shall, so that they will him kill.
Euen as they lift let them him fray, and him deride so long,
Till weariuesse prouoke their play, no longer to prolong.
Let them I fy then vncontrold, both pricke and scorch his skin:
To bathe their hands let them be bold, in the hot bloud of him.
The scholars hereat make great game, it pleaseth them full well:
That they may kill and quench the flame, they thought to them a hell.
They bind his hands behind his backe, and naked they him strip:
In bodkin wise at him they nacke, they laugh to see him skip.
The priuie hate that each one hath in heart, it now appeares:

They

They powre it fourth in gawly wrath, they wreak them of their teares.
Some cast great stones, some other breake, their tables on his face:
Lo here thy Latine and thy Greeke (oh barren boies of grace)
The bloud runs downe his cheeks, and doth imbrue the boxen leams:
Where notes by the were made (though loth) & wel proponed theams.
Some whet, some sharpe their pensels points, seruing to write withall:
Some other gage his flesh and ioynts, as with a painted nail.
Sometime they pricke, sometime they rent, this worthie martyrs flesh.
And thus by turnes they doe torment this confessor afresh.
Now all with one consent on him their bloudie hands they lay:
To see the bloud from him to lan, drop downe they make a play.
More painefull was the pricking pang, of children oft and thicke,
Then of the bigger boies that dang, and neere the heart did sticke.
For by the teeble strokes of those, death was denied his will:
Offmart that made him wo begon, he had the better skill.
The deeper throkes the great ones gaue, and neerer toucht the quick:
The welcome he thought the same, whom longing death made sick.
God make you strong, he saith, I pray, God giue you might at will:
And what y u want in yeeres I lay, let crue the fulfil.
But whilst the hangman breatheth full, and me with you do match,
That wakely worke, yet want no will, my life for to dispatch;
My griefs wax great: what gron'st thou now? said some of them againe,
In schoole, adusted well are thou, whom there thou putst to paine?
Behold we pay, and now make good as many thousand stripes,
As when with weeping eies we stood, in danger of thy gripes.
Art thou now angrie at thy hand, that alwaies crieds write, write,
And neuer wouldst that our right hand, should rest in quiet plite?
We had forgot our playing times, thou churle denieds vs ot:
We now but pricke and point our lines, and thus they grin and scof.
Correct good sir your viewed verse, if ought amisse there be:
Now we thy power and then rehearse, that haue not marked thee.
Christ pitty me, thus groaning man, with torments torne and tired,
Commands his heart to break euen then, and life that was then hired,
He yeelds againe to him that gaue, and thus he makes exchange:
Immortall for mortall to haue, that in such paine did range.
This is saith he, that this picture, thou so beholdest, oh ghest,
Of Cassianus martyr pure, doth preach I doe protest.
If thou prudence haue ought in store, in peuce to deale,
In hope of suit reward therefore, now shew thy louing zeale.
I could not but consent, I weepe, his tombe I doe imbrace:
Home I returne, and after sleepe, this pitifull preface
I write as a memoriall for euer to indure,
Of Cassianus schoolemaster, all others to allure
To constancie vnder the creed of their profession:
Accounting gaine what euer losse for Christ they take vpon.

Cassianus martyr.

No lesse admirable then wonderfull was the constancie also of women and maidens, who in the same perfection gaue their bodies to the torments, and their lines for the testimonie of Christ, with no lesse boldnes of spirit, then did the men themselues aboue specified, to whom how much more inferiour they were in bodily strength, so much more worthie of praise they be, for their constant standing. Of whom some examples here will I (Christ willing) to insert, such as in our stories & chronicles seme most notable, first beginning with Eulalia, whose story we haue taken out of Prudentius as followeth.

In the west part of Spaine called Portingall, is a citie great and populous, named Emerita, wherein diuelt and was brought vp a virgin, borne of noble parentage, whose name was Eulalia: which Emerita although for the apt situation thereof, was both rich and famous, yet more adorned and famous was the renowne thereof, by the martyrdome, bloud, and sepulchre of this blessed virgin Eulalia. Twelue yeres of age was she, and not much aboue, when she refused great and honorable offers in mariage, as one not stedfast, nor yet delighting in courtly dalliance, neither yet taking pleasure in purple and gorgious apparell, or else in pretious bables, or costlie ornaments and iewels: but forsaking and despising all these and such like pompous allurements, then thewed she her selfe most busie in preparing her iournie to her hoped inheritance, and heauenly patronage. Which Eulalia as she was modest and discreet in behauiour, sage and sober in conditions, so was she also wittie and sharp in answering her enemies. But when the furious rage of persecution inforced her to ioyne her selfe amongst Gods children in the houshold of faith, and when the christians were commanded to offer incense and sacrifice to diuels or dead gods: then began the blessed spirit of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a prompt and readie wit, thought forthwith as a courageous captaine) to giue a charge vpon this so great and disordered a battell: & so the fillie woman, powring out the bowels of her innocent heart before God, more pronoketh thereby the force and rage of her enemies against her. But the godlie care of her parents, fearing left the willing mind of the damsell, so readie to die for Christs cause, might make her author of her owne death, hid her and kept her close at their house in the countrie, being a great way out of the citie. She yet mistrusting that quiet life, as also detesting to make such delay, softly stealeth out of the doores (no man knowing thereof) in the night; and in great hast leauing the common way, openeth the hedge gaps, and with weary feet (God knoweth) passed through the thornie and brierie places, accompanied yet with spirituall gard: and although darke and dreadfull was the silent night, yet had she with her the Lord and guider of light. And as the children of Israel comming out of Egypt, had by the mightie power of God a cloudie piller for their guide in the day, and a flame of fire in the night; so had this godly virgin, trauelling in this darke night, when thee flying and forsaking the place where all filthie idolatrie abounded, and hastened her heauenly iourny, was not oppressed with the dreadfull darkenesse of the night: but yet thee before the day appeared in this her speedie iournie, with her selfe comforted and nursed on a thousand matters and more.

Eulalia martyr.

Ex Aurel. Prud. Aredii. lib. geraflegij.

The chast and continent behauiour of Eulalia.

Eulalia priuately the course of her iourney to sacrifice to Idolls.

Eulalia kept secret by her parents.

In the morning betime, with a bold courage thee goeth vnto the tribunall or iudgement seat, and in the midst of them all with a loud voice crying out, said: I pray you what a shame is it for you thus rashly and without aduisement to destroy and kill mens soules, and to throw their bodies alaine against the rocks, and cause them to deny the omnipotent God? Would you know (O you vnfortuniat) what I am? Behold, I am one of the christians, an enemie to your diuelish sacrifices, I spurne your idols vnder my feet, I confesse God omnipotent with my heart and mouth. Ills, Apollo, and Dianus, what are they? Parriuinus himselfe, what is he? The one a thing of nought, for that they be the workes of mens hands; the other but a calf alwey, because he worshippeth the same worke. Therefore friuolous are they both, and both not woorthie to bee set by. Mariuinus is a lord of substance, and yet he himselfe falleth downe before a stone, and boweth the honour of his dignitie vnto thole that are much inferior to his vassals. Why then doth he oppresse so tyrannicall, more worthie stomachs and courages then himselfe? He must needs be a good guide and an vpright iudge, which feedeth vpon innocent blood: and breathing in the bodies of godlie men, doth rent and teare their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in destroying and subuerting the faith.

Eulalia allured with faire perswasions.

God therefore thou hangman, burne, cut and mangle thou these earthie members. It is an easie matter to breake a brittle substance, but the inward mind that thou nor part for any thing thou canst doe. The pretor then of iudge, with these words of his, set in a great rage, saith: Hangman take her and pull her out by the haire of her head, and torment her to the vttermost; let her feele the power of our countrie gods, and let her know what the imperiall gouernment of a prince is. But yet, O thou sturdie girle, faine would I haue thee (if it were possible) before thou die, to remoke this thy wickednelle. Behold what pleasures thou maiest inioy by the honorable house thou cannest of, thy fallen house and progenie followeth thee to death with lamentable teares, and the heauie nobilitie of thy kindred maketh dolefull lamentation for thee. What meanest thou? Wilt thou kill thy selfe so young a flower, and so more of these honorable marriages and great bonories thou maist inioy? Doth not the glittering and golden pomp of the bride bed moue thee? Doth not the reuerend pietie of thine ancestors picke thee? Whom is it not, but that this thy rathnelle and weakines grieueth? Behold here the furniture readie prepared for thy terrible death: Either thalt thou be beheaded with this sword, or else with these in bo beasts that thou be pulled in peeces, or else thou being caft into the fierie flames, thalt be (although lamentable) bewailed of thy friends & kinsfolks) consumed to ashes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to escape all these? If thou wilt but take and put with thy fingers a little salt and incense into the censers, then shalt be deliuered from all these punishments. To this Eulalia made no answere, but being in a great fiurie, thee spitteth in the tyrants face, thee throweth downe the idols, and spurneth abrode with her feet the heape of incense prepared to the censers. Then without further delay the hangmen with both their strengths took her, and pull one iount from another, and with the talons of wild beasts scotched her sides to the hard bones: the all this while singing and praysing God in this wise: Behold O Lord I will not forget thee: what a pleasure is it for them O Christ? remember thy triumphant victories, to attaine vnto these high dignities, and still calleth vpon that holy name, all staines and imbrued with her owne bloud. This sung the with a bold stomach, neither lamentingle nor yet weepingly, but being glad and merrie, abandoning from her mind all beauinesle and griefe, when as out of a marine fountaine her mangled members with freth bloud bathed her white & faire skin. Then pieced they to plaft and small torment, which was not onely the gozing and wounding of her mangled bodie with the iron grate and hurdle, and terrible harrowing of her flesh, but burned on euery side with flaming torches her tormented brests & sides: her haire hanging about her shoulders in two parts diuided, wherwith her thanckfull chastity and virginitie was couered, reached downe to the ground. But when the crackling flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her haire, and reacheth the crolone of her head: then thee desiring swift death, opened her mouth and swallowed the flame, and so rested thee in peace.

Ex Prudent.

As yet haue heard now the christian life and constant death of Eulalia, much worthie of praise and commendation: so no leste commendation is worthilie to be giuen to lileden Agnes, that constant damsell and martyr of God, who as she was in Rome of honorable parents begotten, so lieth she there as honorably entombed & buried. Which Agnes, for hir vnspotted and vndefiled virginitie, deserueth no greater praise, and commendation then for hir willing death and martyrdome. Some writers make of hir a long discourse, more in my iudgement then necessary, reciting diuers and sundrie strange miracles by hir done in the processe of hir historie; which partly for tediousnesse, partly for the doubtfulnesse of the author, (whom some farther vpon Ambrose) partly for the strangenes & incredibilitie therof I omit, being fatisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of hir, as followeth: She was (saith he) young and not mariageable, when first she being dedicated to Christ, boldly refused the wicked edicts of the emperor; left that through idolatry she might haue denied and forsaken the holy faith; but yet first proued by diuers and sundrie policies to induce hir to the same (as now with the flattering & inticing words of the iudge, now with the threatnings of the looming executioner) stood not withstanding stedfast in all contagious strength: and willingly offered hir body to hard and painfull torments, not refusing (as she said) to suffer what soeuer it should bee, yea though it were death it selfe. After said the cruell tyrant: If to suffer paine and torment be so easie a matter and lightly regarued of thee, and that thou accountest thy life nothing worth, yet the shame of thy dedicated & vowed virginitie is a thing more regarded I know, and esteemed of thee. Wherefore this is determined, that vnlesse thou wilt make obeisance to the altar of Ceres, and aske forgiuenesse of hir for thy arrogancy, thou shalt be sent of abandoned to the common stewes or brothel-house. Agnes the virgin with more spirit & vehemencie inueieth against both Minerua and hir virginitie: the youth in flocks and run together, and craue that they may haue Agnes their iudgement prey. Then, saith Agnes, Christ is not forgetfull of those that be his, that he will suffer violently to be taken from them their golden and pure chastitie, neither will he leaue them to destitute of his help: he is alwaies at hand and readie to fight for his as here shamefull and chaft virgins, neither sufficeth he his gifts of holy integritie & chaftitie to bee polluted. Thou shalt, saith thee, willingly bath thy sword in my blood if thou will, but thou shalt not destile my body with filthie lust for any thing thou canst do. She had no sooner spoken these words, but hee commanded that the should bee set naked at the corner of some street (which place at that time, such as were strumpets commonly vsed) the greater part of the multitude both sorowing and thanning to see so shameleste a sight, went their wales, some turning their heads, some hiding their faces. But one amongst the rest, with vncircumcised eyes beholding the damsell, and that in such opprobrious wise, beheld a flame of fire like vnto a flash of lightening falleth vpon him, striketh his eyes out of his head, wherevpon hee so dead falling vnto the ground, sprallerth in the kennell burt, whose companions taking him vp, and carying him alway, bewailed him as a dead man: but the virgin for this hir miraculous deliuerie from the danger & shame of that place, singeth praises to God & Christ.

The incontinent eies of a young man beholding Agnes stricken out.

There he (saith Prudentius) that repost, how that the being desired to pray vnto Christ for the partie, that a little before was stricken from his incontinencie was stricken from reflored by hir prayer both vnto his perfect health and sight. But blessed Agnes after that the had climed this hir first greese and step vnto the heauenly palace, forthwith began to climbe another: for sure ingendring now the mostall wrath of hir bloudie enemie, bringing his hands crieth out, saying: I am vnbone, O thou the executioner draw out thy sword, and do thine office that the emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes saw a sturdie and cruell fellow (to behold) stand behind hir, or approching neere to hir with a naked sword in his hand: I am now gladder, saith the, and reioyce, that such a one as thou being a stout, fierce, strong, and stirdy soldier art come, then one more feeble, weake, and faint should come, or else any other young man sweetly inhalined, and wearing gay apparell that might beskrop me with funerall shame. This, euen this is hee, I now confesse, that I do loue, I will make hast to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing desire. I will willingly receiue into my paps the length of his sword, and into my breast will draw the force thereof euen vnto the hilts, that thus I being married vnto Christ my spouse, may surmount and escape all the darkenesle of this world, that reacheth euen vnto the skies. O eternall gouernour vouchsafe to open the gates of heauen once that vp against all the inhabitants of the earth, and receiue (oh Christ) my soule that seeketh thee. After speaking and kneeling vpon his knees, the prayeth vnto Christ aboue in heauen, that hir necke might bee the readier for the sword, now hanging ouer the same. The executioner then with his bloodie hammer hit her hope, and at one stroke cutteth off hir head, and by such short and swift death doth hee present hir of the paine thereof.

The historie of Eucharine martyr. All things be not true and probable that be written of Saints liues.

I haue often times before complained, that the stories of saints haue been polluted and sauced with diuers untrue additions and fabulous inuentions of men, who either of a superstitious deuotion, or of a subtill practise, haue so mingle-manded their stories and liues, that almost nothing remaineth in them simple and vncorrupt, as in the vsuall pictures wont to bee read for daily seruice is manifest and euident to bee seene, wherein few legends there be able to abide the touch of histo-rie, if they were trialy tried. This I write vpon the occasion especially of good Eucharie, whom now I haue in hand. In whom although I nothing doubt, but in hir life was great holinesse, mendation then for hir willing death and martyrdome. Some writers make of hir a long discourse, more in my iudgement then necessary, reciting diuers and sundrie strange miracles by hir done in the processe of hir historie; which partly for tediousnesse, partly for the doubtfulnesse of the author, (whom some farther vpon Ambrose) partly for the strangenes & incredibilitie therof I omit, being satisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of hir, as followeth: She was (saith he) young and not mariageable, when first she being dedicated to Christ, boldly refused the wicked edicts of the emperor; left that through idolatry she might haue denied and forsaken the holy faith; but yet first proued by diuers and sundrie policies to induce hir to the same (as now with the flattering & inticing words of the iudge, now with the threatnings of the looming executioner) stood not withstanding stedfast in all contagious strength: and willingly offered hir body to hard and painfull torments, not refusing (as she said) to suffer what soeuer it should bee, yea though it were death it selfe. There he (saith Prudentius) that repost, how that the being desired to pray vnto Christ for the partie, that a little before was stricken from his incontinencie was stricken from reflored by hir prayer both vnto his perfect health and sight. But blessed Agnes after that the had climed this hir first greese and step vnto the heauenly palace, forthwith began to climbe another: for sure ingendring now the mostall wrath of hir bloudie enemie, bringing his hands crieth out, saying: I am vnbone, O thou the executioner draw out thy sword, and do thine office that the emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes saw a sturdie and cruell fellow (to behold) stand behind hir, or approching neere to hir with a naked sword in his hand: I am now gladder, saith the, and reioyce, that such a one as thou being a stout, fierce, strong, and stirdy soldier art come, then one more feeble, weake, and faint should come, or else any other young man sweetly inhalined, and wearing gay apparell that might beskrop me with funerall shame. This, euen this is hee, I now confesse, that I do loue, I will make hast to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing desire. I will willingly receiue into my paps the length of his sword, and into my breast will draw the force thereof euen vnto the hilts, that thus I being married vnto Christ my spouse, may surmount and escape all the darkenesle of this world, that reacheth euen vnto the skies. O eternall gouernour vouchsafe to open the gates of heauen once that vp against all the inhabitants of the earth, and receiue (oh Christ) my soule that seeketh thee. After speaking and kneeling vpon his knees, the prayeth vnto Christ aboue in heauen, that hir necke might bee the readier for the sword, now hanging ouer the same. The executioner then with his bloodie hammer hit her hope, and at one stroke cutteth off hir head, and by such short and swift death doth hee present hir of the paine thereof.

I haue often times before complained, that the stories of saints haue been polluted and sauced with diuers untrue additions and fabulous inuentions of men, who either of a superstitious deuotion, or of a subtill practise, haue so mingle-manded their stories and liues, that almost nothing remaineth in them simple and vncorrupt, as in the vsuall pictures wont to bee read for daily seruice is manifest and euident to bee seene, wherein few legends there be able to abide the touch of histo-

Barbara, Faustus, Quintinus, Maximinus Iulianus, Antiochus, Eutinus, Ecclesiastes.

There haue been moreouer besides these aboue recited, diuers godly women and faithfull martyrs, as Barbara a noble woman in Thusia, who after miserable imprisonment, sharpe racks, and burning flames put to her fides, was at last beheaded. Also Faustin the virgin which suffred vnder Maximinus, by whom Sucesides a ruler of the emperors palace, and Maximus the president were both conuerted, and also suffered martyrdome as witnesseth Metaphrastes. Item, Iuliana a virgin of singular beautie in Nicomedia, who after diuers agonies suffered likewise vnder Maximinus. Item, Antiffa a maid of Thessalonica, who vnder the said Maximinus suffred Metaph. ibid. Iulian which suffred with Cyprianus bishop of Antioch: not to omit also Dacla; although most writers doe record that she suffred vnder Nero: Platina in vita Caij maketh also mention of Lucia and Agatha. All which holy maids and virgins glorified the Lord Christ with their constant martyrdome in this tenth and last persecution of Diocletian.

Caius, Marcellinus, Marcellus, Eusebius, Miltiades, bishops of Rome and martyrs. Marcellinus denied and repenteth. Ex lib. conciliorum & Platina.

During the time of which persecution, these bishops of Rome succeeded one after another, Caius who succeeded next after Vitus before mentioned, Marcellinus, Marcellus (of whom Eusebius in his story maketh no mention) Eusebius, & then Miltiades: all which died martyrs in the tempest of this persecution. First Marcellinus after the martyrdome of Caius, was ordained bishop: he being brought by Diocletian to the idols, first yelded to their idolatrie, and was true to sacrifice, wherfore being excommunicated by the christians, fell into great repentance, that hee returned againe to Diocletian, where hee standing to his former confession, and publikely condemning the idolatrie of the heathen, recouered the crowne of martyrdome, suffering with Claudius, Cyprianus and Antoninus.

Euseb. in Chron.

Marcellus likewise was tyed of Maxentius to renounce his bishoprike & religion, & to facrifice with them to idols: which when he constantly refused, was beaten with cudgels, & expelled the citie. Then hee entring into the house of Lucina a widow, assembled there the congregation, which when it came to the eares of Maxentius the tyrant, hee turned the house of Lucina into a stable, and made Marcellus the keeper of the beasts, and so with the ritche thereof a miserable handling, was put to death. Eusebius sate bishop of Rome, as Euseb. in Chron. saith, seuen moneths. Marianus Scotus saith eight moneths. Damasus affirmeth sir yeares. Sabellicus alleageth certaine authors that say, that hee was slaine by Maximianus, but confuteth & himselfe, affirming that Maximianus died before him.

Authors disagreeing. Ex Sabel. Ennead. 7. lib. 8.

Miltiades by the testimony of Platina, & others that followe him sat three yeares and seuen moneths, & suffered vnder Maximianus. But that seemeth not to be true, as both Sabellicus doth rightly note, affirming that the same cannot stand by the supputation of time: for so much as the said Valerius Maximianus raigned but two yeres and died before Miltiades. Also Eusebius manifestly expresseth the example of a letter of Constantine written to this Miltiades bishop of Rome, plainly conuicting that to be false which Platina affirmeth.

A place of Platina confuted.

In the booke collected of generall councels, among the decretall epistles, there is a long tractation about the iudgement and condemnation of Marcellinus: whereof the matters and patrons of poperie in these our dates take great hold to prooue the supremacie of the pope to be aboue all generall councels, and that he ought not to be subiect to the condemnation of any person or persons, for that there is written: Nemo vnquam iudicauit pontificem, nec præsul sacerdotem suum, quoniam prima sedes nō iudicabitur a quoquam, &c. Although this sentence of Miltiades seemeth apparantly to bee patched in rather by some Holdhardus then by Miltiades, both for that it barreth with little order of sense vpon that which goeth before, and againe, because that Prima sedes hath neuer in times past ordained nor attributed to the see of Rome before the council of Nice, where the order and placing of bishops was first established. But to let this sentence passe, yet notwithstanding the circumstance and proceeding of this iudgement, if it be rightly weighed, maketh very little for the purpose of these men. Neither is it true that the bishops of the councell of Sinuessa did not condemne Marcellinus, for the words of the councell bee plaine; Subscripserunt igitur in eius damnationem & damnauerunt eum extra ciuitatem, that is, They subscribed therefore to his condemnation, and condemned him to be expelled out of the citie. Moreouer by the said councell were brought in the fortie two witnesses against Marcellinus. In the said councell the verdict of the same witnesses was deliuered, & also receiued. Furthermore, Quintus there one of the bishops openly protested, that he would not depart the councell, before the malice of the bishops were reuealed: What doth all this declare, but that the bishop of Rome was called there, and did appeare before the iudgement seat of the councell, and there stood subiect to their sentence and authoritie, by the which he was expelled out of the citie? As for the words of the councell, whereupon our papists stand so much, Non enim nostro, sed tuo ipsius iudicio condemnaberis, &c. Item, Tuo ore iudica causam tuā, &c. These words import not here the authoritie of the Romane bishop to bee a-bone the councell, neither doe they declare what the councell could not do, but what they would & wished rather to be done, that is, that hee should rather acknowledge his crime before God and them, with a voluntarie yelding of his heart, then that the confession of such an hainous fact should bee extorted from him through their condemnation: for that they saw to be expedient for his soules health, otherwise their condemnation should serue him to small purpose, and so it came to passe. For he being urged of them to condemne himselfe, to did: prostrating himselfe and weeping before them. Whereupon immediatly they proceeded to the sentence against him, condemning and pronouncing him to be expelled the citie. Now whether by this may be gathered that the bishop of Rome ought not to bee cited, accused and condemned by any person or persons, let the indifferent reader iudge simplie.

The bishop of Rome condemned by the councell.

As touching the decretall epistles, which be intituled vnder the name of these foresaid bishops, who so well abuseth them, and with iudgement will examine the stile, the time, the argument, the hanging together of the matter, and the constitutions in them contained (little seruing to any purpose, and nothing seruing for those troublesome daies then present) may easilie discerne them, either in no part to bee theirs, or much of the same to be falsified and counterfeited by the doings of others, which lined in other times, especially seeing all the constitutions in them for the most part tend to the setting vp, and to exalt the see of Rome aboue all other bishops and churches, and to reduce all causes and appeales to the said see of Rome. So the epistle of Caius beginning with the commendation of the authoritie of his see, endeth after the same tenor, willing and commanding all difficult questions in all prouinces what soeuer emerging, to be referred to the see apostolicall. Moreouer, the greatest part of the said epistle from this place (Quicunque illi sint, ita obtecati, &c: to the end of this period, Quoniam sicut ait B. apostolus, magnum est pietatis, &c.) is contained in the epistle of Leo, vnto Leo the emperor, and so rightly agreeth in all points with the first epistle of Leo, that euident it is the same to bee extorted out of Leo, out of the epistle of Caius, or to be rather into the epistle of Caius taken out of Leo.

Likewise the epistle of Marcellinus, to get more authozitie with the reader, is adnired with a great part of Pauls epistle to the Ephesians, vnto Titus. And how is it like that Marcellinus, which died in the twentith yeare of Diocletian, could inuite of consubstantiality of the three persons, when that controuersie & terme of consubstantiality was not heard of in the church before the Nicen councel, which was twentie three yeares after him? But especially the two epistles of Marcellus bee wasy themselues, so that for the confuting thereof needeth no other probation more then only the reading of the same. Such a glorious stile of ambition there in doth appeare, as it is easie to be vnderstood, not to proceed either from such an humble martyr, or to sauour any thing of the miserie of such a time. His words of his first epistle written vnto the brethren of Antioch, and alleaged in the popes decrees by Gratianus are these:

The epistle of Marcellinus.

The epistles decretall of Marcellus.

Ex epist. decretal. Milesiodor.

2.4.4. 1. Rom. mus vos fratres.

We desire you brethren, that you doe not teach nor conceiue any other thing but as ye haue receiued of the blessed apostle Saint Peter, and of other apostles and fathers. For of him ye were first of all instructed, wherefore you must not forsake your owne father and follow others. For he is the head of the whole church, to whom the Lord said: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my church, &c. Whole seate was first with you in Antioch, which afterward by the commandement of the Lord was translated from thence to Rome, of the which church of Rome I am this day placed (by the grace of God) to be the gouernour. From the which church of Rome, neither ought you to separate your selues, seeing to the same church all maner causes ecclesiasticall, being of any importance (Gods grace so disposing) are commanded to bee referred: by the same to bee ordered regularly, from whence they tooke the first authoritie of gouerning, & vnto which consequently vpon the same, And if your church of Antioch, which was once the first, will now yeeld hir selfe vnto the see of Rome, there is no other church else which will not subiect it selfe to our dominion: to whom all other bishops, whosoeuer lifteth, and as they must needs doe (according to the decrees of the apostles and of their Ancestors) ought to flie vnto, as to their head, and must appeale to the same, there to haue their redresse and their protection, from whence they tooke their first instruction and consecration, &c.

In what chapter or leafe of all the whole councels the Lord commandeth the see of Peter to be translated from Antioch to Rome?

The church of Rome liable to the church of Antioch to yeeld vnto her.

Whether this be like matter to proceed from the spirit of Marcellus that blessed martyr, in those so dreadfull daies, I say no more, but onely desire the gentle reader) to iudge.

The second epistle of Marcellus to Maxentius.

In his second epistle inscribed, he thus Marcellus writing to Maxentius the bloodie tyrant, first reprehendeth him for his crueltie, sharply admonishing him how and what to doe: to learne and seeke the true religion of God, to maintaine his church, to honor and reuerence the priests of God, and specially exhorteth him to charitie, and that he would cease from persecution, &c. All this is possible and like to bee true. But note marke good reader) what blanched stuffe here followed vnlesse as where he, alleaging the statutes and sanctions of his predecessors, declareth and discusseth that no bishop nor minister ought to be persecuted or depriued of his goods. And if they be be, then ought they to haue their possessions and places againe restored (by the law) before they were bound (by the law) to answere to their accusations laid in against them: and so after where to their accusations laid in against them: and so after that an conuenient time, to be called to a councell; the which councell notwithstanding without the authoritie of the holy see, cannot proceed regularly (albeit it remaine in his power to assemble certaine bishops together) neither can he regularly condemne any bishop, appealing to this his apostolicall see, before the sentence definite bo proceed from the foresaid see, &c. And it followeth after; And therefore (saith he) let no bishop of what crime soeuer he be attached, come to his accusation or be heard, but in his owne ordinarie synod at his conuenient time: the regular and apostolicall authoritie being ioyned withall. Moreouer in the said epistle writing vnto Maxentius, he decreeth that no lay man, or any suspected bishop ought to accuse prelats of the church: So that if they be either laymen, or men of euill conuersation, or proued manifest enemies or incensed with any hatred, their accusations against any bishops ought not to stand. With other such matters more, concerning the disposition of iudiciall court. Which matter, if pope Gregorie the seuenth had written vnto Henrie the third emperour, or if pope Alexander the third had written to the emperour Fredericus the first: it might haue stood with some reason and opportunitie of time. But now for Marcellus to write these decrees in such persecution of the church, to Maxentius the heathen and most cruell emperor, how vnlike it is to bee true, and how it serued then to purpose, the reader may soone discerne. And yet if these the epistles and constitutions decretall, whereby (vnder the pretensed title of the fathers) all churches of late time, and all ecclesiasticall causes haue been, and yet are in this realme of England to this day gouerned, directed and disposed.

The like discussion and examination I might also make of the other epistles that so lolio of Eusebius and Miltiades, which all tend to the same scope, that no pselate or bishop ought to come to his answere (ne Ad item contestatam, as the words of their writing do tearme it) before they be orderly and fully restored againe to their possessions. Who moreouer in the said their epistles still harpe vpon this key of the scripture, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram ædificabo ecclesiam meam. Declaring moreouer that this priuiledge of binding all maner of to be iudge of no man, but onely to be left to the iudgement of the Lord, was giuen to this foresaid holy see of Rome, from time of the apostles, and chiefly left vnto Peter the holy keeper: so that although the election of the apostles was equall, yet this was chiefly granted to S. Peter, to haue preheminence aboue the rest. Concluding in the end hereby, Quòd semper maiores causæ, licet sint episcoporum, & potiorū curæ negotiorum, ad vnam beati principis apostolorum Petri sedē conflurent; that is, That alwaies all greater causes, as bee the matters of bishops, and such other cares of weightie importance, should be brought to the see of saint Peter, the blessed prince of the apostles, &c. These be the words of Miltiades and Eusebius, whereby it may partly bee smelled of him that hath any nose, what was the meaning of them which forged these writings and letters vpon these ancient holy martyrs.

A place of the third epistle decretall of Eusebius found untrue.

This I cannot but marueil at, in the third epistle of Eusebius the bishop of Rome, that whereas Marcellinus his late predecessor before, in his owne time and remembrance did fall to horrible and lewd condemned for the same vilely to bee expulsed the citie by the councell of three hundred bishops: yet notwithstanding the foresaid Eusebius in his third epistle alleaging that place of Tu es Petrus, bringeth in for a proofe of the same, and saith: Quia in sede apostolica extra maculam semper est catholica seruata religio, &c: that is, For in the apostolicall see, alwaies the catholike religion hath been preserued without any spot or blemish.

Miltiades the last bishop of Rome being in danger of persecution.

But whosoeuer the fingers of these decretall epistles haue forgotten themselues, most certaine it is, that these holy bishops, vpon whom they were and are ascribed, liued perfect godly men and died blessed martyrs. Of whom this Miltiades was the last among all the bishops of Rome here in the west church of Europe, that euer was in danger of persecution to be martyred, yet to this present day.

The end of these persecutions in all the west churches.

And without doubt we heard the stories and names of such blessed saints, which suffered in the time of persecution, from the nineteenth yeare of Diocletian, to the seuenth and last yeare of Maxentius, with the deaths also and plagues described vpon these tormentors and cruell tyrants, which were the captaines of the same persecution. And here commeth in (blessed bee Christ) the end of these persecutions here in these west churches of Europe, so far as the dominion of blessed Constantinus did chiefly extend.

The persecution under Licinius, Hermius, Maximinus, Seleucius, martyrs. Theodosius captaine, martyr.

Yet notwithstanding in Asia all persecution as yet ceased not so, the space of foure yeares, as aboue is mentioned by the meanes of wicked Licinius, vnder whom diuers there were holy and constant martyrs, that suffered grieuous torments: as Hermius a deacon, and Stratonicus a keeper of the prison, which both after their punishments sustained, were strangled in the flood Iser. Metaph. Also Theodosius the captaine, who being sent for of Licinius, because he would not come, & because he brake his gods in pieces, and gaue them to the poore, therefore was sastned to the crosse, and after being pierced with sharpe pitches or bodkins, in the secret parts of his body, was at last beheaded. Adde to this also Miles, who first being a souldier, afterward was made bishop of a certaine citie in Persia, where he seeing himselfe could doe no good to conuert them, after many tribulations and great afflictions among them, cursed the citie and departed. Which citie shortly after by Sapores king of Persia was destroyed.

Persecution in Persia. Acindinus, Pegasius, Aphthonius, Elpidephorus, Simeon archbishop, Cteliphon bishop. Martyrs. 128 martyrs in Persia. The story of Simeon archbishop of Seleucia. Ex Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 8. 9. 10.

In the same countrie of Persia, about this time suffered vnder Sapores the king (as recordeth Simeon Metaphrastes) diuers valiant and constant martyrs, as Acindinus, Pegasius, Anempodistus, Epimachus, also Simeon archbishop of Seleucia, with Cteliphon an other bishop in Persia, with other ministers and religious men of that region, to the number of one hundred twentie eight. Of this Simeon and Cteliphon thus writeth Sozomen lib. 2: That the idolatrous magicians in Persia, taking counsell together against the christians, accused Simeon and Cteliphon to Sapores the king, for that they were growne full & accepted vnto the Roman emperor, & beleaued to him such things as were done in the land of Persia. Whereupon Sapores being moued, tooke great displeasure against the christians, oppressing them with taxes & tributes vnto their bitter impouerishing, killing also their priests with the sword: after that called for Simeon the archbishop, who there before the king declared himselfe a worthie and a valiant captaine of Christs church. For when Sapores had commanded him to be led to sutter torments, hee neither thumbe for any feare, nor beleaued any great humble suite of submission for any pardon: wherefore the king partly marueiling, partly offended, asked why he did not kneele downe as he was wont before to doe? Simeon to this answered: For that, saith he, before this time I was not brought into you in bonds to betray the true God, as I am now, so long I refused not to accomplish that which the order & custome of the realme of me required; but now it is not lawfull for me so to doe, for now I come to stand in defence of our religion and true doctrine. When Simeon thus had auouered, the king perstiting in his purpose, offereth to him the choice either to worship with him after his maner, promising to him many great gifts, if he would so doe; or if hee would not, threatning to him & to all the other christians within his land, destruction. But Simeon neither allured with his promises, nor terrified with his threatnings, continued constant in his doctrine professed, so as neither he could bee induced to idolatrous worship, nor yet to betraye the truth of his religion. For the which cause he was committed into bonds, and there commanded to be kept, to the kings pleasure further knowne.

The wortlie answere of Simeon vnto the king.

The constancie of Simeon.

It befell in the way as he was going to the prison, there was sitting at the kings gate a certaine eunuch, an old man, one of schoolemaster of the kings, named Vthazares, who had been once a christian, and afterward falling from his profession, fell with the heathenish multitude to their idolatrie. This Vthazares sitting at the gate of the kings palace, and seeing Simeon passing by led to the prison, rose vp and reuerenced the bishop. Simeon againe with sharpe words (as the time would suffer) rebuked him, and in great anger cried out against him, which being once a christian, would so cowardly reuolt from his profession, and returne againe to the heathenish idolatrie. At the hearing of these words the eunuch forthwith hurling out into teares, laying away his courtly apparell, which was sumptuous and costly, and putting vpon him a blacke and mourning weed, sitteth before the court gates weeping and bewailing, thus saying with himselfe: Woe is me, with what hope, with what face shall I loke hereafter for my God, which haue denied my God, when as this Simeon my familiar acquaintance, thus passing by me, so much disdaineth me, that he refuseth with one gentle word to salute me?

The fall of Vthazares.

The repentance of Vthazares.

These words being brought to the eares of the king (as such tale-carriers neuer lacke in princes courts) procured against him no little indignation. Whereupon Sapores the king sending for him, first with gentle words and courtly promises began to speake him faire, asking him what he ailed, and wherefore he mourned, and whether there was any thing in his house, which he wished him or which he had not at his owne will & asking? Whereunto Vthazares answering againe said: that There was nothing in that earthly house, which was to him lacking, or wherunto his desire stood. Yea would God (said he) O king, any other griefe or calamitie in all the world, whatsoeuer it were, had happened to me rather then this, for the which I doe most sustie mourne and sorrow! For this sorroweth me, that I am this day alive, who should rather haue died long since, and that I see this sunne, which against my heart and mind, for your pleasure dissemblingly I appeared to worship, for which cause double wise I am woothie of death. First for that I haue denied Christ; secondly, because I did his dishonour vpon you. And incontinent vpon these words, swearing by him that made both heauen and earth, affirmed most certainely, that although he had played the fole before, he would neuer be so mad againe, as to stead of the creator & maker of all things to worship the creatures which hee had made and created. Sapores the king being astonied at the so sudden alteration of this man, and doubting with himselfe whether to bee angrie with those inchanters or with him; whether to intreate him him with gentlenesse or with rigor, at length in this mood commanded the said Ulphazares his old ancient seruant, and first tutor and bringer vp of his youth, to be had away, and to be beheaded. As he was going to the place of execution, hee desired of the executioners a little to stay, while he might send a message vnto the king, which was this: sent in by certaine of the kings most trustie eunuches) desiring him, that for all the old and faithfull seruice he had done to his father, and to him, hee would now requite him with this one office againe, to cause to be cried openly by a publike crier in these words following, That Ulphazares was beheaded, not for any treachery or crime committed against the king or the realme, but onely for that he was a christian, and would not at the kings pleasure deny his God. And so according vnto his request, it was performed and granted. For this cause did Ulphazares so much desire the cause of his death to bee published: because that as his thinking backe from Christ, was a great occasion to many christians to doe the like, so now the same hearing that Ulphazares died for no other cause but onely for the religion of Christ, should learne likewise by his example to bee feruent and constant in that which they professe. And thus this blessed eunuch did consummate his martyrdome. Of the which his late martyrdome Simeon hearing, being in prison was very ioyfull, and gaue God thankes; who in the next day following, being brought forth before the king, and constantly refusing to condescend vnto the kings request, to worship visible creatures, was likewise by the commandement of the king beheaded, with a great number more, which the same day also did suffer, to the number (as is said) of an hundred and more; all which were put to death before Simeon, hee standing by, and exhorting them with comfortable words: admonishing them to stand firme and stedfast in the Lord, preaching and teaching them concerning death, resurrection, and true pietie, and proued by the scriptures that to bee true which he had said: declaring moreouer that to bee true life indeed, to bodie; and that to bee death indeed, to denie or to betray God for feare of punishment: and added further, that there was no man aliue, but needs once must die: For so much as to all men is appointed necessarilie heere to haue an end. But those things which after this life follow heereafter, to be eternall, which neither shall come to all men after one sort. But as the condition and trade of life in diuers men doth differ, and is not in all men like; so the time shall come, when all men in a moment shall render and receiue according to their doings in this present life immortall rewards: such as haue here done well, of life and glorie; such as haue done contrarie, of perpetuall punishment. As touching therefore our well doing, here is no doubt but of all other our holy actions and vertuous deeds, there is no higher or greater deed, then if a man heere lose his life for his Lord God. With these words of comfortable exhortation, the holy martyrs being prepared, willingly yeelded vp their liues to death. After whom at last followed Simeon, with two other priests or ministers of his church; Abdeselas and Ananias, which also with him were partakers of the same martyrdome.

The free speech and boldnesse of Pusices.

Upon these words thus spoken, Pusices immediatly was apprehended and brought vnto the king; who there confessing himselfe constantly to be a christian, and so that hee was very bold and hardie before the king in the cause of Christs faith, was extremely and most cruelly handled in the execution of his martyrdome. For in the vpper part of his necke they made a hole to thrust in their hand, and plucked out his tongue out of his mouth, and so hee was put to death. At the which time also the daughter of Pusices, a godly virgin, by the malicious accusation of the wicked, was apprehended and put to death.

A cruell edict of Sapores against the christians.

The next yeare following, vpon the same day, when the christians did celebrate the remembrance of the Lords passion, which we call good friday before Easter (as writeth the said Sozomenus) Sapores the king directed out a cruell and sharpe edict throughout all his land, condemning to death all them, who for true confessed themselues to be christians. Vpon ground whereof an innumerable multitude of christians, through the wicked procuring of the malignant magicians, suffered the same time by the sword, both in cities and in townes: some being sought for, some offering themselues willingly, lest they should seeme by their silence to deny Christ. Thus all the christians that could bee found, without pitie were slaine, and diuers also of the kings owne court and household. Amongst whom was also Azades an eunuch, one whom the king did intirely loue and fauour; which Azades after that the king vnderstood to be put to death, being greatly moued with the fauour thereof, commanded after that no christians to bee slaine, but them onely which were the doctors and teachers of christian religion.

The execution of Sapor to cease the persecution.

In the same time it happened that the queene fell into a certaine disease, vpon the occasion whereof, the cruell Iewes with the wicked magicians, faithlesse and maliciously accused Trabula, the sister of Simeon the martyr, a godly virgin, with an other sister also of hirs: that they had wrought priuie charmes to hurt the queene, for the reuenging of the death of Simeon. This accusation being receiued and beleeued, innocent Trabula, with the others were condemned, and with a fauchion in sunder by the middle, whose quarters were then hanged vpon stakes, the queene going betweene them, thereby thereby to bee deliuered of her sickenesse. This Trabula was a maid of a right comely beautie and verie amiable, to whom one of the magicians cast great loue, much desiring and labouring by gifts and rewards sent into the prison to win her to his pleasure: promising that if she would apply to his request, she should be deliuered and set at liberty. But she vtterly refusing to consent vnto him, or rather rebuking him for his incontinent attempt, did chuse rather to die, then to betray either the religion of her mind, or the virginitie of her bodie. Now so farre as much as the king had commanded that no christians should be put to death, but onely such as were the teachers and leaders of the flocke: the magicians and archmagicians left no diligence vntried to set forward the matter. Tiberby great affliction and persecution was among the bishops and teachers of the church, which in all places went to slaughter, especially in the countrie of Bitheane, so that part of Persia aboue all other was most christian. Where Acepsimas the bishop with a great number of his flocke and clergie were apprehended and taken: vpon the apprehension of whom, the magicians to satisfie the kings commandement, dismissed all the rest, onely deprining them of their liuing and gods. Onely Acepsimas the bishop they retained, with whom one Iacobus a minister, a priest of his church was also ioyned: not of any competition, but onely as himselfe to beseech and obtained of those magicians that he might follow him, and bee coupled in the same bonds to serue the aged bishop, and to receiue (so much as hee might) his calamities, and heale his woundes. For hee had been sore scourged before of the magicians, after they had apprehended him, and brought him to worship the same thing which they began: but he would not doe, they cast him into prison againe, where this Iacobus was waiting vpon him. At the same time likewise Athalas a priest or minister, also Azadaces and Abdiesus deacons were imprisoned, and miserable scourged for the testimonie of the Lord Iesus. After this, the archmagus clipping his time, complained vnto the king of them, hauing authoritie and commission giuen him (vnlesse they would worship the same) to punish them as hee pleased. This commandement received of the king, the master magus doth declare to them in prison. But they answered against plainely, that they would neuer be either betrayers of Christ, or worshippers of the same; whereupon without mercie they were put to bitter torments, where Acepsimas strongly perfisting in confession of Christ, remained last of death. The other being no lesse rent and wounded with scourges, yet continued marcellouslie aliue, and because they wound in no safe time from their constant sentence, were turned againe into prison. Of whom Athalas in the time of his whipping was so wounde and rackt with pulling, that both his armes being loosed out of the ioynts, hanged downe from his bodie: which bee so carried about without vse of any hand to feed himselfe, but as hee was fed of others.

Constantinus the emperor writeth to the king of Persia in the behalfe of the afflicted christians.

thinking thereby to obtaine the more friendship at the kings hands, that at his request he would be god to the christians, to whom he writeth his epistle in their behalfe, and sendeth the same by his messengers, beginning thus:

The copie and effect of the epistle of Constantine to Sapores.

Diuinam fidem seruans veritatis lucem sortior. Veritatis luce doctus diuinæ fidei cognosco. Per ea igitur, quibus illa res agendas confirmat, fanctissimam religionem cognitam reddo, & hinc me cultum doctore cognitionis sanctæ Dei habere confiteor, &c. Euse-bius De vita Constantini, lib. 4. The contents whereof briefly doe tend to this effect. Declaring vnto him how hee should stand much beholden to him, if at his request hee would shew some quiet and rest to the christians, in whose religion there was nothing which he could iustly blame. For so much as in their sacrifices they vse to kill nothing, nor to shed no blood, but onely to offer vp vnbloodie sacrifices, to make their prayers vnto God, who delighteth not in bloodshedding, but only in the soule that loueth vertue, & followeth such doctrine and knowledge, which is agreeing vnto true pietie. And therefore such men as doe leade him, and learne so to beleeue and to worship God; are more to bee commended. Moreouer, hee assureth him to find God more mercifull vnto him, if he would imbrace the godly pietie and truth of the christians. And for example thereof, bringeth in the stories of Galienus and Valerianus, who so long as they were fauourers of the christians did prosper and flourish. But as soone as they moued any perfecution against them, it happened to them as it did to all other emperors before them, that all went backeward with them, as especially might appeare by Valerianus, who after hee had raged so cruelly against the christians, was eftsoones ouercome of the Persians, the reuenging hand of God falling vpon him, where hee led euer ameliorable life, in wretched captiuitie. Further also for the more euidence of the same, inferreth the examples of those emperors & tyrants in his time, whom he vanquished and subdued only by his faith in Christ, for the which faith God was his helper, and gaue him the victorie in many battels, and triumph ouer great tyrants, whereby he hath so inlarged the dominion of the Romane monarchie from the west ocean vnto the vttermost parts well neere of all the east. To the doing and working whereof neither called to him the helpe of any charmer, or diuination of soothsayer, nor vsed the killing of any sacrifice: but onely the following of the crosse, and prayer made to almightie God, without any other bloodie sacrifice, was the armour wherewith hee ouercame, &c. And in the end of the epistle addeth these words. What ioy (saith he) what gladnesse would it be to my heart, to heare the state also of the Persians to flourish, as I wish it to do, by imbracing this sort of men, the christians I meane? So that both you with them, & they with you in long prosperitie may inioy much felicitie together as your hearts would desire, and in so doing no doubt ye shall. For so shall you haue God, which is the author and creator of all this vniuersall world, to be mercifull and gracious to you. Thefe men therefore I commend vnto you vpon your kingly honor, and vpon your clemencie and pietie, wherewith you are indued, I commit them vnto you, desiring you to imbrace and receiue them according to your humanitie and benignitie, agreeing and conuenient to your estate: who in so doing shall now both procure to your selfe grace through your faith, and also shall declare to me a great pleasure and benefit worthie of thankes.

The generall care of godly Constantinus for all christians in all places.

Great cruelty vsed.

Great crueltie practised.

Counterfeiting the cause of cruelty.

This cruell tyrant wrote Constantinus to king Sapores, such care had this godly prince for them that beleeued in Christ, not onely in his owne monarchie, but also in all places of the world: neither is it to bee doubted but this intercession of the emperor did something mittigate the heate of the Persians persecution, although therof we reade not certaine thing in our histories.

Of other troubles and persecutions we reade, which happened afterward in the said countrie of Persia, vnder Ishigerdes the king, but these followed long after about the time of the emperor Theodosius. At which time suffred Andas their bishop, and Dominda a great noble mans sonne, and of great reputation among the Persians, whom when the king vnderstood to be a christian, and to denie to turne from his religion, condemned him to keepe his elephants naked. In processe of time, the king looking out and seeing him all swarted and tanned in the sunne, commanded him to haue a shirt put on, and to bee brought before him, whom then the king asked, if hee would denie Christ. Dominda hearing this, tare off his shirt from his body and cast it from him, saying: If ye thinke that I will sell my my faith to Christ for a shirt, haue here your gift againe, &c. And so was vpon that expelled the countrie: Theodor. lib. 5.

Another there was that same time named Suenes, which had vnder him an hundred seruants. The king taking displeasure with him for that hee would not alter from his religion and godly truth, asked who was the worth of all his seruants, and him the king made ruler of all the rest, and coupling him with his masters wife, brought also Suenes vnder his subiection, thinking thereby to subdue also the faith of Suenes: but it was builded vpon a sure foundation.

Of Benjamin the deacon, thus writeth the said Theodoret in his first booke, that after two yeares of his imprisonment at the request of the Romane legat he was deliuered, who afterward contrarie to the kings commandement preached and taught the gospel of Christ, & was most miserablie excarnificat, hauing twentie sharpe pricks of reeds thrust vnder his nailes; but when hee did laugh at that, then in his pittie yard had a sharpe reed thrust in with horrible paine. After that a certaine long slalke ragged & thornie, being thrust into his body by the nether part, was forced into him, with the horriblenesse of the paine where of the valiant & inuincible souldier of the Lord gaue ouer his life. Theod. ibid. And thus much concerning the martyrs & persecutions among the Persians, although these persecutions belong not to this time, which came (as it is said) long after the daies of Constantinus, about 5 yeare of our Lord, 425.

Whereas vnder Iulian the wicked apostata, certaine there were which constantly suffered martyrdome by the heathen idolaters, as Emilianus who was burned in Thracia, and Domitius which was slaine in his caue. Theodorus also for singing of a psalme at the removing of the body of Babilas (whereof mention is made before) being apprehended, was so examined with exquisite torments, & so cruelly excruciat from morning almost to noone, that hardly hee escaped with life. Who being asked afterward of his friends, how hee could abide so sharpe torments, said that at the first beginning hee felt some paine, but afterward there stood by him a pong man, who as he was sweatting wiped away his sweat, and refreshed him with cold water oftimes: whereby he was so delighted, that when he was led vnto the engin, it grieued him more then hee was before: Ruff. 5. cap. 26. But especially the crueltie of the Arethusians, a people of Syria, exceeded against the christian virgins, whom they set not naked before the multitude to be scorned: after that being driuen, they entered them with shame and traffic from one to another to their hogs, and so caused their bowels and flesh to be deuoured of the hungrie swine. This rage and furie of the wicked Arethusians, Sozomenus supposeth to come of this, because that Constantinus before had broken them from their countrie maner of letting forth and exposing their virgins filthily to whomsoeuer lusted, and destroyed the temple of Venus in Heliopolis, refraining the people there from their filthinesse and vile whoredome. Sozom. lib. 5. cap. 10.

Simeticharpax, Sophocles people of Gaza.

Simeticharpax the people made no bo plucke from their old euerlong, though it be neuer so wicked.

Of the lamentable stozie, or rather tragedie of Marcus Arethusius their bishop, thus writeth the said Sozomenus, and also Theodoretus in his third booke, in these words as follow.

The flocke of Marcus Arethusius.

This tragedie (saith he) of Marcus Arethusius, both require the eloquence and worthinesse of Ecbilius and Sophocles, which may as the matter deserueth, set forth and beautifie his great afflictions. This man, at the commandement of Constantinus, pulled downe a certaine temple dedicated to idols, and in stead thereof built vp a church where the christians might congregat. The Arethusians remembring the little god Iulian that Iulianus bare vnto him, accused him as a traitor and enemie to him. At the first, according as the scripture teacheth, he prepared himselfe to flie: but when hee perceiued that there were certaine of his kinsmen & friends apprehended in his stead, returning againe of his owne accord, he offered himselfe to those that thirsted for his blood. Whom when they had gotten, as men neither pitying his old age and woorne yeares, nor abashed at his honourable conuersation, being a man adorned both with doctrine and manners, first skript him naked, and pitifully beat him: then within a while after, they cast him into a foule filthie sinke, and from thence being brought, they caused boyes to thrust him in with sharpened sticks made for the nonce, to prouoke his paine the more. Lastly, they put him into a basket, and being anointe with honie and milke, they hung him abrode in the heate of the sunne as meate for waspes and flies to feed vpon. And all this extremitie they shewed vnto him, for that they would inforce him to doe one of these things, that is, either to build vp againe the temple which hee had destroyed; or else to giue so much money as should pay for the building of the same: but euen as he purposed with himselfe to suffer and abide their grieuous torments, so refused hee to doe that they demanded of him. At the length they talking him to be but a poore man, & not able to pay such a summe of money, promised to forgiue him the one halfe, so that hee would be contented to pay the other halfe. But hee hanging in the basket wounded pitifully with the sharpened sticks of boyes and children, and all to be bitten with waspes and flies, did not onely conceale his paine & griefe, but also derided those wicked ones, and called them base, low, and terrene people, and he himselfe to bee exalted and set on high. At length they demanding of him but a small summe of money, he answered thus; It is a great wickednesse to conser one halfe-penie in cafe of emptie, as if a man should buckle before the whole. Thus they being not able to preuaile against him, let him downe, and leauing him went their way, so that every man might learne at his mouth the example of true pietie and faithfulnesse.

Although the traction of these forsaid stories and persecutions of Persia, aboue premised, doe stray somewhat out of the order and course of time and place, as which came neither in the time of Constantine nor be pertinent to the monarchie of Rome: yet because in this present history we are in hand with the holy martyrs and saints of Christ; for so much as these also gaue such a faithfull testimonie of the Lord Iesus with their blod, I thought therefore not to passe them ouer without some testimony in this our catalogue of holy martyrs. And herean end of these persecutions of the primitive church.

It may peraduenture bee marueiled of some, reading the history of these so terrible persecutions aboue specified, why God the almightie diuine of all things, would suffer his owne people and faithfull seruants, belonging in his owne ans onely begotten sonne Iesus, so cruelly to bee handled, so wrongfully to be vexed, so extremely to bee tormented and put to death, and that the space of so many yeares together, as in these foresaid persecutions may appeare. To the which admiration I haue nothing to answer, but to say with the words of Hyeroni, Non debemus super hac rerum iniquitate perturbari, videntes, &c. We ought not to be mooued with this iniquitie of things, to see the wicked to preuaile against the godly: for so much as in the beginning of the world we see Abel the iust to be slaine of wicked Cain, and afterward Iacob being thrust out, Esau to reigne in his fathers house: in like case the Egyptians with bricke and tile afflicted the sonnes of Israel, yea and the Lord himselfe, was hee not crucified of the Iewes, Barrabas the theefe being let goe? Time would not suffice me to recite and reckon vp how the godly in this world goe to wracke, the wicked flourishing and preuailing: Hiero. Briefly, howsoeuer the cause hereof proceedeth, whether for our sinnes here in this life, or how else soeuer, yet this is to vs, and may bee to all men a sufficient say, that we are sure these afflictions and persecutions of God his people in this world, not to come by any chance or blind fortune, but by the prouident appointment and fore warning of God. For so in the old law by the affliction of the children of Israel, he hath prefigured these persecutions of his christians. So by the words of Christs owne mouth in the gospell, hee did foreinarne his church of these troubles to come. Againe, neither did he suffer these so great afflictions to fall vpon his seruants, before that hee had pronounished them sufficiently by speciall reuelation in the Apocalyps of John his seruant, in the which Apocalyps hee declared vnto his church before, not onely what troubles were comming at hand towards them, where and by whom they should come, but also in plaine number, if the words of the prophesie bee well vnderstood, assigneth the true time how long the said persecutions should continue, and when they should cease. For as there is no doubt, but by the beast with seuen heads, bearing the whore of Babylon, drunken with the blud of saints, is signified the citie of Rome: so in my iudgement the power of making forty two moneths (in the xiij. tenth of the Apocalyps) is to be expounded, taking euery moneth for a sabbath of yeares, that is, reckoning for seuen yeares a moneth: so that forty and two such sabbaths of yeares, being gathered together, make vp the yeares iust, betweene the time of Christs death, to the last yeare of the persecution of Diocletian, when Constantinus fighting vnder the banner of Christ, ouercame him, and made an end of all persecution within the monarchie of Rome. The number of which yeares by plaine computation, come to two hundred nin-tie and foure: to the which two hundred ninetie and foure yeares, if ye adde the other six yeares, vnder the persecution of Licinius in Asia, then it filleth vp full the three hundred yeares. And so long continued the persecution of Christs people vnder the heathen tyrants, and emperors of the monarchie of Rome, according to the number of the forty two moneths which the beast had power to make, specified in the thirteenth of Apocalyps. For the better explication whereof, because the matter being of no small importance greatly appertaineth to the publike vtilitie of the church, and left any shadow of doubt or darkenesse in it, to follow any priuate interpretation of mine owne, I thought good to communicate to the reader, which hath been imparted vnto me, in the opening of these mysticall numbers in the foresaid booke of Reuelation contained, by occasion as followeth.

As I was in hand with these histories, and therein considered the exceeding rage of these persecutions, the intollerable torments of the blessed saints, so cruelly racke, rent, tome, and plucked in peeces with all kind of tortures, paines and punishments that could bee deuised, more bitter then any death it selfe; I could not without great sorrow and passion of mind behold their sorrowfull afflictions, or write of their bloodie passions. Wherein much like it happened to me as did to Titus Liuius, who writing of the wars of Carthage, was so moued in the writing thereof: Aegri in parte aliqua laboris ac periculi ipse pariter fuisse. Further I proceeded in the storie, and the hoter the persecutions grew, the more my griefe with them and for them increased, not onely pitying their wofull case, but also almost reasoning with God, thus thinking like a foole with my selfe, why God of his godnesse would suffer his children and seruants so vehemently to bee cruciated and afflicted. If mortall things were gouerned by heauenly prouidence (as must needs be granted) why did the wicked so rage and flourish and the godly goe so to wracke? If sinnes deserued punishment, yet neither were they sinners alone, and why was their death aboue all other so sharpe and bitter? At least why would the Lord suffer the vehemency of these so horrible persecutions to indure so long time against his poore church, hearing into them no certaine determined end of their tribulations, whereby they knowing the appointed determination of almighty God, with more consolation might indure out the same? As the Israelites in the captiuitie of Babylon had seuentie yeares limited vnto them: and vnder Pharao they were promised a deliuerance out. Also vnder the Syrian tyrants three score and two weekes were abridged vnto them. Onely in these persecutions I could find no end determined, nor limitation set to their deliuerance. Whereupon much marueiling with my selfe, I searched the booke of Reuelation, to see whether any thing there might be found; where although I well perceiued the beast there described to signifie the empire of Rome, which had power to ouercome the saints, yet concerning the time and continuance of these persecutions vnder the beast, I found nothing to satisfie my doubt. For albeit I read there, of forty two months, of a time, times, and halfe a time, of one thousand two hundred and three score daies; yet all this by computation comming but to three yeares and a halfe, came nothing neere the long continuance of these persecutions, which lasted three hundred peres. Thus being vexed and turmoiled in spirit, about the reckoning of these numbers and peares, it so happened vpon a sunday in the morning lying in my bed, and musing about these numbers, suddenly it was answered to my mind, as with a maiestie, thus inwardly saying within me: Thou fole, coulcest these moneths by sabbaths, as the weekes of Daniel are counted by sabbaths. The Lord I take to witnesse this it was. Whereupon thus being admonished, I began to reckon the forty two months by sabbaths: first of moneths, that would not serue: then by sabbaths of peares, wherein I began to smile some probable vnderstanding. Yet not satisfied herewith, to haue more sure euidence I repaired to certaine merchants of mine acquaintance: of whom one is departed a true faithful seruant of the Lord, the other two be yet aliue, and witnesse hereof. To whom the number of these foresaid forty two moneths being propounded, examined by sabbaths of peares, the whole summe was found to surmount vnto two hundred ninetie and foure yeares, containing the full and iust time of these foresaid persecutions, neither more nor lesse.

How this one clasp being opened, the other numbers that follow are plaine and manifest to the intelligent reader to bee vnderstood. For where mention is made of three peares and a halfe, of one time, two times and halfe a time, also of one thousand two hundred and three score daies, all these come to one reckoning and signifie forty & two moneths, by which months, as is said, is signified the whole time of these primitiue persecutions, as here in order may appeare.

The mysticall numbers in the Apocalyps opened.

FIrst, where mention is made, Apocalyps, chapt. eleuen, that the two prophets shall prophesie 1260 daies; and also that the woman flying into the desert shall there be fed 1260 daies: who knoweth not that 1260 daies make three yeares and a halfe? that is, moneths ——— 42.

1 One thousand two hundred and sixtie. Reuel. 11. 12.

Secondly, where we reade, cap. 12. the bodies of the two foresaid prophets shall lie in the streets of the great citie vnburied the space of three daies and a halfe, and after the said three daies and a halfe they shall reuiue againe, & collect the houres of these three daies and a halfe (which be 42.) be reckoned euery day for a sabbath of yeares, or else euery day for a moneth, and they come to moneths ——— 42.

2 Three daies and a halfe. Reuel. 11.

Thirdly, wheresas in the same booke is expressed that the woman had two wings giuen her to flie vnto the desert for a time, times, and halfe a time: giue for one time one yeare, or one day; for two times, two yeares or two daies; for halfe a time, halfe a yeare, or halfe a day; & so it is manifest that these three yeares and a halfe, mount to moneths 42.

3 A time, times, and halfe a time. Reuel. 12.

Fourthly, account these forty two moneths aforesaid (which the beast had power to make, Apoc. 11.) by sabbath of yeares, that is, seuen yeares for a moneth, or euery moneth for seuen yeares; and it amounteth to the sum of yeares ——— 294.

4 Forty two moneths or three yeares and a halfe. Reuel. 11.

And so haue ye the iust peres, daies, times, & moneths of these foresaid persecutions vnder the beast, neither shorter nor longer, reckoning from the death of Iohn Baptist vnder Herod the Romane king to the end of Sparentius, and of Licinius, the two last great persecutors, the one in the west, the other in the east, who were both vanquished by godly Constantius. And so peace was giuen to the church, albeit not in such ample sort, but that diuers tumults & troubles afterward insued, but they lasted not long; and the chiefe brunt, to speake of these Romane persecutions persecutions which the Holie ghost especiallie considered aboue all other in this Reuelation thus ended in the time of this Constantinus. Then was the great dragon the diuell, to wit, the fierce rage and power of his malicious persecuting, tied short for a thousand yeares after this, so that he could not preuaile in any such sort, but that the power and glory of the gospell by little and little increasing and spreading with great voice and liberte, so preuailed that at length it got the vpper hand and replenished the whole earth, rightlie deriuing therein the water of Ezechiel, which issuing out of the right side of the altar, the further it ran, the deeper it grew, till at length it reuiued the whole Ocean sea, and healed all the fishes therin. Ezech. 47.

Do other wise the course of the gospell proceeding of small and hard beginnings, kept still his streame; the more it was stopped, the swifter it ran; by bloud it seded, by death it quickened, by cutting it multiplied, though violence it spring; till at last out of thaldome and oppression it brast forth into perfect liberte, and flourished in all prosperitie, had it so been that the Christian wisedom and moderatie could haue vsed this rest and liberte, and not abused the same, forgetting their former estate to their owne pride, pompe, and worldlie ease, as it came afterward to passe, whereof more is to be seene and said (the Lord willing) in place and time conuenient.

And thus much touching the prophetical numbers in the Apocalyps. Wherein is to be noted and magnified the eternall wisdome and prouidence of almightie God, so disposing and gouerning his church, that no aduersitie or perturbation happeth at any time to it, which his prouident wisdome doth not foresee before and prezodeine; neither doth he prezodeine or determine any thing which he doth not most truelie perfourme, both for seeing the beginning of such persecutions, and limiting the end therof how long to continue and when to ceasle. In much like sort we read in the books of Genesis, how the flocke of Israel was foure hundred yeres in the land of Egypt: During the space of which foure hundred peeres, after the death of Ioseph (who, beareth a plaine figure of Christ) they were hardlie intreated and cruellie afflicted of the Egyptians, about the space of three hundred yeres, reckoning from after the death of Ioseph, to their deliuerance out of the bondage of Egypt, semblable as these christians, after Christs time suffered the like bondage vnder the Romane tyrants. The perfecuted Israelits bearing a figure of the persecuted church of Christ.

Thus much by the waie I thought to insinuat, lest any should muse, or take any offence in himselfe, to see or read of the church so long and so many peeres to be vnder so miserable and extreme afflictions: wherein neither chance nor fortune, nor disposition of man, hath had any place, but onlie the foreprouision and determination of the Lord so gouerned and disposed the same, who not onlie did suffer them to fall, and foresaw those persecutions before they fell, but also appointed the times and peeres how long they should last, and when to haue an end, as by the foresaid forty two moths in the thirteenth and eleuenth chapters of S. Johns Apocalyps hath been declared. Which months conteining two hundred ninetie and foure peeres, if they be rightlie gathered, make the full time betweene the first peere of the persecution of Christ vnder the Iewes and Herod, till the last peere of persecution vnder Licinius, which was from the natiuitie of Christ in the peere of our Lord three hundred twentie and foure, from the first persecution of Christ in the peere of our Lord two hundred ninetie and foure, as is aboue said. After the which peere according to the prezodinat counsell of God, when his seueritie had been sufficientlie declared vpon his owne house, it pleased him to shew mercy againe, & to bind vp sathan the old serpent, according to the twentith chapter of the Reuelation, for the space of a thousand yeares, that is, from this time of Licinius, to the time of John Wicliffe, and John Husse. During all which time, albeit certeine conflicts and tumults haue been among christian bishops themselues in the church, yet no vniuersall murthering persecution was stirring before the preaching of John Wicliffe & Husse, and such others, as in the further processe of this history (Christ willing and aiding) by all meane appeere heereafter. From the first persecution of the primitiue church to the last persecution two hundred ninetie & foure peeres. Antiochus persecution ceaseth for one thousand yeres in the church: Apoc. 20. From the time of Licinius, to Wicliffe one thousand yeres. Sathan bound by for a thousand yeeres. The time of Sathans binding opened.

Thus hauing at large discoursed these horrible persecutions past, and heauie afflictions of christian martyrs, now by the grace of God, comming out of this red sea of bloudie persecution, leauing Pharao and his host behind: let vs sing glorious vnto the worthie name of our God, who through the bloud of the lambe after long and tedious afflictions, at length hath visited his people with comfort, hath tied vp sathan short, hath sent his meeke Moses, gentle Constantine I meane, by whom it hath so pleased the Lord to worke deliuerance to his captiue people, to set his seruants at liberte, to turne their mourning into ioie, to magnifie the church of his sonne, to destroie the idols of all the world, to grant life and liberte (and would God effects of all the world, to grant life and liberte (and would God also not to much riches!) vnto them which before were the abiects of all the world, and all by the meanes of godlie Constantinus the meeke and most christian emperor, of whose diuine victories against so many tyrants and emperors, persecutors of Christs people; and last like against Licinius, in the peere of our Lord, three hundred twentie and foure, of whose other noble acts & prowesses, of whose blessed vertues and his happy birth and progen'e part we haue comprehended before, part now remaineth (Christ willing) to be declared.

This Constantine was the sonne of Constantius the emperor, a good and vertuous child of a good and vertuous father, borne in Britanie (as saith Eutropius) whose mother was named Helena, daughter indeed of king Coilus: although Ambrosius in his funerall oration of the death of Theodosius saith, the was an inholders daughter. He was a most bountifull and gratious prince, hauing a desire to nourish learning and good arts, and did oftentimes vse to reade, write, and studie himselfe. He had marueilous good successe & prosperous atchiuing of all things he take in hand, which then was (and truelie) supposed to proceed of this, for that he was to great a fauorer of the christian faith. Which faith when he had once embraced, he did euer after most deuoutlie and religiouslie reuerence, and commanded by especiall commaundment & proclamation, that euerie man should professe the same religion throughout all the Romane monarchie. The worshipping of idols, whereunto he was addict by the allurement of Fausta his wife, in so much that he did sacrifice to them, after the discomfiture of Maxentius in battell, he vtterlie abiured: but baptisme he deferred euen vnto his old age, because he had determined a iournie into Persia, & thought in Iordan to haue been baptised. Euseb lib. 4. de vita Constantini. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9. Euseb. lib. de vita Constan. The good gouernance of Constantine. The cause of all his prosperous successe. Constantine sometime by meanes of his wife was an idolater.

As touching his naturall disposition and wit, he was verie eloquent, a good philosopher, and in disputation sharp and ingenious. He was accustomed to say, that an emperor ought to refuse no labo; for the vtilitie of the common weale: yea, and that to aduenture the mangling of his bodie for the remedie thereof; but if other wise it may be holpen, to cherish the same. The common saying of Constantinus.

This Zoe Aurelius, Victor, Zosimus, Letus, and Ignatius write of him. And Aelius Lampridius saith, writing vpon the life of Heliogabalus; that Constantinus was wont to say, that an empire was giuen by the determinat purpose of God, that he to whom it was giuen, should so employe his diligence, as he might be thought worthie of the same at the hands of the giuer; which same saying also Augustine noteth in his third booke against Cresconius, Epist. 49. and 50. Augustin contra Cresco. epist. 49.50.

He first entered into the empire by the mercifulnesse of God, minding after long traues of bodilull persecution to restore vnto his church peace and tranquillitie in the peere of our Lord three hundred and eleuen, as Eusebius accounteth in his chronicle. His reigne continued, as Eutropius affirmeth, thirtie yeres, Letus saith thirtie and two yeres lacking two months. Great peace and tranquillitie insoted the church vnder the reigne of this good emperor, which take great paine and trauell for the preseruation thereof. First, yea and that before he had subdued Licinius, he set forth many edicts for the restitution of the gods of the church, for the reuoking of the christians out of exile, for taking away the distension of the deacons out of the church, for the setting of them free from publike charges and such like, euen as the copie of his constitutions here vnder declareth, which Eusebius in his tenth book and fift chapter repeateth in this wise. The raigne of Constantinus. The effect of some of his constitutions.

The copie of an epistle of Constantinus, sent to his subiects inhabiting in the east. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

VIctor Constantinus Maximus Augustus, to our louing subiects inhabiting throughout the east parts, sendeth greeting. The thing it selfe which in the sure and most firme law of nature is contained, doth giue vnto all men (euen as God hath ordained the same) sufficient perceiuerance and vnderstanding, both of such things as man ought to foresee, as also what things presently he ought to meditate. Neither is there any thing therin to be doubted of such as haue their minds directed to the scope or marke of perfect vnderstanding: so that the perfect comprehending of sound reason, & the perceiuerance thereof be compared with the knowledge of God, being the true and perfect vertue. Wherfore let no wise man be troubled, although he sees diuers men of diuers dispositios: for wisdome which springeth of vertue, cannot abide or acquaint her selfe with fond idiots, vnlesse that (on the other side) the malice of peruerse lithernesse prolong her daies, and cause the same idiocie to furuiue. Wherefore assuredlie the crowne and price of vertue lieth open vnto all men, and the most mighty God ordereth the iudgement of the same. I vndoubtedly (as manifestlie as possible is) will indeuour my selfe to satisfie and confesse vnto you al the hope which is in me. I thinke verily that the emperors which before this time haue lately been, euen for their tyrannie had the empire taken from them: and my father onely exercising and vsing all meeknesse and lenitie in his affaires, calling vpon God the father with great deuotion and humilitie, hath been exalted to the same: and all the rest as men wanting their wits, and in comparison as sauage beasts, rather did giue themselues to like cruelty, then vnto any lenity and gentlenes towards their subiects: in which tyranny euery one for his time being nuzzelled, vtterly subuerted the true and vnfallible doctrine, and so great malice was there kindled in their breasts, that whie all things were in peaceable tranquillitie, they made and raised most cruell and bloudie intestine or ciuill warres. It is credibly informed vs, that in those daies Apollo gaue answers, but not by any mans mouth, but out of a certaine caue and darke place (saying) that he was much disquieted by those that were the iust men & liuers vpon the Tyrannie bee priuily empowred. Bloodie & tyrants make ciuill warres. Apollo gaue answer out of a caue in the ground, that he was disquieted by the christians.

the earth, so that he could or would not for them declare a truth of such things as others demanded. And heerby it came to passe that such false diuinations were giuen from the golden tables in Apollos temple. And in this thing did his prophetical priest complaine of, when he tooke vp againe the haire of his head, that other had contemptuouslie cast downe, and that the neglecting of his diuination was the cause of so manie euils amongst men. But let vs see what was the end hereof. We now boldlie and without all feare inuocar & worship the omnipotent God. When I was a child I heard, that he which then was chefe emperor of Rome, vnhappie, yea most vnhappie man, being seduced and brought into error by his souldiors, curiouslie inquired who were those iust men vpon the earth that Apollo ment? And one of his priests which was neere about him, made answer that they were the christians. This answer hereupon vnto him being as delectable as honie vnto the mouth, drew the sword giuen vnto him, to be a reuenger vpon euill doers & malefactors against the professors of the vnreprehensible sanctimonie and religion, and straightwaie he gaue forth a commission (to bloudie homicides, as I may well call them) and gaue commandement to all the iudges that they should endeuor themselues with all the cunning they had, to the deuising of more greeuous and sharper punishments against the poore christians. Then, then liue, a man might haue seene how greatlie the harmelesse professors of that religion were molested with cruelties, and dailie suffered no small iniuries and contumelies, and that also they suffered & susteined the same with such temperance, as though they had had no iniuries done vnto them at all. Which temperance and patience of theirs was the cause why the furious citizens were the more mad and raging against them. What feare, what torures, what kind of torments were there, but they without respect either of age or sexe were inforced to feele?

Then did the earth without doubt hir selfe bewaile hir children; and the round world which conteineth all things, being sprinkled and imbrued with their bloud, made dolefull lamentatiõ for them, and the daie it selfe prouoked for to mourne, was made amazed for them. But what is this to purpose? Now the verie barbarous nations reioice for their liues which receiued and harboured them, when they were afraid and fled vnto vs, keeping them as it were in most louing and amiable captiuitie: & they saued not onlie their liues, but also were a defense for their religion. And now also the Romane nation remembreth and hath before their eies this blame and spot, which the christians that were of that time worthilie gaue vnto them, when they by them were banished (as vnfit members of their common wealth) amongst the barbarous people. What needeth to make further rehearsall of the mourning lamentation, which the heathen people themselues thoroughout all the world made for the pitifull murther and slaughter of them? After this it came to passe, that they which were authors of all these mischiefs died also, and were committed for their reward to the most filthie and horrible dungeon of hell. They being so intangled with intestine and ciuill warres, that they neither name nor kinsmen of their owne; which thing vndoubtedlie had not chanced vnlesse the wicked diuinations of Apollos oracles had deceiued and bewitched them. To thee therefore now I praie, õh most mightie God, that thou wilt vouchsafe to be merciefull, and pardon all the east parts and inhabitants of the same, being oppressed with calamitie: & that by me thy seruant thou wilt of thy goodnesse helpe & releeue the same. And these things rashlie craue I not at thy hands, õh Lord, most mightie and holiest God of all. For I being persuaded by the onlie oracles, haue both begun and also finished wholesome and profitable things: and further, by the bearing and shewing of thine ensigne, haue ouercome a mightie and strong host, and when any necessitie of the common weale so my charge committed) requireth, I pursue following those signes and tokens of thy vertues) I boldlie go forth and fight against mine enimies: and for this cause haue I sacrificed my soule vnto thee, purified and cleansed both with thy loue and feare. Yea trulie, thy name doe I sincerelie loue, and thy power doe I reuerence, which by many wõders & wonders hast shewed and confirmed thereby my beleefe & faith. Therefore will I doe my endeuor and bend my selfe thereto, that I may redifie thy most holie house, which those vn... and wicked emperors haue with so great ruine laid wast... y people doe I desire to bring and stablish, in firme peace and tranquillitie, & that for the publike vtilitie of all the inhabitants of the earth. Those which yet erre and are out of the waie, enioie the benefit of peace and quietnesse, with and amongst the number of the faithfull fort: for I trust the restitution of the like societie and participation may be a meanes to bring them also that erre into the perfect waie of veritie. Let no man therefore be greeuous one vnto another, but what euerie man thinketh best, that let him doe: for such as are wise ought throughlie to be persuaded, that the onlie meane to liue hollie, & as they should doe, whom the spirit of God moueth, to take their delight and recreation in reading his holie vtil: and if others wilfullie will go out of the waie, cleauing to the synagogues of false doctrine, they may at their owne perill. As for vs, we haue the most worthie house or congregation of Gods veritie, which he according to his owne goodnesse and nature hath giue vs. And this also we with vnto them, that with like participation and common consent, they may feele with vs the same delectation of mind. For this our religion is neither new, nor newlie inuented, but is as old as we beleeue the creatiõ of the world to be, and which God hath commanded to be celebrated with such worship as both seemed and pleased him: but all liuing men are liers, and are deceiued with diuers and sundrie illusions. Thou õh God for Christ thy sonnes sake, suffer not this wickednesse againe to root: thou hast set vp a cleere burning light, that thereby as manie as thou hast chosen may come vnto thee, these thy miracles approoue the same. It is thy power that keepeth vs in innocencie and fidelitie. The sunne and the moone run their appointed course: Neither yet in ranging wise wander the starres to what place of the world they list themselues. The daies, yeeres, months and times keepe their appointed turnes. The earth abideth sinne and vnremooueable at thy word, and the wind at the time (by thee directed) bloweth and bloweth. The streaming waterie floods ebbe in time according as they flow. The raging sea abideth within hir bounded limits: & for that the ocean sea stretcheth out hir selfe in equall length and breadth with the whole earth, this must needes be wrought with some maruellous workmanship of thine owne hand. Which thing vnlesse it were at thy will made and disposed, without all doubt so great difference & partition betweene, would ere this time haue brought vtter ruine and destruction, both to the life of man, as to all that belongeth to man beside. Which for that they haue such great and huge conflicts amongst themselues, as also the inuisible spirits haue, we giue thee thanks õh Lord most mightie God of all gods, that all mankind hath not beene destroied thereby. Surelie, euen as greatlie as thy benignitie and gentlenes is manifested by diuers & seuerie benefits bestowed vpon vs, so much also is the same set forth and declared in the discipline of thy eternall word, to those that be heauenlie wise, & applie themselues to the attainment of sincere and true vertue. But if any such there be that little regard, or haue but small respect vnto the consideration thereof, let them not blame or lay a fault in others that doe the same: for that physicke whereby health is obteined, is manifestlie offered vnto all men. Now therefore let no man go about to subuert that, which experience & veritie shew (of necessitie) to be pure and good. Let vs therefore altogether vse the participation of this benefit bestowed vpon vs, that is to saie, the benefit of peace & tranquillitie, setting apart all controuersie. And let no man hurt or be preiudicial to his fellow for that thing wherin he thinketh himselfe to haue done well. If by that, which any man knoweth and hath experience of, he thinketh he may profit his neighbour, let him doe the same; if not, let him giue ouer and rest: it till an other time: for there is a great diuersitie betwixt the willing and voluntarie imbracing of religion, and that when a man is thereunto inforced and coacted. Of these things haue I made a more large discourse, then indeed the scope of mediocritie requireth; especiallie because I would not haue my faith (touching the veritie) to be hid, for I haue thought it to be some-what to complaine the old accustomed haunting of their temples, and that the power of such darknesse is cut off and taken awaie. Which thing surelie I would take in better part, were it not that the violent rebellion of flagitious error were so fixed in manie mens hearts, whereby they thirst after the vtter subuersion of the common weale and empire.

Such was the goodnesse of this emperor Constantinus, or rather such was the prouidence of almightie God toward his church in stirring him vp, that all his care and studie of mind was set vpon nothing els, but onlie how to benefit and inlarge the commodities of the same. Neither was it to him inough to deliuer the church and people of God from outward beration of tyrants and persecutors, but also he beneficiall vnto his godlie care also in quieting the inward distentions and iarres bance within the church, among the Christian bishops themselues, according as we read of Moses the deliuerer of the Israelits, in agreeing the brethren together when he saw them at variance: Exod. 2. No lesse also did his vigilant studie extend in erecting, restoring, and inriching the churches of God in all cities, and in prouiding for the ministers of the same. And therfore writing to Christinus his chefe Captaine, declareth his will and mind to him in letters concerning the goods which did appertaine to the churches of the christians, that he should procure vigilantlie for the same: that all such goods, houses, & gardens, belonging before to the right of churches, should againe be restored in all speedie wise, and that he therein might be certified with speed, &c.

Moreouer, he writing to the said Anilinus in an other letter, signifieth vnto him in this effect: that For so much as the contempt of God his reuerend religion, is and hath beene euer the greatest decaie to the name and people of Rome, as contrarie the maintchning & reuerencing the same hath euer brought prosperitie to all commonweales: therefore he in consideration thereof hath taken that order, and giueth to him in charge, that through out that prouince where he hath to doe, which was in Africa where Cecilianus was bishop, he should there see and prouide that all such ministers and clerks, whose vocation was to serue in the church, should be freed and exempted from all publike duties and burthens, whereby they being so priuileged, and all impediments remoued which should hinder their diuine ministration, thereby the common vtilitie of the people might the better flourish, &c.

Furthermore the said Constantinus in an other letter writing to Dulcatius bishop of Rome, and to Marcus, declareth in his letters to them how Cecilianus bishop of Carthage hath here accused vnto him by diuers of his colleagues and fellow bishops. Wherfore his will is, that the said Cecilianus with ten bishops his accusers, with ten other his defendants should repaire vp to him at Rome, where in the present assistance of the foresaid Militiades, Rheticius, Maternus, Marinus, and of other their fellow colleagues, the cause of Cecilianus might be heard and rightlie examined, so that all schisme and diuision might be cut off from among them, wherein the feruent desire of Constantinus to peace and vnitie may well appeere.

Vpon the like cause and argument also, he writeth to Chrestus bishop of Syracusa, to desirous to nourish peace and concord in the church, that he affectedly to him with his vnder ministers and three seruants, his free carriage to come vp to him vnto the councell of other bishops, for the agreeing of certaine matters belonging to the church.

He writeth also an other letter to the foresaid Cecilianus bishop of Carthage.

To the prouinces likewise of Palestina and those parts about, he directeth his edict in the behalfe of the Christians, for the releasing of such as were in captiuitie, and for the restoring again of them which had suffered any losse in the former persecution before, and for the restelling of such as heretofore had beene oppressed with any ignominie or molestation for their confession sake, declaring in the said edict how that this whole bodie, life and soule, and what soeuer was in him, he oweth to God and to the seruice of him, &c.

Moreouer an other letter he writeth to Eusebius, for the deuising of new christian churches, and restoring of them which had beene wasted before by forren enimies. And after he had collected the synod of Nice for the studie of peace and vnitie of the church, he writeth vpon the same to Alexander and Arrius. In which his letters he most lamentablie vttered the great greefe of his heart, to see and heare of their contention and diuision, whereby the peace and communion & harmonie of the church was broken, the synod prouoked and resisted, the holie people of the Lord deuided into parts and tumults, contrarie to the office of gods and circumspect men, whose dutie were rather to nourish concord & to seeke tranquillitie. And though in some small points and light trifles they did disagree from others, yet as the example of philosophers might teach them, who although in some part of a sentence or peece of a question, some might differ from others, yet in the vnitie of their profession they did all ioine as fellowes together. In like case were it their dutie in such fruitfull questions (or rather peeces of questions) to keepe them in the conceptions of their minds in silence vnto themselues, & not to bring them forth into publike synods, to breake thereby from the communion of the reuerend councel: declaring moreouer in the said epistle, the first, figure and occasiõ of all this their contentious dissension to rise vpon vaine and trifling termes, vile causes and light questions, and peeces rather of questions, about such matters as neither are to be moued, nor to be answered vnto being moued; more curious to be searched, and perilous to be expelled, then necessarie to be inquired, Magisque puerilibus ineptijs, quàm facerdotum ac cordatorum virorum prudentiæ conuenientia; as he there doth term them. Wherefore by all manner meanes he both labour them, both intreat them, and persuade them, not onlie with reasons, but also with teares and sighing sobs, that they would resloze againe peace vnto the church, and quietnesse to the rest of his life (which otherwise would not be sweet vnto him) and that they would returne againe to the communio of the reuerend councell, who in so doing should open his wals and purpose to runne into the eall parts: which other vnle hearing of their discord and dissension, would be loth to see with his eies that which greeueth him now to heare with his eares: with much more in the same epistle conteined, but this is the effect of the whole: Euseb. de vita Const. lib. 2. Thus much I thought summarille to comprehend, whereby the diuine disposition and singular gentle nature of this meeke and religious Constantine might more notoriouslie appeere to all princes, & others to learne by his example what zeale and care they ought to beare toward the church of Christ, and how gentle to gouerne, and how to be beneficiall to the same.

Manie other edicts and epistles written to other places and parties, be expelled at large in the second booke of Eusebius, De vita Constantini, wherein the zealous care and pitifull beneficence of this noble emperor toward the church of Christ may appeere: whereof in a breefe recapitulation such specialities we haue collected as here followeth, and is to be seene in Sozo. lib. 1. cap. 8. 9.

First he commanded all them to be set free, whosoeuer for the confession of Christ had beene condemned to banishment, or to the mines of metall, or to any publike or priuate labour to them inflicted. Such as were put to any infamie or shame among the multitude, he willed them to be discharged from all such blemish of ignominie. Souldiors which before were deprined either of their place, or put out of their wages, were put to their libertie either to serue againe in their place, or quietlie to liue at home. Whatsoeuer honor, place or dignitie had been taken away from any man, should be restored to them againe. The goods and possessions of them that had suffered death for Christ, howsoeuer they were alienated, should returne to their heires or next of kin, or for lacke of them should be giuen to the church. He commanded moreouer that onelie Christians should beare office; the other be charged and restrained, that neither they should sacrifice nor exercise any more diuinations and ceremonies of the gentils, nor set vp any images, nor to keepe any feasts of the heathen idolaters. He corrected moreouer and abolished all such vnlawfull maners and vnhonest vsages in cities as might be hurtfull any waies to the church, as the custome that the Egyptians had in the flowing of Nilus, at what time the people vsed to run together like brute beasts, both men and women, and with all kind of filthinesse and sodomitrie to pollute their cities in celebrating the increase of that riuer. This abomination Constantine extinguished, causing that wicked order called Androgyne, to be filled: by reason whereof the riuer afterward (though the benefit of God) yeelded more increase in his flowing, to the greater fertilitie of the ground then before.

Among the Romans was an old law, that such as were barren, hauing no fruite of children, should be amerced of halfe their gods. Also, that such as being aboue the yeeres of twentie and fiue vnmaried, should not be numbred in the same priuileges with them that were maried, neither should be heires to them, to whom notwithstanding they were next in kin. These lawes because they seemed vnreasonable, to punish the defect of nature or gift of virginitie by mans law, he abrogated and tooke away. An other order was among the Romans, that they which made their wils being sicke, had certaine prescribed and coccined words appointed to them to vse, which vnlesse they followed, their wils stood in no effect. This law also Constantine repealed, permitting to euerie man in making his testament to vse what words or what writing he list. Also whereas among the Romans he refreined and take away the cruell and bloudie spectales and fights, where men were wont with swords one to kill an other. Of the barbarous and filthie fashion of the Arethusians in Phœnicia, I haue mentioned before, where they vsed to oppole and set forth their virgins to open fornication before they should be maried, which custome also Constantine remoued awaie. Where no churches were, there he commanded new to be made; where any were beside, he commanded them to be reparcd; where any were to little, he caused them to be inlarged, giuing to the same great gifts and reuenues, not onlie of such tributes and tares comming to him from certaine sundrie cities, which he transferred vnto the churches, but also out of his owne treasures. When any bishops required any councell to be had, he satisfied their petitions; and that in their councels and synods they stabbished, being godlie and bowld, he was redie to confirme the same.

The armor of his souldiors which were newlie come from gentilitie, he garnished with the armes of the crosse, whereby they might learne the sooner to forget their old superstitious idolatrie. Moreouer like a worthie emperor he prescribed a certaine forme of praier in stead of a catechisme to euerie man to haue, and to learne how to praie and to inuocat God. The which forme of praier is recited in the fourth booke of Eusebius De vita Constantini, in words as followeth.

Te solum nouimus Deum, te regem cognoscimus, te adiutorem inuocamus, abs te victorias referimus, per te victorias inuicorum constituimus, tibi præsentium bonorum gratiam accepta ferimus, & per te futura quoque speramus, tibi supplices sumus omnes: imperatorem nostrum Constantinum, ac pientissimos eius filios, in longissima vita incolumes nobis ac victores custodire supplices oramus, per Christum Dominum nostrum: Amen. In English:

We knowledge thee onlie to be our God, we confesse thee to be our king, we inuocat and call vpon thee our onlie helper, by thee we obteine our victories, by thee we banquilh and subdue our enimies, to thee we attribute whatsoeuer present commodities we enioie, & by thee we hope for good successe vnto these our priuat & our state and petitions, most humblie beseeching thee to conserue Constantine our emperor, and his noble children in long life to continue, and to giue them victorie ouer all their enimies, through Christ our Lord: Amen.

In his owne palace he set vp an house peculiar for praier and doctrine, wherin also to praie and sing with his people. All so in his iournes he kept not without his tabernacle appointed for the same. The sundaie he commanded to be kept holie of all men, and free from all iudiciarie causes, from markets, marts, faires, and all other manuall labors, onlie husbandrie excepted; especiallie charging that no images or monuments of idolatrie should be set vp.

Span of the clergie and of the ministerie in all places he indued with speciall priuileges and immunities, so that if any were brought before the ciuill magistrat, and listed to appeale to the sentence of his bishop, it should be lawfull for him so to doe, and that the sentence of the bishop should stand in as great force as if the magistrat or the emperor himselfe had pronounced it.

¶ But here is to be obserued and noted by the waie, that the clerkes and ministers then newlie creeping out of persecution, were in those daies neither in number so great, nor in order of life, of the like disposition to these in our daies now liuing.

The munificence and liberalitie of Constantine in maintaining scholes.

No lesse care and prouision the said Constantinus also had for the maintenance of scholes perteining to the church, and to the nourishing of good arts and liberall sciences, especiallie of diuinitie, not onlie with stipends & subsidies furnishing them, but also with large priuileges and exemptions defending the same, as by the words of his owne law is to be seene and read as followeth: Medicos, grammaticos, & alios professores literarum, & doctores legum, cum vxoribus & liberis, &c. In England: Physicians, grammarians, and all other professors of liberall arts, and doctors of the law, with their wiues and children, and all other their possessions which they haue in cities, we command to be freed from all ciuill charges and functions, neither to receiue forren strangers in prouinces, nor to be burthened with any publike administration, nor to be cited vp to ciuill iudgement, nor to be driuen out or oppressed with any iniurie. And if any man shall vex them, he shall incurre such punishment as the iudge at his discretion shall award him. Their stipends moreouer and salaries we command trulie to be paid them, whereby they may more freelie instruct others in arts and sciences, &c.

The priuiledge granted by Constantine to vniuersities and scholes.

Durst and besides this, so far did his godlie zeale and princelie care and prouision extend to the church of Christ, that he commanded and prouided bookes and volumes of the scripture, diligentlie and plainlie to be written and copied out, to remaine in publike churches to the vse of posteritie. Whereupon writing to Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia in a special letter (recorded in the fourth booke of Eusebius, De vita Constant.) he willeth him with all diligence to procure fiftie volumes of parchment well bound and compacted, wherein he should cause to be written out of the scripture in a faire legible hand, such things as he thought necessarie and profitable for the instruction of the church, and alloweth him for that businesse two publike ministers also willeth concerning the same to the Generall of his armie, to support and further him with such necessaries, as thereunto should appertein: &c.

The priuilege of Constantine touching the scripture in churches.

Ex Euseb. lib 4. de vita Const.

¶ In viewing, perusing, and writing this storie, and in considering the christian zeale of this emperor, I wish that either this our printing and plentie of bookes had been in his daies, or that this so heroicall heart toward Christs religion, as was in this so excellent monarch, might something appeare in inferior princes reigning in these our printing daies, &c.

A wish of the author, admonishing princes.

The liberalitie of Constantine towards the poore & needie.

The liberall hand of this emperor bonne to doe all men good, was no lesse also open and readie toward the needie powerie of such, which either by losse of parents or other occasions were not able to helpe themselues: to whom he commanded and prouided due sustenation both of corne and raiment to be ministred out of his owne coffers, to the necessarie releefe of the poore men, women, children, orphans, and widowes. Eusebius de vita Constant. l. 4.

Constantine reuiueth the fourth part of his rents and reuenues.

Finallie, among all the other monuments of his singular clemencie and munificence, this is not to be pretermitted; that through all the empire of Rome and prouinces belonging to the same, not onlie he diminished such taxes, reuenues and imposts, as publikelie were comming to him, but also clerelie remitted and released to the contributors the fourth part of the same.

Donation of Constantine.

This present place would require something to be said of the donation of Constantine, whereupon as vpon their cheefest anchorhold, the bishops of Rome doe ground their supreme dominion and right, cure all the politicall gouernment of the west parts, & the spirituall gouernment of all the other seas and parts of the world. Which donation to be falslie feigned and forged, & not to proceed from Constantine, manie arguments might here be inserted, if leisure from other matters would suffer me.

Reasons and arguments proouing the donation of Constantine to be falsified.

2 First, for that no ancient historie, no; yet doctor, maketh any mention thereof.

3 Manerius reporteth it to be affirmed in the historie of Iodonis. But in the old copies of Isidorus no such thing is to be found.

4 Gratianus the compiler of the decrees, reciteth that decree, not vpon any ancient authoritie, but onlie vnder the title of Dalea.

5 Gelasius is said to giue some testimonie thereof, in Dist. 15. Sancta Romana. But that clause of the said distinction touching that matter in the old ancient books is not extant.

6 Otho Phrisingensis who was about the time of Gratian, after he hath declared the opinion of the fauorers of the papacie affirming this donation to be giuen of Constantine to Silvester the pope, inducth consequentlie the opinion of them that fauor the empire, affirming the contrarie.

7 How doth this agree, that Constantine did yeeld vp to Silvester all the politicall dominion ouer the west, when as the said Constantine at his death, diuiding the empire to his three sonnes, gaue the west part of the empire to one, the east part to the second, the middle part to the third?

8 How is it like that Theodosius after them, being a iust and a religious prince, would or could haue occupied the citie of Rome if it had not been his right, but had belonged to the pope, and so did manie other emperors after him?

9 The phrase of this decree being conferred with the phrase and stile of Constantine in his other edicts and letters aboue specified, doth nothing agree.

10 Seeing the papists themselues confesse that the decree of this donation was written in Greeke, how agreeth that with truth, when as both it was written not to the Grecians, but to the Romans, and also Constantine himselfe for lacke of the Greeke tongue, was faine to vse the Latin tongue in the councell of Nice?

11 The contents of this donation (whosoeuer was the forger thereof) doth bewraie it selfe: for if it be true which there is confessed, that he was baptized at Rome of Silvester, the fourth daie after his baptisme this patrimonie was giuen, which was before his battell against Maximinus or Licinius, in the yere of our Lord three hundred and seuentene, as Nicephorus recordeth, how then accordeth this with that which followeth in the donation, for him to haue iurisdiction giuen ouer the other foure principall sees of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Hierusalem: when as the citie of Constantinople was not yet begun before the death of Maximinus or Licinius, and was not finished before the eight & twentith yere of the reigne of Constantine in the yere of our Lord three hundred thirtie and nine: or if it be true, as Hierome counteth, it was finished the three & twentith yere of his reigne, which was the yere of our Lord three hundred thirtie and foure, long after this donation by their owne account.

12 Furthermore, where in the said constitution is said that Constantine was baptized at Rome of Silvester, and thereby was purged of leprosie; the fable thereof agreeth not with the truth of historie, for so much as Eusebius, lib. 4. de vita Constantini, Hieronymus in chron. Ruffin. lib. 1. cap. 11. Socrates, lib. 1. cap. 39. Theod. lib. 1. cap. 31. Sozomenus, lib. 2. cap. 34. doe all together cōsent that he was baptized not at Rome, but at Nicomedia; and that moreouer, as by their testimonie both appeare, not of Silvester but of Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia, not before his battell against Maximinus or Licinius, but in the thirtie and one yeare of his reigne, a little before his death.

13 Againe, where as Constantine in this donation appointed him to haue the principalitie ouer the other foure patriarchall sees, that maketh Constantine contrarie to himselfe, who in the councell of Nice aforesaid agreed with other bishops, that all the foure patriarchall sees should haue equall iurisdiction, euerie one ouer his owne territorie and precinct.

In summe, breefle to conclude: who so desireth more abundantlie to be satisfied touching this matter, let him read the bookes of Marsilius Patauinus, intituled Defensor pacis, in the yeare of our Lord 1324. of Laurentius Valla, an. 1440. of Antoninus archbishop of Florence, who in his historie plainlie bewrieth the tenor of this donation to be found in the old bookes of the decrees. Of Cusanus Cardinalis lib. 3. cap. 2. writing to the councell of Basil, an. 1460. of Aeneas Siluius in dialogo of Hier. Paulus Cattalanus, an. 1496. of Raphael Volaterranus, an. 1500. of Lutherus, an. 1537, &c. All which by manie and euident probations, disputs and proues this donation taken out of a booke, De gestis Siluestri, and translated (as they faine) by one Bartholomæus Piscernus, out of Greeke into Latine: not to proceed from Constantinus, but to be a thing vntruelie pretended, or rather a fable imagined, or els to be the deed of Pipinus or Charles, or some such other, if it were euer the deed of any.

And thus hast thou (beloued reader) briefle collected the narration of the noble acts and heauenlie vertues of this most famous emperor Constantine the great, a singular spectacle for all christian princes to behold and imitat, and worthie of perpetuall memorie in all congregations of christian saints: whose feruent zeale and pietie in generall, to all congregations and to all the saints of Christ was notable, but especiallie the affection and reuerence of his heart toward them was admirable, which had suffered any thing for the confession of Christ in the persecutions before, them had he principallie in price and veneration, in so much that he imbraced and kissed their woundes and stripes, and their eies, being put out. And if any such bishops or any other ministers brought to him any complaints one against an other (as manie times they did) he would take their bils of complaint and burne them before their faces: so studious and zealous was his mind to haue them agree, whose discord was to him more greefe then it was to themselues. All the vertuous acts and memorable doings of this famous and renowned emperor, to comprehend or commit to historie, it were the matter alone of a great volume: wherefore contented with these aboue premised, because nothing of him can be said inough, I cease to discourse of him any further.

One thing yet remaineth not to be omitted, wherein (as by the waie of a note) I thought good to admonish the learned reader, such as loue to be conuersant in reading of ancient authors: that in the ecclesiasticall historie of Eusebius, where in the latter end of the bookes is added a certaine oration, Ad coetum sanctorum, vnder the name of Eusebius Pamphilus, here is to be vnderstood, that the said oration is wrongfullie intituled vpon the name of Eusebius, which in verie truth is the oration of Constantinus himselfe. For the probation wherof, besides the stile and matter therein contained, and tradition heretofore all (liuelie declaring the religious deuine of Constantine) I allege the verie testimonie of Euseb. himselfe in his fourth booke De vita Constantini, where he in expresse words not onlie declareth that Constantine wrote such an oration intituled Ad coetum sanctorū, but also pronounceth in the end of his booke, to annex the same: declaring moreouer what difficultie the interpretors had to translat the same from the Roman speech, to their Grecian tong: Euseb. de vita Constantini, lib. 4. pag. 211.

Constantine commendation of Constantine the emperor.

Constantine killed the wounds of them that sued for Christ.

Constantine burneth the bils of complaints, and breaketh strife among the bishops.

Note, that the oration Ad concursum sanctorum, is wrongfullie ascribed to Eusebius, which indeed is the oration of Constantine.

And here an end of these lamentable and doleful persecutions of the primitiue church, during the space of three hundred yeres from the passion of our sauior Christ, till the comming of this Constantinus, by whom, as by the elect instrument of God, it hath so pleased his almightie maiestie, by his determinat purpose to giue rest after long trouble to his church, according to that S. Cyprian declareth before to be reuealed of God vnto his church: that after barbarisme and thelenitie (empest should come peaceable calme, and stable quietnesse to his church, meaning this time of Constantine now present. At which time it so pleased the almightie, that the murthering malice of Sathan should at length be restreined, and he himselfe to be tied vp for a thousand yeres through his great mercie in Christ, to whom therefore be thanks and praise now and for euer. Amen.

Sathan bound vp for a thousand yeres.

The end of the first booke.

The second Booke conteining the next three hundred yeeres following, with such things speciallie touched as haue hapned in England, from the time of king Lucius to Gregorius, and so after to the time of king Egbert.

Besides these persecutions hitherto in the booke before precedent, thou maiest vnderstand (christian reader) how the furie of Sathan and rage of men, hath done what they could to extinguish the name and religion of Christ: for what thing did lack that either death could do or torments could worke, or the gates of hell could deuise, all was to the vttermost attempted. And yet all the furie and malice of Sathan, all the wilsomnesse of the world and strength of men, boing, bending, practising what they could, nat withstanding the religion of Christ (as thou seest) hath had the vpper hand: which thing I wish (the greattie (gentle reader) willelie to note and diligentlie to ponder in considering these former histories. And because thou canst not conuider them, nor profit by them vnlesse thou doe first read and perusse them: let me craue therfore thus much at thine handes, to turne and read ouer the said histories of those persecutions aboue described, especiallie aboue all the other histories of this present volume, for thy especiall edification, which I trust thou shalt find not vntwo'rthe the reading.

A petition to the reader diligentlie to read ouer the former booke of the ten persecutions.

Now because the tying vp of Sathan giueth to the church some rest, and to me some leisure to addresse my stile to the handling of other stories, I mind therefore (Christ willing) in this present booke, leaning a while the tractation of these generall affaires perteining to the vniuersall church, to prosecute such domesticall histories, as more neere concerne this our countrie of England and Scotland done here at home, beginning first with king Lucius, with whom the faith first began here in this realme, as the sentence of some writers doth hold. And so to much as here may rise, yea doth rise a great controuersie in these our popish daies, concerning the first origine & planting of the faith in this our realme, it shall not be greatlie out of our purpose somewhat to skate & taie of this question: Whether the church of England first receiued the faith from Rome or not: The which although I grant so to be, yet being so granted, it little auaileth the purpois of them which would so haue it. For be it that England first receiued the christian faith & religion from Rome, both in the time of Eleutherius their bishop 180. yeres after Christ, and also in the time of Augustine whom Gregorie sent hither 600. yeres after Christ, yet their purpose followeth not thereby, that we must therefore forth with re'igne from thence this our realme from the chief welhead and fountaine of all godlinesse. And yet as they are not able to proue the second, so neither haue I any cause to grant the first: that is, That our Christis faith was first deriued frō Rome, which I may proue by sir 01 seuen good collectural reasons. Wherof the first I take of the testimonie of Gildas our countriman, who in his historie affirmeth plainlie, that Britaine receiued the gospell in the time of Tiberius the emperor, vnder whom Christ suffered: Lib. de victoria Aurelij Ambrosij. And saith moreouer, that Joseph of Arimathea, after dispersion of the Iewes, was sent of Philip the Apostle from France to Britaine, about the yeere of our Lord, 63, and here remained in this land all his time: and so with his fellowes laid the first foundation of christian faith among the Britaine people, whereupon other preachers and teachers comming afterward, confirmed the same and increased it.

Whether christian religion in this realme came first from Rome.

Question.

Answere.

Gildas. 1

The first planting of Christis religion in England.

The second reason is out of Tertullian, who liuing neere about, or rather somewhat before the time of this Eleutherius, in his booke Contra Iudæos, manifestlie testifieth the same, where the said Tertullian testifying how the gospell was dispersed & sbode by the sound of the apostles, and there reckoning vp the Medes, Persians, Parthians, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, Iewrie, Capadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phygia, Egypt, Pamphilia, with manie more, at length commeth to the coast of the Bootians, and all the borders of Spaine, with diuers nations of France: and there amongst all other reciteth also the parts of Britaine, which the Romans could neuer attaine to, and reporteth the same now to be subiect to Christ, as also reckoneth vp the places of Sarmatia, of the Danes, the Germans, the Scythians, with manie other prouinces and iles to him vnknowen: in all which places (saith he) reigneth the name of Christ which now beginneth to be common. This saith Tertullian. Note here how among other diuers believing nations, he mentioneth all the wildest places of Britain to be of the same number; and these in his time were christened, who was in the same Eleutherius time, as is aboue said. Then was not pope Eleutherius the first which sent the christian faith into this realme, but the gospell in no here received before his time either by Joseph of Arimathea, as some chronicles record, or by some of the apostles or of their scholars, which had beene here preaching Christ before Eleutherius wrote to Lucius.

2 Ex Tertul. ad Iudæos.

My third probation I drawe out of Origen, Hom. 4. in Ezechiel, whose words be these: Britannia in christiana confessione religionis. Wherby it appeareth, that the faith of Christ was planted here in England before the daies of Eleutherius.

3 Ex Origen. hom. 4. in Ezech.

For my fourth probation I take the testimonie of Beda, where he affirmeth, that in his time, & almost a thousand yeres after Christ here in Britaine. Easter was kept after the manner of the east church, in the full of the moone, what date in the weeke so euer it fell on, and not on the sunday, as we doe now. Wherby it is to be collected, that the first preachers in this land haue come out from the east part of the world where it was so vsed, rather then from Rome.

4 Ex Beda.

Fiftlie, I may allege the words of Nicephorus, Lib. 2. cap. 40. where he saith, that Simon Zelotes did spread the gospell of Christ to the west ocean, and brought the same vnto the iles of Britaine.

5 Ex Nicephl. lib. 2. cap. 40.

Sixtlie may be added here also the words of Petrus Cluniacensis, who writing to Bernard affirmeth that the Scots in his time did celebrat their Easter, not after the Roman maner, but after the Greekes, &c. And as the said Britans were not hinder under the Romane order in the time of this abbot of Glmiake: for neither were they nor would be vnder the Romane legat, in the time of Gregorie, nor would admit any primacie of the bishop of Rome to be aboue them.

6 Ex Petr. Cluniac. epist. ad Bernard.

Except Elmeham ad Lucium.

For the seuenth argument moreouer I may make my probation by the plaine words of Eleutherius, by whole epistle written to king Lucius we may vnderstand, that Lucius had received the faith of Christ in this land, before the king sent to Eleutherius for: the Romane lawes: for in the epistle words of the letter to manifestlie purport, as hereafter followeth to be seene. By all which coniectures it may stand probable to be thought, that the Britans were taught first by the Grecians of the east church, rather then by the Romans.

Peraduenture Eleutherius might helpe some thing either to connect the king, or else to increase the faith then newlie sprung among the people; but that he precisely was the first, that cannot be proued. But grant he were, as indeed the most part of our English stories confesse, neither will I greatlie sticke with them therein: yet what haue they got thereby when they haue cast all their gaine? In fewe words to conclude this matter, if to be that the christian faith and religion was first deriued from Rome to this our nation by Eleutherius, then let them but grant to vs the same faith & religion which then was taught at Rome, and from thence deriued hither by the said Eleutherius, and we will desire no more: for then neither was any vniuersall pope aboue all churches & councles, which came not in before Bonifacius time, which was 400. yeres after: neither any name or vse of the masse, the parts whereof how and by whom they were compiled, hereafter in this booke following appeareth to be seene. Neither any sacrifice propitiatorie for the soules of purgatorie was then offered vpon hallowed altars, but onlie the communion frequented at christian tables, where oblations and gifts were offered as well of the people as of the priests to God, before they should appeare neither emptie no: vnbind before the Lord, as we may vnderstand by the time of Cyprian. Neither was then any transubstantiation heard of, which was not brought in before a thousand yeres after. Neither were then any images of saints departed set vp in churches, yea a great number of the saints worshipped in this our time were not as yet borne, nor the churches wherein they were worshipped were yet set vp, but came in long after, especiallie in the time of Irene and Constans the emperor. Likewise neither reliques nor peregrinatios were then in vse. Priests mariage was then as lawfull, and no lesse receiued, as now: neither was it condemned before the dates of Syricius, almost a thousand yeres after that. Their seruice was then in the vulgar tong, as witnesseth Hierome; the sacrament ministred in both kinds as well to laie men as to priests, the witnesse whereof is Cyprian. Yea, and that temporall men which would not then communicat at Easter, Whitsuntide and Christenmasse, were not then counted for catholikes, the popes olune distinction can testifie. In funerals, priests then flocked not together, tolling frentalsand dirges for sweeping of purgatorie, but onlie a funerall oration was vsed, with psalms of praises and songs of their worthie deeds, and Alleluia sounding on high, which did shake the gilded seelings of the temple, as witnesseth Nazianzen, Ambroise, and Hierome, &c.

What differēce betweene the ordinarie practise of Rome from the old church of Rome, and in vse at this time.

De consecrat. d. 2.

In the supper of the Lord and at baptisme no such ceremonies were vsed, as now of late haue been intruded; in so much that as in this storie is shewed hereafter, both Augustine and Paulinus baptised then in riuers not in hallowed fonts, as witnesseth Fabianus. The postures of Sacrum, of Pope, of Wangoz, with mattens and euensong of the dale; againe, neither the orders and religions of monks and friers were not yet premued of, to the space almost of a thousand yeres after, &c. So that, as I said, if the papists would needs haue Christ and religion of this realme from Rome, then let them set vs and leaue vs there where they had vs: that is, let them suffer vs to stand content with that faith and religion, which then was taught and brought from Rome by Eleutherius (as now we vnderstand nothing from the same) and we will desire no better. And if they will not, then let the vnsereuer take where the fault is, in vs or them, which neither themselues will perfill in the articles of the Romish religion which they so much brag of, neither will they permit vs so to doe.

Fabianus, cap. 129. & 130.

And thus much by the waie to satisfie the foresaid obiection, whereby we may haue now a more readie passage into the order and course of the historie. Being therefore granted vnto them which they so earnestlie sticke vpon, that the christian faith and religion of this realme was brought from Rome, first by Eleutherius, then afterward by Augustine: thus write the chronicles of that matter.

Eleutherius bishop of Rome.

About the time and yere of the Lord, 180. king Lucius sonne of Coilus, which buried Colchester, king of the Britains, who then were the inhabiters and possessors of this land (which now the Englishmen call England) hearing of the miracles and wonders done by the christians at that time in diuers places, as Beda writeth, writeth directed his letters to Eleutherius bishop of Rome, to receiue of him the christian faith: although about the computation of the yere and time, great difference there is in authors when this should be. Nauclerus saith it was an. 156. but that cannot be, forasmuch as Eleutherius was not yet bishop by the space of twentie yeres after that. Henricus de Erfordia saith it was an. 169. in the nineteenth yere of Aurus emperor: but that agreeth not with approued histories, which all consent that Aurus reigned not nineteene yeres; and if he had, yet that yere cannot be put to the yere of our Lord, 169. but to the yere, 181. Some others saie, that Eleutherius was made bishop in the first yere of Commodus, which was the yere of our Lord, 180. but that is nerth to go too far: but let the authors agree as they can. Let us returne to Eleutherius the good bishop, who hearing the request of this king, and glad to see the goodlie towardnesse of his well disposed mind, sendeth him certaine teachers and preachers called Fugatius, or by some Faganus, and Damianus, or Dimianus, which conuerted first the king and people of Britaine, and baptised them with the baptisme & sacrament of Christs faith. The temples of idolatrie and all other monuments of gentilitie they subuerted, conuerting the people from their diuers and manie gods, to serue one liuing God. Thus true religion with sincere faith increasing, superstition decaied, with all other vices of idolatrie. There were then in Britaine 28. head priests which they called Flamines, & those archpriests among them, which were called Archflamines, hauing the ouersight of their manors, and as iudges ouer the rest. These 28. Flamines they turned to 28. bishops, & the 3 Archflamines to three archbishops, hauing their seats in three principall cities of the realme, that is, in London, in Yorke, and in Caimagguntia. Videlicet in vrbe legionum, by Wales. Thus the countries of the whole realme being diuided euerie one vnder his olune bishop, and all things setled in a good order: the foresaid king Lucius sent againe to the said Eleutherius for the Romane lawes, thereby likewise to be gouerned, as in religion now they were framed accordinglie: vnto whom Eleutherius againe writeth after the tenor of these words insuing.

The epistle of Eleutherius bishop of Rome sent to king Lucius.

Ex vetusto codice regum Anglorum.

The epistle of Eleutherius to king Lucius.

ANno 169. à passione Christi scripsit dominus Eleutherius papa Lucio regi Britannie, ad correctionem regis & procerum regni Britannie, and so forth as followeth in English.

Ye require of vs the Romane lawes and the emperors to be sent ouer to you, which you may practise and put in vre within your realme. The Romane lawes and statutes we may not receiue reproouse, but the law of God we may not. Ye haue receiued of late through Gods mercie in the realme of Britannie, the law & faith of Christ, ye haue with you within the realme both the parts of the scriptures. Out of them by Gods grace with the counsell of your realme take ye a law, and by that law (through Gods sufferance) rule your kingdome of Britaine. For you be Gods vicar in your kingdome, according to the saying of the psalme; Deus iudicium tuum regi da, &c. that is: O God giue iudgement to the king, & thy righteousnesse to the kings sonne &c. He said not, the iudgement & righteousnesse of the emperor, but thy iudgement and iustice; that is to saie, of God. The kings sonnes be the christian people and folke of the realme, which be vnder your gouernment. & liue and continue in peace within your kingdome, as the gospell saith: Like as the hen gathereth hir chickens vnde hir wings, so doth theking his people. The people and folke of the realme of Britaine be yours, whom if they be diuided, ye ought to gather in concord and peace, to call them to the faith and law of Christ, and to the holie church, to cherish and maintenie them, to rule and gouerne them, & to defend them as wales from such as would doe them wrong, from malicious men and enimies. A king hath his name of ruling, & not of hauing a realme. You shall be a king while ye rule well; but if you, doe otherwise, the name of a king shall not remaine with you and you shall lose it, which God forbid. The almightie God grant you so to rule the realme of Britaine, that you may reigne with him for euer, whose vicar ye be in the realme.

The king Gods vicar within his owne kingdome.

After this manner (as you haue heard) was the christis faith either first brought in, or els confirmed in this realme of Britaine by the sending of Eleutherius, not with any crosse or procession, but onlie at the simple preaching of Fagan & Damian, through whose ministerie this realme and land of Britaine was els those reduced to the faith and law of the Lord, according as was prophesied by Esaie, & long before of other saints more, where he saith, cha. 42. He shall not faint nor giue ouer till he hath set iudgement in earth, and lands shall wait for his law, &c. The faith thus received of the Britains continued among them and flourished the space of 216. yeres, till the comming of the Saxons, who then were pagans, whereof more followeth hereafter to be said, the Lord Christ guiding thereunto. In the meane time something to speake of this space before, which was betwixt the time of Lucius, and the first comming in of the Saxons: First it is to be vnderstood, that all this while as yet the emperors of Rome had not receiued the faith, what time the kings of Britaine and the subiects thereof were conuerted now, as is said, to Christ: for the which came much trouble and persecution was sought against them, not onlie only here in Britaine, but through all parts of christendome by the heathen infidels. In so much that in the persecution only of Diocletian and Maximinian, reigning both together the bone before sufficiently discouered.

Thus therefore although the foresaid Lucius the Britaine king, through the merciful prouidence of God, was then christened, and the gospell received generallie almost in all the lands, yet the state thereof as well of the religion as of the common wealth could not be quiet, for that the emperours and nobles of Rome were yet infidels, and enemies to the same; but especiallie for this cause, the cause so happening that Lucius the christian king died without issue. For thereby such trouble and variance fell among the Britaines (as it happened in all other realmes, namelie in this our realme of England, whensoeuer succession lacketh) that not onlie they brought vpon them the idolatrous Romans, and at length the Saxons, but also inwrapped themselues in such miserie and desolation, as pet to this day amongst them remaineth. Such a thing it is (where a prince or a king is in a kingdome) there to lacke succession, as especiallie in this case may appeare. For after the death of Lucius, when the barons and nobles of the land could not accord within themselues vpon succession of the crowne, kept in the Romans and got the crowne into their olune hands, whereupon followed great miserie and ruine to the realme. For sometimes the idolatrous Romans, sometimes the Britaines raigned and ruled as iniurie and wiolzie would serue, one king murdering another, till at length the Saxons came and beprowned them both, as in processe hereafter followeth to be seene.

Henr. Huntingdo. lib. 1. of that incommodite cometh by lacke of succession.

In the meane season touching the storie of king Lucius, here is to be reprouued the fable of some writers fallelp fayning of him, that he should after his baptisme receiued, put off all his kingly honor, forsake the land and be made a preacher; who after long trauell in preaching and teaching, in France, in Germanie, in Augusta, and in Suecia, at length was made doctor and rector of the church of Curcise, where (as this fable saith) he suffered martyrdome. But this phantasie of thomseuer it first did spring, disagreeth from all our English stories, who with a full content do for the most part concord in this; that the said Lucius after he had founded manp churches, and giuen great rents and liberties to the same, deceased with great tranquillitie in his olune land, and was buried at Glocester the fourteenth yeare after his baptisme, as the booke of Flores historiarum doth count, which was the yeare of our Lord (as he saith) 201, and reckoneth his conuersion to be in the yeare 87. In some I find his decease to be the fourth, and in some the tenth yeare after his baptisme, and some hold that he raigned all the space of seuentie and seuen yeares. And thus much concerning king Lucius.

Ex Florileg.

Note to proceed in order of the storie, briefelp to touch the state of the foresaid land of Britaine, betweene the time of king Lucius and the entering of the Saxons, who were the kings thereof, and in what order they succeded or rather inuaded one after another, this catalogue here vnder written will specifie.

By this table may appeare a lamentable face of a commonwealth so miserable rent and diuided into two sorts of people, differing not so much in countrey as in religion: for when the Romans raigned, to they were gouerned by the infidels; when the Britaines ruled, so they were gouerned by christians. Thus what quietnesse was or could be in the church in so quiet and doubtfull dates, may easilp be considered.

Albeit notwithstanding all these foresaid heathen rulers of the Romans which here gouerned, pet (God be praised) we reade of no persecution during all these ten persecutions aboue mentioned, that touched the christian Britaines, before the last persecution only of Diocletian and Maximianus Herculeus, which here they exercised much cruelties. This persecution as it was the last among the Romane christians, so it was the first of mame and diuers that followed after in this church and realme of England, whereof we will hereafter entreat (Christ willing) as order of the matter shall leade vs. In the meane time, this rage of Diocletian as it was vniuersallp through all the churches in the world fierce and behement, so in this realme of Britaine also it was so sore, that as all our Englisp chronicles do testifie and record, all christianitie almost in the whole land was destroyed, churches were subuerted, all bookes of the Scriptures burned, many of the faithfull both men and women were slaine. Among whom the first and chiefest was Albanus, then Julius, Aaron, and Amphibalus, of whom sufficiently hath been said before. What were the others, or how manie they were that suffered beside, stories make no rehearsall. And thus much thereof.

Now as concerning the gouernment of these aboue named kings of Britaine, although I haue little or nothing to note which greatlp appertaineth to the matter of this ecclesiasticall historie, pet this is not to be past ouer. First how in the order of these kings succeeth Constantius the great and worthie Prince out, not only a Britaine borne by his mother Helena being king Coilus daughter, but also by the helpe of the Britaines arisne (under the power of God) which the said Constantine toke with him out of Britaine to Rome, obtained with great victorie, peace and tranquillitie to the whole vniuersall church of Christ, hauing three legions with him out of this realme of chosen and able soulditers, wherein the strength of the land was not a little impaired and endangered, as afterwards in this storie followeth.

After him likewise Sparnian, following his steps, toke with him also (as stories record) all the power and strength which was left, and what soeuer he could make of able and fighting men to subdue France; besides the garrison which he had out with him before, sending so more to the number of an hundred thousand soulditers at once, to be sent to him out of Britaine into France. At which time also Conanus his partner being then in France, sent ouer for virgins from Britaine to the number of eleuen thousand, who with Vrsula, the prince Dionets daughter being shipped ouer, manp perished in the sea, some were taken of the infidels marching vpon the borders, with whom because they would not be polluted, all were destroyed, being miserable dispersed (some one way some another) so that none escaped.

Thus pore Britaine being left naked and destitute on euerie side, as a maimed bodie without might or strength, was left open to his enemies not able to succour it selfe without helpe of forren friends; to whom they were then constrained to flie, especiallp to the Romans, to whom the Britaines sent this word or message: Actio ter consuli gemitus Britannorum. Repellunt nos Barbari ad mare: repellit nos mare ad Barbaros. Hinc oriuntur duo funerum genera, quia aut ingulamur, aut submergimur.

But the Romās then began to forsake them, whereby they were in neuer danger to be oppressed by Gwains and Pelga, had not Gwetelinus the archbishop of London made ouer to helpe Britaine, and obtaining there help, had brought Constantinus the kings brother to reliue his countrep against the infidels. This Constantinus was brother to Aldronius king of little Britaine, and father to Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter, who after raigned kings in Britaine.

Thus by the meanes of the good archbishop and Constantinus, the state of the religion and realme of Britaine was in some meare quiet and safetie, during the time of the said Constantine and of the good archbishop. But as the realme of Britaine almost from the beginning was neuer without ciuill warre, at length came wicked Uortigerne, who cruelly causing Constans his pupce to be murdered, ambitiously inuaded the crowne, who then fearing the other two brethren of Constans, which were Aurelius and Uter, being then in little Britaine, did send ouer for the aid of the Saxons being then infidels; and not onlp that, but also married with an infidell, the daughter of Hengist called Rowen. Wherupon the said Uortigerne not long after by the said Hengist and the Saxons was with like treacherie dispossessed of his kingdome, and the people of Britaine driuen out of their countrie, after that the Saxons had slaine of their chiefe nobles and barons at one meeting, ioyning together fortie bishops with crueltie, to the number of two hundred seuentie and one: some stories say foure hundred and fortie. This wicked act of the Saxons was done at Almesburie, or at a place called Stoneheng. Wp the monument of which stones there hanging, it seemeth that the noble Britaines there were buried.

This fabulous storie of the Welchmen, of bringing these stones from Ireland by Merlin, I passe ouer. Some stories record that they were slaine being bid to a banket. Others say that it was done at a talke or assemblie, where the Saxons came came with prinie lnines contrarie to promise made, with the thirdy lninies they giuing a prinie watchword in their Saxon speech, Nemc your sores, slein the Britaines warned. And thus far concerning the historie of the Britaines. As this great plague could not come to the Britaines without Gods permission, so Gildas sheweth in his chronicle the cause thereof, inuiting thus: Quod Britones propter auaritiam & rapinam principum, propter iniquitatem & iniustitiam iudicum, propter desidiam prædicationis episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidisse, &c.

Aurelius and Uter sonnes to Constantinus.

This was the comming in first of the Angles or Saxons into this realme, being yet vnchristened and infidels, which was about 5 yeare of our Lord, as William Malmesbury testifieth, foure hundred sixtie and nine, the captains of whom were Hengistus and Horsus. Although the said Hengist and Saxons at their first comming, for all their subtill looking and cruell attempt, had no quiet setling in Britaine, but were driuen out diuers times by the valiantnesse of Aurelius Ambrosius, and his brother Uter abone mentioned, who raigned after that among the Britaines: yet notwithstanding they were not so driuen out, but that they returned againe, and at length possessed all, driuing the Britaines (such as remained) into Cambria, which we call now Wales. Hengistus (as some chronicles record) raigned three and foxtie yeares, and died in Kent. Galfridus in his Britannico, saith, that he was taken in war by Aurelius Ambrosius, and beheaded at Coningburgh, after he had raigned nine and thirtie yeares.

Ex Galfrido. Ex Asserio in suo Britannico.

After the death of Hengist, his sonne Otta raigned foure and twentie yeares, leauing his sonne Octa, to whose raigne with his sonne Ymanricus, historics do attribute three and fiftie yeares, who also were slaine by Uter Pendragon. Polychronicon, lib. 5. cap. 4.

Seuen kings raising in England.

The Saxons, after they were setled in the possession of England, distributed the realme among themselues first in seuen parts, euery part to haue his king, that is the first to be the king of Kent; the second to be the king of Sussex and Southerie, holding his palace at Cicester; the third king was of Westfer; the fourth king of Eller; the fifth king was of the Eastangles, that is, of Cambridgeshire, Northfolke, and Suffolke; the sixth king of Mercelande, or Mercia, and in his kingdome were contained the counties of Lincolne, Leicester, Huntington, Northampton, Oxford, Derbie, Warwicke, &c. the seuenth king had all the countries beyond Humber, and was called king of Northumberland.

Of these seuen kingdomes, although they continued not long, but at length ioyned all in one, comming all into the possession and subiection of the Westsaxons, yet for the space they continued (which was with continuall trouble and warres among themselues) this is the race and order of them, as in this table particularly followeth to be seene.

A table describing the seuen kingdomes of the Saxons, raigning heere in England.

IN the time of Uoztiger aboue mentioned, began the raigne of the Saxons in this land, the which coming out of three sorts of the Germaine people (to wit) the Saxons, the Iutes & Angles, replenished the land, of the called now Anglia. Of whom first Hengistus raigned in Kent, which countrie of Kent he had obtained by Rowen his daughter, of king Uoztiger, which was about the yeare of our Lord (as some do coast) 476, or (as I find) in the computation of our English tables 456, in some 463. After Hengist, came in Octha, with Esa, or Ille his kinsman: who afterward succeeded the said Hengist in Kent. Not long after came in another company of the Saxons, with Elle their captaine, which plated themselues in Southsax. And after them againe another garrison of the Saxons with Cerdice their captaine, which did occupie the west part of the land, called by them Westsaxon. And so likewise the other multitude of the Saxons after them, which as yet being vnchristened and infidels, diuided the whole land among themselues into seuen kingdomes, as in this table followeth.

(456) Kent.

| The kings of Kent, with the yeares how long they raigned. | | |
|---|---|---|
| Hengistus slaine. | 31 | |
| Esa, or Ille. | 24 | |
| Octha, or Octha. | | |
| Emenricus, or Emericus. | 26 | |
| Ethelbertus, the first of the Saxon kings that receiued the faith by Augustine, An. reg. 35. | 56 | This Ethelbert first of all the Saxons receiued the faith, and subdued all the other six kings, except onely the king of Northumberland. |
| Edbaldus. | 24 | |
| Ercombertus. | 24 | Ercombert commanded Lent first to be fasted in his dominion. |
| Egbertus, or Edbrichth, slaine. | 9 | Egbert killed two sonnes of his vncle. |
| Lotharius slaine. | 12 | |
| Eadrichus. | 6 | Vnto the time of Edricke all the bishops of Canterburie were Italians. |
| Nidredus. | 7 | Some chronicles doe place these two, Nidredus and Withardus, after Edricke, and giue to them seuen yeares, some againe do omit them. |
| Withardus. | 37 | |
| Withredus. | 33 | |
| Egbert or Edbert. | 23 | Betweene the raigne of Alricke, and Cuthred, some stories do insert the raigne of Eadbert, which raigned two yeares. |
| Ethelbert. | 11 | |
| Alricus. | 34 | |
| Eadbertus, surnamed Pren. | 2 | |
| Cuthredus. | 18 | |
| Baldredus, expulsed. | 18 | |

The kings of Kent.

In the raigne of this Baldred the kingdome of Kent was translated to Egbertus, otherwise called Egbrit, king of Westsaxons, who subduing the foresaid Baldred, in the yeare 832. gaue the said kingdome to Athelstan his yonger sonne. After whose decease it came to Ethelwolfe the elder sonne of Egbrit, and so was united to the Westsaxons, who then began to be the monarch of the whole land. This kingdome began neere about the yeare of our Lord 456, and continued 342 yeares, and had fifteene kings.

478 Southsax, now called Sussex.

| The kings of Southsax, with the yeares of their raigne. | | |
|---|---|---|
| Elle, or Alle. | 31 | |
| Cissa. | | Of this Cissa came Cicester, which he builded, and where he raigned. |
| Nancanleus, or Nancanleodus. | | This Nathanleod semeth by some old stories to be a Britaine, and the chiefe marshall of king Uter, whom Poxth the Saxon slew. |
| Poxth. | | This Poxth a Saxon came in at the hauen, which now is called of him Poxthmouth. |
| Ethelwelfus. | | Because I find but little mention of these two, I rather like to be the same Ethelwold or Ethelwaldus, which after followeth. |
| Redwallus. | | |
| Condebertus. | | Of Condebertus and Ethelred I find no mention but in one table only, supposing therefore that the true names of these were Ercombertus and Egbertus, which were kings of Kent the same time, and peraduenture might then rule in Sussex. |
| Ethelredus, or Ethereus. | | |
| Adelwold, or Ethelwaldus, slaine. | | This Adelwold was the first king of Sussex christened, and as Fabian saith, the fourth king of the Southsaxons: as others say the seuenth, so vncertaine be the histories of this kingdome. |
| Adelbrich, or Berethunus, slaine. | 5 | |
| Abbunnus. | 15 | |

The kings of Sussex.

This kingdome endured the shortest season of all others, and soonest pulled into other kingdomes, in the daies (as some write) of Iue king of Westsax, and so endured not aboue an hundred and twelue yeares vnder seuen or at most eleuen kings, beginning first in the yeare of the Lord 478, and about the thirtith yeare of the first comming of the Saxons.

(522) Westsax.

| The principall kingdome of the Westsaxons, and of their raignes. | | |

| Cerdicus, or Credricus. | 17 | This kingdome contained Summersetshire, Barkeshire, Dorsetshire, deuonshire, Cornewall, &c. |
| Kenricus. | 26 | |
| Chelingus. lib. cycl. | 30, 33. | |
| Celricus, or Ceolstricus. | 5 | |
| Ceolwulfus, or Ceolulfus. | 14 | |
| Kinigilsus and Cuncelinus. | 7 532 | This Kinigilsus was first king christened in that prouince, conuerted by Birinus, after made monke. |
| Kinewalkus. | 31 | |
| Scrburga. | 1 | |
| Escwinus, Escwinus, or Elwinus. | 2 | |
| Centwinus died at Rome. | 7 | |
| Cedwallus. | 3 | Cedwalla went to Rome, and there was christened and died. |
| Ina, or Iue. | 35 | Ina also went to Rome, and was made monke. |
| Edelardus, or Athelardus. | 14 | |
| Cuthredus, or Cuthbert. | 16 | |
| Sigebertus, or Sigherus, slaine. | 1 | Sigebert for his pride and cruelty was deposed of his people. And as he yet was killed before one of his faithfull counsell, giuing him wholesome counsell: for after was he slaine of the same counsellers swineheard, as he hid himselfe in a wood. |
| Kinulfus, or Kinewlfus, slaine. | 31 | |
| Brithricus. | 13 | |
| Egbertus, or Egbrichtus, otherwise Athelbertus, or Athelbrich, &c. | 37 | This Egbert first expelled by Brithricus, who after returned again: and raigning, was much derided and scorned with mocking rimes for a coward of Bernulfus king of Mercia. At length the said Egbert subdued him first, then all the rest, to his kingdome: causing the whole land to be called no more Britaine, but Anglia. Concerning the other kings after him in that lordship heere after followeth. |

The Kings of Westsax.

This Egbert subdue'd all the other seuen kingdomes, and first began the monarchie of all the Saxons, which after by Alured was perfected, as hereafter followeth (the Lord willing) to be declared. This kingdome of the Westsaxons began the yeare of grace 522, and as it subdued all the others, so it did it the longest continue, till about the comming of William Conqueror, who is about the time of 554 yeares.

547 North'uberland.

| The kings of Northumberland, with the yeares of their raigne. | | |

Osredus.
Ethelbertus, or Adelwaldus, North. slaine. 16

This Alfricus was the sonne of Ida, and raigned sine yeares.

This Ethelfridus was hee that slew the monkes of Bangor, to the number of 2200, which came to pray for the good successe of the Britaines, and by his wife Acca, the daughter of Elle he had seuen sons, Eanfridus, Oswaldus, Oswius, Oslacus, Osmundus, Osa, Offa: Flor. Histor.

This Edwinus was the first of the Northumberland kings, which was conuerted and christned by Paulinus bishop of London.

These two are put out of the race of kings, because they reuolted from the christian faith, and were both slaine miserably by Cedwalla a Britaine, which then raigned in Northumberland, and in Mercia.

This Oswaldus, called S. Oswald, fought with Cedwalla, and Penda with a small armie, and by strength of prayer banquished them in the field. He sent to Adamus into Scotland to preach in his countrie, and as he preached in Scotish, the king repounded in English. He was a great giuer of almes to the poor. Of his other acts more appeareth hereafter.

This Oswius fighting against Penda, vowed to make his daughter Elfled a nun, giuing with her twelue lordships, to build twelue monasteries, fiue in Bernicia, fiue in Deira.

The same Oswius, in the beginning of his raigne take one Osuinus the sonne of Edwine to be his partner ouer the countrie of Deira. Afterward causing him to be killed, woke to him another called Ecelwald, the sonne of Oswald. Of this Osuinus more followeth hereafter to be declared.

This Egfrid maried Ethelrida, who being twelue yeares married to him, could after by no meanes be allured to lie with him, but obtaining of him leaue, was made nun, and then abbesse of Elie. She made but one meale a day, and neuer wore linen. At last the same Egfrid fighting against the Scots, was slaine in the field by a traine of the Scots, hauing themselues to flie.

Of this Alfride Beda in his historie telleth that he was exactly and perfectly seene in the holy scriptures, and recouered much that his predecessors had lost before: Bed. lib. 4. cap. 24. Some say he raigned not eighteene yeares.

Osred began his raigne, being but eight yeres old, and dragned the space of ten yeares.

Some affirme that Osricus raigned but eleuen yeares.

This Celulfe, after he had raigned eight yeares, was made a monke. To him Beda wrote his storie.

Mollo by the subtill traine of Alfredus was made away, in which Alfredus also himselfe, after he had raigned ten yeares, was enuised by his owne people.

In some chronicles this Alredus raigned but eight yeares.

¶ After this Ciswere, the kingdome of Northumberland ceased the space of two yeares, till Egbertus king of the Westsaxons subdued also them, as he did the other Saxons to his dominion. After the which Egbertus of the Westsaxons succeeded in Northumberland his sonne.

In the time of this Ethelredus, there were two vnder-kings in Northumberland, Ella and Osbright, whom the Danes ouercame, and raigned in their place, whose names were these:

Erbertus. Curthred. } Danes.

Egebert.

¶ After the raigne of these foresaid Danes, the kingdome of Northumberland came into the hands of the Westsaxons, in the time of Athelstane and his brother Edmund. It began first in the yeare 547, and so endured 409 yeares. It contained Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, Darbyshire, the bishoprike of Durham, Copeland and others.

Penda slew in battell Edwine and Oswald kings of Northumberland. Also Sigebert, Egrike, and Anna, kings of the Eastangles. Also he drewe out Brenwalkins, king of the Westsaxons.

Under Peda and Wilferus, Christs faith was received in those parts, they being converted by Finianus bishop. The same Peda raigned in a part of Mercia, with his brother Wilferus, which were both the sonnes of Penda.

This Wilferus by his wife Ermeburg had three daughters, Milburg, Mildith, and Mildgith, holie virgins.

This Adelredus or Ethelredus, was monke of Bardney, whose sisters were Kineburd, and Kinswith, holy virgins.

In the time of this Ceolred was Guthlake, otherwise called S. Guthlake, the popish hermit of Crowland.

Under Ethelbaldus died Beda. Ethelbald gaue that all churches should be free from all exactions and publike charges.

This Bernred for his pride and stoutnesse toward his people, was by them deposed, and the same yeare by the iust iudgement of God burned: Histor. Cocent.

Offa traiterously consenting to the death of good Ethelbert king of the Eastangles, peaceable comming to marrie his daughter, for repentance caused the Peterpence first to be giuen to Rome, and there did his penance.

This Kenelme being of seuen yeares of age, was wickedly slaine, after he had raigned sir monethes.

This Ludecane, after the second yeare of his raigne, was slaine of Egbert king of the Westsaxons, by whom the rest of the Saxons were also subdued.

¶ This Withlacus in the beginning of his raigne was banquished by Egfred king of Westsax, to whom he became tributarie with his successors here following.

It endured for the space of 250 yeares, till about the latter end of Alfredus, by whom it was ioyned to the kingdome of Westsaxons. This kingdome stretched out to Huntingtenshire, Hertfordshire, Glocestershire, Worcester, Warwicke, Lichfield, Cestrecire, Chester, Darbishire, Staffordshire, Shropshiare, Oxford, Buckingham, Dorcester, Lincolne, Leicester, &c.

Swithredus.

This Sebertus nephue to Ethelbert K. of Kent, among these kings was first christened by Pelitus, which made the church of Paules.

Serred, and Seward, and Sigebert, expelled Pelitus the bishop, because he would not minister to them the sacramentall bread, they being not baptised.

This Sigebertus Parvus with his brother Sebertus were slaine of Kinegilsus and Swithelinus his brother, by the iust iudgement of God, for they reuolted againe from their faith, and expelled Pelitus bishop of London.

This Segebertus Bonus or Sibertus, much reioyting to Oswie king of Northumberland, by his persuasion was brought to christian baptisme, baptised of Finianus bishop, to whom also was sent Cedde with other ministers to preach and tohaptise in his countrie. At last he was slaine of his men about him, vsing too much to spare his enemies, and to forgiue their iniuries that repented. Flor.

This Sigherius and Sebbi first fell to idolatrie, then though the meanes of Wilferus king of Mercia, were reduced, and at last Sebbi became a monke.

Offa after he had raigned a while became a monke at Rome.

This Swithredus was subdued vnto Egbert king of Westsaxons, albeit London remained vnder the Mercians to the time that they also were subdued to the Westsaxons. This kingdome began in the yeare 561, and so continued till the time of Egbertus. Some notes say it continued to the time of Edward sonne of Alwedus, about the comming of the Danes, and contained vnder it the lordship of Middlesex and London. The metropolitane sea of this province of Essex was London, where the famous church of S. Paul was builded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert king of Essex, whom Ethelbert had lately before turned to Christs faith: whereof the first bishop was Pelitus, the second bishop was Ceddus, the third came in by simonie, whose name was Wine: Malmesb. de vitis pont. After him was Erkenwaldus, of whom writeth Beda, that he being diseased in his legs that he could neither go nor ride, yet would be caried about in a litter to preach in his diocesse, &c. Although William Malmesburie writing of the bishops of London, in his booke De[illegible]ae, faith, that Mauricius first the kings chancellour, then bishop here, did first begin this so large and famous building of the church of S. Paul in London: which worke after him Richard his successour did prosecute, bestowing all the rents of his bishoprike vpon the same, and yet was scarcely seene. Yet herein may be answered peraduenture, that the church builded before by king Ethelbert and king Sigebert, might be ouerthrowne by the Danes, and afterward was reedified by these bishops aboue mentioned.

Of this Uffa the people of Northfolke were then called Uffins.

Redwaldus first was conuerted in Kent, afterward through the wicked persuasions of his wife & other, rejected idolatrie with christianitie.

Notwithstanding his sonne Erpwaldus through the meanes of Edwin king of Northumberland, was brought to the perfect faith of Christ, and therein faithfully did continue.

This Sigebert made himselfe a monke, and afterward brought out to fight against Penda, with a white sticke in his hand, was slaine in the field.

The daughters of Anna were Sexburga, Ethelberta, and saint Etheldreda.

This Ethelredus for his holinesse and godly vertues is counted for a saint: he innocently comming to Offa king of Mercia, to marrie with Althrid his daughter, by the sinister suspition of Offa, and wicked counsell of Kineswina his wife, was cruelly put to death in the house of Offa. For the which cause Offa afterwards repenting went to Rome, where he made himselfe a monke.

After this sinfull murther of Ethelbert, the kingdome of Eastangles during the time of certaine yeares, was in great trouble and desolation, vnder diuers kings and tyrants, sometime the king of Westsax, sometimes of Kent, or of Mercia, hauing dominion ouer them, till the comming of S. Edmund, which was the last king there ruling vnder the Westsaxons.

S. Edmund, martyred. 16

After the death of S. Edmund, being slaine of the infidell Danes, the kingdome remained with the Danes fiftie yeares, till at length Edward king of the Westsaxons expulsed the Danes, and ioyned it to his kingdome. It began about the yeare of our Lord 561, and continued here about 377 yeares. Fabian numbreth but twelue kings, but in others I find more.

The metropolitan sea of this province of Eastangles, which was first at a towne called Dunmoke, or Dunwich, which in time past hath been a famous and populous towne, with a maior and foure bailiffes, and also diuers parish churches and hospitals, whereunto great priuiledges by diuers kings haue been granted, which towne is now fallen into ruine and decay, and more then halfe consumed by the eating in of the sea, as also greatly impouerished by losse of the haven, which heretofore hath flourished with diuers tall ships belonging to the same (the inhabitants thereof being not able of themselues to repare it without the helpe of other good people) where the first bishop was Felix, a Burgundian, who sate there foureteene yeares. After this, vnto the time of Egbert king of Westsax, this province was euer ruled by two bishops, whereof the one had his sea at Dunmoke, now called Dunwich; the other at Vcmaham where twelue sate one after another. From thence it was translated to Thetford, where sate three bishops. At last by bishop Herbert it was remoued to Norwich, where he erected a monasterie of monkes.

This Dunwich lieth vpon the sea side in Suffolke.

¶ And thus standeth the order and race of the Saxon kings, raigning together with the Britaines in this realme. Now followeth the description of the Britaine kings, raigning with the Saxons in like manner.

Although the miserable Britaines thus were bereaued of their land, by the cruell subtilties of the Saxons, yet were they not so driuen out or expelled, but that a certaine kingdome remained among them in some part of the land, namely about Cornewall, and the parts of Cambria, which is diuided in two parts, Southwales called Demetia, & Northwales called Venedocia. The said Britaines moreouer through the valiant acts of their kings, sometimes raigned also in other countries, displacing the Saxons, and recouering againe their owne: sometimes more, sometimes lesse, till the time of Carecius, when as the Britaines being deposed by Gormundus (whose helpe they themselues sent for out of Ireland against Carecius their wicked king) vtterly lost their land and kingdome: being thence driuen vtterly into Wales and Cornewall, the yeare of our Lord 570. What the order of these kings was, that were their acts, their names, and times when they raigned: in this briefe table vnder written is expressed. Wherein first is to premonished, that Constantinus secundus had three children, to wit, Constans which was made a monke in Winchester, and after made a king; the second was Aurelius Ambrosius, the third was Uter Pendragon. This being premised, we will now enter the description of our table, beginning with Mortiger.

¶ A table declaring the kings of Britaine, which raigned together with the Saxons, after their comming into this land.

| Kings of Britaine which here raigned in the time of the Saxons. | Mortiger. | Constantinus 3. |

| | Uter Pendragon. | Malgo. |

Here is to be vnderstood that these Britaine kings aboue mentioned, did not lo raigne here in this land, from the time of Mortiger, that they had the full gouernment ouer all the whole realme, but only ouer parcels or parts, such as by force of armes they could either hold or winne from the Saxons:

Example what it is to let in strange nations.

The second returne of Hengist into Britaine.

The different living wayes of the Saxons to perceive the Britaines.

Saxons: which comming in daily and growing vpon them, did so replenish the land with multitudes of them, that the Britaines at length were neither able to hold that which they had, nor to recouer that which they lost: leaving example to all ages and countries, what it is, first to let in forren nations into their dominion, but especially what it is for princes to ioyne in marage with infidels: as this Vortiger did with Hengists daughter, which was the mother of all this mischiefe: graunting to the Saxons not only strength, but also occasion and courage to attempt that which they did. Neither was this inconsidered before of the Britaine lords and nobilitie: who worthily being therewith offended, nullie deposed their king, and enthroned Voltimer his sonne in his roome. By the which Voltimer being a puissant prince, the Saxons were then repulsed and driuen again into Germanie, where they stayed a while till the death of Voltimer, whom Rowen daughter of Hengist caused trayterously to be poysoned. Then Vortiger being againe restored to his kingdome, through the entreatie of Rowen his wife, sent into Germanie againe for Hengist, who assembling his returne, came in with a naure of three hundred ships well appointed. The nobles of Britaine hauing this prepared themselues of the contrarie side in all exceable wise to put them off. But Hengist through Rowen his daughter so laboured the king, creuling himselfe, and saying that he brought not the multitude to worke any violence either against him or against his countrie, but only thinking that Voltimer had yet bin aliue, whom he minded to impugne for the kings sake, and to take his part. And thus for a time he hauing this prepared themselues of the contrarie side in all exceable wise to put them off. But Hengist through Rowen his daughter so laboured the king, creuling himselfe, and saying that he brought not the multitude to worke any violence either against him or against his countrie, but only thinking that Voltimer had yet bin aliue, whom he minded to impugne for the kings sake, and to take his part. And thus for a time he hauing this prepared the death of Voltimer his enemie, he therefore committeth both himselfe and his people to his disposition, to appoint how few or how many of them he would to remaine within his land: the rest should returne. And if it so pleased the king to appoint day and place, where they might meet and talke together of the matter, both he and his would stand to such order as the king with his counsell should appoint. With these faire words the king and his nobles (well contented) did assigne to them both day and place, which was in the towne of Ambrie, where he meant to talke with them, adding this condition withall, that each part should come without any manner of weapon. Hengist shewing himselfe well agreed therete, gaue prime intelligence to his sort, that each man should carrie with him secretly in his hose a long knife, with their last dyuod also giuen to them when they should draw their knives: wherewith euery Saxon should (and so did) kill the Britaine, with whom he talked, as is aboue declared. The Britaine lords being slaine, the Saxons take Vortiger the king and bound him: for whose ransome they required to be deliuered to them the citie of Lowdon, Yorke, Lincolne, Winchester, with other the most strong-est holds within the land: which being to them granted, they begin to make spoile and hauocke of the Britaine nation, destroying the citizens, plucking downe churches, killing vp the priests, burning the bookes of the holy Scripture, leauing nothing vndone that tyrannie could worke, which was about the yeare of our Lord 462. The king seeing this miserable slaughter of the people fled into Wales.

Anno 462 Aurelius Ambrosius returneth into Britaine.

This title Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter Pendragon hyeth them to king Constans aboue mentioned, whom Vortiger trecherously caused to be killed, were in little Britaine. To whom the Britaines sent word, desiring their aid in helping their countrie. Aurelius vnderstanding the wofull state of the realme, speedeth him ouer to satisfie their desire, and to rescue (what in him was) their necessitie. Who at his first comming ecliones being ecclaued so: their king, seeketh out wicked Vortiger, the cause of all this trouble and murther of king Constans his brother. And finding him in Wales in a strong tower, wherein he had immured himselfe, setteth him and his castle on fire. That done, he moued his power age nst the Saxons, with whom, and with Ele captaine of the Southsaxons (who then was newly come ouer) he had diuers conflicts.

Vortiger burned in his tower.

Hengist slaine.

Hengist taken in the field.

Our English old chronicles make record that Hoslus the brother of Hengist was slaine before in the time of Vortimer. The same also do record, that this Hengist was taken prisoner in the field, fighting against Aurelius Ambrosius: who then consulting with his nobles and barons what was to be done with him, the bishop of Worcester called Eladius, standing by, gaue this counsell, saying: that if all men would deliuer him, yet he with his owne hands would cut him in pieces, alledging the example of Samuel against Agag king of the Amalechits, taken by king Saul in the field, whom the said Samuel caused to be cut in pieces. Sith so (saith he) do you to this Agag here: that as he hath made many a woman widow, and without children, so his mother may be made this day of him likewise. And so was Hengist taken out of the citie by Eldo counsell or maior of Worcester, and there was beheaded, if truth or credit be to be giuen to these our old Britaine stories: whereof I haue nothing certainly to pronounce, but that I may suspect the truth thereof, which was about the yere of our Lord 490. whom I borrowed this booke, with many other likewise without name, Historia Cariana. This historie recordeth that Hengist died in Kent the two and thirtith yeare of his raigne: which if it be true, then is it false that he was taken at Cuntuburgh, and slaine in the north. This Aurelius Ambrosius before mentioned, is thought of Polydorus Virgilius citing the authority of Beda, to be one of the blocke of the Romans: which as it is not impossible to be true, so this is certaine by the full accompt of all our old written stories, that both the said Aurelius and his brother Uter Pendragon, being the sonnes of Constantinus, brother to Ambrosius king of little Britaine, were nursed and brought vp in England, in their tender age, and instructed by Eutelinus archbishop of London, and after the murther of Constans their elder brother, were conueyed from hence to little Britaine: whereby it is manifest that they were borne in this land, and though their father were a Roman, as Polydorus pretendeth, yet like it is that they were Britaines borne, and had a Britaine to their mother.

Aurelius Ambrosius king.

After the death of Aurelius, who (as the storie saith) was poisoned by the craftie meanes of Pascentius, sonne of Vortiger (hauing one, vnder the colo of a monke to play the physitian and so to poison him) next succeded his brother Uter surnamed Pendragon, about the yeare of our Lord 497, who fighting against Octa and Eosa, woke them and brought them to London there to be kept: but they breaking out of prison returned into Germanie for more aid. In this meane time, daily recourse was of Saxons, with great companies comming out of Saxonie: by whom the Britaines had diuers and daily conflicts, sometimes winning, sometimes losing. But long after Octa and Eosa, reuuing their power in Germanie, in all most speedie haste did returne againe, and ioyne with the other Saxons against the Britaines. Here began the state of miserable Britaine more and more to decay, while the boistrous Saxons prevailed in number and strength against the christian Britaines: expelling the people, burning downe churches and monasteries, murthering the prelats, sparing neither age nor person, but wasting christianitie almost through the whole realme. To these miseries it fell moreouer that Uter their king was sicke and could not come out notwithstanding being grieued with the lamentable destruction of his people, caused him to be brought into the campe, where God gaue him victorie: Octa and Eosa there being slaine. After this victorie in short space Uter died of poison (as is said) put into a fountaine of water, whereof the king was wont to drinke, about the yeare of our Lord, 516. Flor. hist.

The christian Britaines persecuted by the heathen Saxons.

Anno 497

Anno 516

About which time and yeare came in Stuph and Wigar vs two nephewes of Certhice king of Westsaxons, with their companies to violently vpon the Britaines, that they of the west part of the realme were not able to resist them. Then the mercifull prouidence of almightie God, raised vp to them king Arthur, the sonne of Uter: who was then crowned after him and victoriously raigned. To this Arthur the old Britaine historics do ascribe twelue great victories against the heathen Saxons: whose notorious and famous conquests, mentioned in the Britaine stories, I leaue them as I find them: referring them to the credit of their authors in whom they are found. Notwithstanding, as I do not thinke contrarie, but God by the forsaid Arthur, gaue to the Britaines some hap and quietnesse during his life, and certaine of his successors: so touching certaine of great victories, and conquests, not only ouer this land, but all ouer all Europe, I iudge them more fabulous, then that any credit should be giuen vnto them, more necessie to be ioyned with the Iliads of Homer, then to haue place in any ecclesiasticall historie. After Arthur next king of the Britaines was Constantinus the third. After him Aurelius Conanus. Then Vortiporius, after whom followed Pascentius, noted in stories to be a Sodomite. And after him the last king of the Britaines was Careticus, all guiet to ciuill war, execrable to God and man. Who being chased out by the Britaines themselues, the land fell to the possession of the Saxons, about the yeare of our Lord 568, by whom all the clergie and the christian ministers of the Britaines were then vtterly driuen out: in so much that Theonus archbishop of London, and Thadeolsius archbishop of Yorke, seeing their churches all wasted, and parishes disperced with their carriages and monuments, left their seas in Britaine, and fled into Cambria, whilst the same call Wales. Touching which matter and touching also the cause of this desolation and ruine of the Britaines kingdome, the first fountaine and origin thereof partly before is declared, where was theued in the time of Constantinus Magnus and Pammian, how these noble princes with other mo, atchieuing their victorious aduentures against other countries, whilst them great multitudes and armies out of Britaine: through the occasion whereof the land was greatly impaired and depriued of his most chiefe and principall nobles, being carried away to serue in forren warres. Which was no small cause, why the realme of Britaine (being so wasted) was the lesse able to helpe it selfe against their enemies. Although this was not the chiefe occasion, but other causes there were greater, wherefore God by his iust iudgement, suffered this plague and ouerthrow to fall vpon that people, as here out of an old author, and partly out of Gildas, as I haue found it, so I thought to annex it in this place owne words, first in Latine, then afterward Englishing the same for the more credit of that which shall be alleaged, in text as followeth.

Nobiliores etenim regni præclictos duces sequiti fuerunt, & ignobiles remanebant, qui cum vicem nobilium obtinere cœpissent, exulerunt se vitra quod dignitas expetebat. Et ob affluentiam diuitiarum superbi ceperunt tali & tantæ fornicationi indulgere, qualis nec inter gentes audita est. Et, vt Gildas historicus testatur, non solum hoc vitium, sed omnia quæ humanæ naturæ accidere solent, & præcipuè quod totius boni cuertit statum, odium veritatis, amor mendacij, susceptio mali pro bono, veneratio nequitiæ pro benignitate, exceptatio sathanæ pro angelo lucis: vngebantur reges, non propter dominium, sed qui cæteris crudeliores essent. Si quis verò eorum mitior, & veritati aliquacenus propior videretur, in hunc quasi Britanniæ subuersorem omnia odia telaque torquebantur. Omnia quæ Deo placebant & displicebant æquali lance inter eos pendebantur. Et non solum hoc seculares viri, sed & ipsi grex domini, cuiusque pastores sine discretione faciebant. Non igitur admirandum est si degeneres tales patriam illam anittere, quam præclicto modo maculabant.

In English thus: The nobles of this realme following the princes and captains aboue named, by reason thereof the subiugar and rascall sort remained behind of bone. Who when they had gotten the townes and places of the nobles, they aduanced themselues aboue that their dignitie required. And though their abundance of riches, they surpassed with pride, began to fall into such and so great fornication, as was neuer heard of euen among the gentils. And as Gildas the historiographer witnesseth, not into vice only, but also into all manner of spite-ousnesse, whereto mans nature is inclined: and especially into that which is the one thow of all good estats, the hatred of the truth, loue of lies, imbracing of euill in stead of goodnesse, regarding of mischiefe in stead of vertue, receiuing of the diuell in stead of an angell of light. They annointed kings, not such as could well rule a common wealth, but those which exceded all other in cruelitie. And if any might be preceded to be somewhat more humble or meek, or to be more inclined to fauor the truth then the residue, him did euery one hate and backbite as the ouerthrower and destroyer of Britaine. All things whether they pleased or displeased God, they regarded alike. And not secular men only did this, but also the congregation of the Lord and their bishops and teachers without any difference at all. Therefore it is not to be marueiled, that such people so degenerating and going out of kind should lose that countrie, which they had after this maner defiled.

And thus much hitherto concerning the historie of the Britains, till (by the grace of Christ) the order of time shall bring us hereafter to the treatise of Cedwalla & Calwalladrus. Now remaineth it, in returning again to the matter of the Saxons, to discourse particularly, that which before in the table aboue we haue summarilie comprehended.

In this order and race of the Saxon kings aboue specified, which had thus chuckt out the Britains, and now deuided their land in seuen kingdoms; as there were many naughtie and wicked kings (whose pernicious examples, being all set on warr and bloudshed, are greatly to be detested and eschewed of all true godly princes) so some there were againe (although but few) very sincere and good. But none almost from the first to the last, which was not either slaine in warr, or murthered in peace, or else constrained to make himselfe a monke. Such was the rage then and the tyrannie of that time. Whether we should impute it to the corruption of mans nature, or to the iust iudgement of Gods hand, so disposing the matter, that as they had violently & lewdlie bereft the Britains of their right: so they most miserablie were not only vexed of the Danes, and conquered at last by the Normans: but also more cruelly deuoured themselues, one warring still against another, till they were neither able to helpe themselues, nor yet to resist others. Of them which are noted for god among these Saxon kings, the first and principall is Ethelbertus, or Ethelbright the first king of Kent aboue specified, who by the meanes of Austin, and partly through his wife, named Berda, first receiued and preferred the christian faith in all this land of the English Saxons, whereof more followeth hereafter to be said (the Lord so permitting) as place and opportunitie shall require. The next place I giue to Oswaldus of Northumberland, who not onely did his indeuor in furthering the faith of Christ amongst his people: but also being king, disdained not himselfe to stand by and interpret to his nobles and subiects the preaching of Aidanus, preaching Christ to them in his Scottish language. In the same commendation also, like as in the same line, commeth his vncle Edwin, king of Northumberland, a good prince, and the first receiuer of Christs faith in that land, by the meanes of his wife, and Paulinus bishop. As to these also Sigebert, first christened king of the Eastangles, and Sebert, first christened king of Essex: of whom the one was a great furtherer of religion, and setter vp of schooles: the other, which is Sebert or Sebright, was nephue to Ethelbert of Kent, vnder whom he ruled in Esser. By the which Ethelbert, in the time of the said Sebert the church of Pauls was builded at London, and christian faith much inlarged, &c. Of the same name there was also another Ethelbert king of the Eastangles, a good prince; who by the aduice of his counsell perswaded to marriage (though against his voluntie) peaceable to king Offa for despousage of Athilrid his daughter, where the god king meaning innocentlie, through the craftie and diuelish counsell of king Offa his wife, was secretly beheaded and made away. Whereupon Offa (though repentance thereof, made the first Peter pence to be guen to S. Peters church in Rome.

In the catalogue of these good kings is also to be numbred Kenelmus king of the Mercians, and Edmundus king of the Eastangles: of the which two, the first was falslie and abominablie circumuented and beheaded, by the meanes of his cruell sister and his tutor, as he was in his hunting at Coxtaile. The other which is called king Edmund & martyr, was slaine at Uerie, or (as some write) at the castle of Hatelson by the Danes: vpon what occasion, historics do verie. The author of Flores historiarum saith, it was by reason of one Lothbroke a Dane: who being of the kings bloud, & being with his hauke on the sea side in a little boie, was driuen by the force of weather into the coast of Northfolke, where he being presented to king Edmund was retained in the court with great honor: till at length one day beside the kings falconer, emuying & despiting him for his great dexteritie in that exercise, priuily did murther him in a wod. This being at last spied, as murther light-lie will come out) Bericke was set in Lothbroks bote alone, without all tackling, to be committed vnto the sea: and as it chanced so, was driuen into Denmarke, who there being seene in Lothbroks bote, was straicte examined of the parts & yeo then to recite himselfe, saithe said he was slaine by the commandement of the king. Vpon the occasion whereof Inguar and Hubba sonnes to the said Lothbroke gathering an armie of Danes, inuaded first Northumberland: after that burning into Northfolke on euery side, sent this message to king Edmund after this tenor: Signifying that king Inguar the victorious prince (dreaded both by sea and land) as he hath subiect & vanquished lands vnder him, so arriuing now to the coasts of Northfolke, where he intendeth to winter, chargeth & commandeth him to diuide with him his old treasures, and his fathers riches, and so to rule vnder him: which if he would not do, but would contemne his power so strongly furnished with such an armie, he should be iudged as vntowardlie both of kingdome & life, &c. The king hearing this message, not a little astonished thereat, calling his counsell about him, consulted with them, especially with one of his bishops, being then his secretarie, what was best to be done: who fearing the kings life, exhorteth him by words and diuers examples to agree to the message. At this a while the king holding his peace, at length thereto made answer against in these words, saying: Oh (saith he) tell your lord, and let him know that Edmundus the christened king, for the loue of this temporall life, will not subiect himselfe to a pagane duke, vnlesse before he become a christian, &c. The messenger taking his answer was not so some out of the gates, as Inguar meeting him, and bidding him to be short in declaring his answer, caused all the kings garrison to bee set round about. Some say that the king flying to the fetlock, there pitht a field with the Danes, but the Danes preuailing, the good king from clerks of that time: yet I cannot rashly assent to their commendation, albeit the rase thereof is into matter of our historie. First in altering their estate from kings to monks, if they did it to find more ease, and lesse trouble thereby; I see not how that excuse standeth with the office of a god man, to change his publike vocation for respect of priuat commodite. If feare of losse parde and danger did driue them thereunto: what praise and commendation they deserue in so doing, let the monkish historics iudge what they list. Me seemeth so much praise as they deserue in prouiding their owne safetie, so much they deserue again to be discommended in forsaking the common wealth. If they did it (as most like it is) for holinesse sake, thinking in that kind of life to serue and please God better; or to merit more thereby, then their saluation then in the estate of a king, there in they were farre deceiued: not knowing that the saluation which commeth of God, is to be measured and esteemed, not by mans merites, or by any perfection of life, or by difference of anie vocation more of one then another, but onely by the free grace of the gospell, which freely inuiteth all them that faithfullie beleeue in Christ Iesu. But here will bee laid against me, that Ambrose, in the solitarie life of monkerie be fewer occasions of euils then in kings courts, wherefore that life seemeth more to holinesse, and more is to be preferred then the other. To this I answer, To auoid the occasions of euil is god where strength sacketh to resist; but otherwise, where duetie and charge bindeth to tarrie, there not to flie but to resist the occasions of euil, where rather they are to be resisted, rather boldneth a weakenesse of the mind then defeureth any paine. As it is truly said of Tullie: But of Asia, saith he, to line a good life, is no godamercie; but in Asia where where ſo great occaſions of euils abound, there to line a good man, that is praiſe worthie. With the like reaſon I may inſer, if a man be called to be a king, there not to change the vocation for auoiding of occaſions, but rather to reſiſt occaſions, and to keepe his vocation, declareth a good and perfect man. But of theſe by-matters hitherto ſufficient.

Theſe things now thus premiſed, concerning the order and raigne of kings, as is aboue prefixed: conſequently it remaineth to enter the treatation of ſuch things, as in the time and raigne of the foreſaid kings happened in the churchyard: putting the reader againe in mind of the former perſecutions within the realme, partly before touched in the time of the Britaine kings, which ſpecially were three or foure before the comming of Auſtin into England.

The firſt perſecution vnder Dioclesian.

1 The firſt was vnder Dioclesian, and that not onelie in England, but generallie throughout all the Romane monarchie, as is aboue ſpecified. In this perſecution Albanus, Iulius, Aaron, with a great number more of other good chriſtian Britains were martyred for Chriſts name.

The ſecond perſecution vnder the Pictes and Scots.

2 The ſecond perſecution or deſtruction of chriſtian faith, was by the inuading of Pictes and Scots, wherof the firſt was captaine of the Pictes, the other of the Britons. Theſe two tyrants, after the cruell ſlaughter of Dioclesians another 11000 noble virgins, made their rode into Britaine, hearing the ſame to be deſtitute of the ſtrength of men. At what time they made miſerable murther of Chriſts ſaints, ſpoiling and waſting churches, without mercie either of women or children, ſparing none.

The third perſecution vnder Hengiſt, and the Saxons.

3 The third perſecution came by Hengiſt, and the Saxons: who likewiſe deſtroyed and waſted the chriſtian congregations within the land, like raging wolues flying vpon the ſheepe, and ſpilling the bloud of chriſtians, till Aurelius Ambroſius came, and reſtored againe the churches deſtroyed.

The fourth deſtruction of chriſtian faith in Britaine by Cuthwulph in the yeere 565.

4 The fourth deſtruction of the chriſtian faith and religion was by Cuthwulphus a pagane king of the Africans, who ioyning in league with the Saxons, warraght much miſchiefe to the chriſtians of the land. In ſo much that Theonus biſhop of London, and Thadiocetus biſhop of Yorke, with the reſt of the people ſo many as were left, hauing no place wherein to remaine with ſafetie, did flie ſome to Cornewall, and ſome to the mountaines of Wales about the yeere of our Lord 550. and this perſecution remained to the time of Ethelbert king of Kent, in the yeere 589.

In the raigne of this Ethelbert, which was then the fifth king of Kent, y faith of Chriſt was firſt receiued of the Saxons or Engliſhmen, by the meanes of Gregorie biſhop of Rome, in manner and order as here followeth, out of old hiſtories collected and recorded.

Firſt then to ioyne the order of our hiſtorie together: the chriſtian faith firſt receiued of king Lucius, induced in Britaine till this time, neere vpon the ſeaſon of 400. yeeres and od: when by Gwrianus Africanus (as is ſaid) fighting with the Saxons againſt the Britains, it was neere extinct in al the land, during the ſpace about forty foure yeres. So that the firſt bringing of Chriſts goſpell in this land, was in the yeere of our Lord 180. The comming of the Saxons was in the yeere 449. or 450. The comming of Auſtin was in the yeere 596. From the firſt entring in of the Saxons to their complet conqueſt, and the driuing out of the Britains (which was about the latter time of Cadwalader) were 240. yeres. In ſumme, from Chriſt to Lucius were 180. yeres. The continuance of the goſpell from Lucius to the entring of the Saxons, was 202. yeres. The beare of the ſame to the entring of Auſtin, was 140. yeres, which being added together make from Lucius to Auſtin 445. yeres, from Chriſt to Auſtin they make 598. yeres. In this yeere then 598. Auſtin being ſent from Gregorie came into England: the occaſion whereupon Gregorie ſent him hither was this.

Dorchaniam ciuitatem Dorobernie.

In the daies of Pelagius biſhop of Rome, Gregorie chancing to ſe certaine children in the market place of Rome (brought thither to be ſold out of England) being faire & beautifull of viſage, demanded out of what countrie they were. And vnderſtanding they were heatheniſh out of England, lamented the caſe of the land being ſo beautifull and angeliſcall, to be ſubiect vnder the prince of darkeneſſe. And aſking moreouer out of what prouince they were? It was anſwered, out of Deira, a part of Northſaxons: whereof as it is to be thought, that which we now call Deirham taketh his name. Then he alluding to the name of Deira; Theſe people (ſaith he) are to be deliuered De ira, which is, From Gods wrath. Moreouer vnderſtanding the kings name of that prouince to be Alle (aboue mentioned) alluding likewiſe to his name: There (ſaith he) ought Alleluia to be ſung to the liuing God. Whereupon being moued and deſirous to go & helpe the conuerſion of that countrie, was not permitted of Pelagius and the Romans for that time to accompliſh his deſire. But afterward being biſhop himſelfe next after Pelagius, hee ſent thither the foreſaid Auſtin with other preachers more about to the number of fortie. But by the way; how it hapned I cannot ſay: As Auſtin with his companie were paſſing in their iournie ſuch a ſudden feare entred into their harts (as Antoninus ſaith) they returned all. Others write that Auſtin was ſent backe to Gregorie againe, to releaſe them of that voiage ſo dangerous and incertaine, amongſt ſuch a barbarous people: whoſe language they neither knew, nor whoſe rudeneſſe they were able to reſiſt. Then Gregorie with pithie perſuaſions confirming and comforting him, ſent him againe with letters both to the biſhop of Arelate, willing him to helpe & aid the ſaid Auſtin, and his companie in all whatſoeuer his need required. Alſo other letters he directed by the foreſaid Auſtin, vnto his fellowes, exhorting them to goe forward boldly in the Lords worke: as by the tenor of the ſaid epiſtle here following may appeare.

Epiſcopum Arelatenſem.

Gregorius ſeruus ſeruorum Dei, ſeruis Domini noſtri. Quia melius fuerat bonanon incipere, quam ab ijs quæ cepta ſunt cogitatione retrorſum redire, &c. In Engliſh: Gregorie the ſeruant of Gods ſeruants, to the ſeruants of the Lord. For ſomuch as it is better not to take good things in hand, then after they be begun to thinke to reuolt back frō the ſame againe: therefore now you may not nor cannot (deere children) but with al ſeruent ſtudy & labor muſt needs go forward in that good buſines which through the helpe of God you haue well begun. Neither let the labor of your iourny, nor the ſlanderous tongues of men appall you; but that with all inſtance and ſeruencie ye proceed, and accompliſh the thing which the Lord hath ordained you to take in hand: knowing that your great trauell ſhall be recompenſed with reward of greater glorie hereafter to come. Therefore as we ſend here Auſtin to you againe, whom alſo we haue ordained to be your gouernour, ſo doe you humbly obay him in all things, knowing that it ſhall be profitable ſo for your ſoules, whatſoeuer his admonition ye ſhall do. Almighty God with his grace defend you, and grant me to ſee in the eternall countrie the fruite of your labour, that although I cannot labour as I would with you, yet I may be found partaker of your retribution, for that my will is good to labor in the ſame fellow ſhip with you together. The Lord God keepe you ſafe, moſt deere and welbeloued children. Dated the tenth before the Kalends of Auguſt, in the raigne of our Lord Mauricius moſt vertuous emperour, the fourteenth of his empire.

Ex Henr. Huntingtonen. lib. 3. The epiſtle of Gregorie to them which went to preach in England.

Thus they emboldened and comforted through the good words of Gregorie, ſped forth their iournie till they came at length to the Ile of Thenet, lying vpon the eaſt ſide of Kent. Here to the which landing place was then the manoir or palace of the king, not far from Sandwich (eaſtward from Canterbury) which Iland is now ſwalowed vp & the Ile then called Thanet. Auſtin and his companie comment to England.

Ethelbert king of Kent.

borough: whereof ſome part of the ruinous walls is yet to be ſeene. The king then raigning in Kent, was Ethelbert, as aboue appeareth, the fifth king of that prouince: who at that time had maried to wife a French woman being chriſtened, named Berta, whom he had receiued of her parents vpon this condition, that he ſhould permit her with her biſhop committed vnto her, called Leberdus, to inioy the freedome of her faith and religion: by the meanes whereof he was more flexible, and ſooner induced to imbrace the preaching and doctrine of Chriſt. Then Auſtin being arriued ſent forth certain meſſengers and interpretors to the king, ſignifying that ſuch a one was come from Rome, bringing with him glad tidings to him and all his people of life and ſaluation eternally to raigne in heauen, with the onlie true and liuing God for euer: if he ſhould be willing to hearken to the ſame, as he was gladly come to preach and teach it vnto him.

What goodnes commeth to haue a good and godly wife.

The king, who had heard of this religion before by meanes of his wife, within a few daies after commeth to the place where Auſtin was to ſpeake with him: but that he ſhould be without the houſe, after the manner of his lads. Auſtin againſt his comming, as ſome affirme, erected vp a banner of the croſſe (ſuch was then the groſſeneſſe of that time) and preached to him the word of God. The king anſwering againe ſaith in effect as followeth: The words be very faire that you preach and promiſe, neuertheleſſe, becauſe it is to me vncouth and new, I cannot ſoone ſtart away from my countrie lawe wherewith I haue been long inured, & aſſent to you. Albeit yet notwithſtanding for that ye are come (as ye ſay) ſo far fo my ſake, ye ſhall not be moleſted by me, but ſhall be right well intreated, hauing all things to you miniſtred neceſſarie for your ſupportation. Beſides this, neither doe we debar you, but to haue free leaue to preach to our people and ſubiects, to conuert whom ye may to the faith of your religion.

The king ſtaieth vpon old cuſtome.

The kinges anſwere to Auſtin.

Then they had receiued this comfort of the king, they went with proceſſion to the citie of Dorobernia, or Canturburie, ſinging Alleluia with the Letanie, which then by Gregory had been vſed at Rome in the time of the great plague raigning then at Rome, mentioned in old ſtories. The words of the Letanie were theſe: Deprecamur te Domine in omni miſericordia tua, vt auferatur furor tuus & ira tua à ciuitate iſta, & de domo ſancta tua, quoniam peccauimus, Alleluia. That is: We beſeech the O Lord in all thy mercies, that thy fiercenes and anger may ceaſe from this citie, and from thy holy houſe, for we haue ſinned, Alleluia. Thus they entring in the citie of Dorobernia, the head citie of al that dominion at that time, where the king had giuen them a manſion for their abode: there they continued preaching and baptiſing ſuch as they had conuerted in the eaſt ſide of the city in the old church of S. Martine, where the queene was was wont to reſort vnto the time that the king was conuerted himſelfe to Chriſt. At length, when the king had well conſidered the honeſt converſation of their life, and moued with the miracles wrought through Gods hand by them, he heard them more gladly, and laſtly by their wholeſome exhortations and cramp ſe of godly life, he was by them conuerted and chriſtened, in the yeere aboue ſpecified 586. and the firſt and thirty yeere of his raigne. After the king was thus conuerted, innumerable other daily came in & were adioyned to the church of Chriſt, whom the king did ſpecially imbrace, but compelled none; for ſo he had learned, that the faith and ſeruice of Chriſt ought to be voluntarie and not coacted. Then he gaue to Auſtin a place for his biſhops ſee at Chriſts church in Dorobernia, and builded the abbie of S. Peter and Paul in the eaſt ſide of the ſaid citie, where after Auſtin and all the kings of Kent were buried, and that place is now called S. Auſtine.

Auſtin made archbiſhop.

In this while Auſtin ſailed into France vnto the biſhop Arelatenſis, called Etherius, by him to be conſecrated archbiſhop by the commandement of Gregorie, and ſo was. Alſo the ſaid Auſtin ſent to Rome Laurentius one of his companie, to declare to Gregory how they had ſped, and what they had done in England, ſending withall to haue the counſell and aduice of Gregorie concerning nine or ten queſtions, whereof ſome are partly touched before.

The tenor of his queſtions or interrogations, with the anſwers of Gregorie to the ſame, here follow in Engliſh briefly tranſlated.

The queſtions of Auſtin an archbiſhop of Canturburie ſent to Gregorie, with the anſwer againe of Gregorie to the ſame.

The firſt interrogation.

Ex decreto Gregory primi. lib. concil. tom. 2.

The firſt interrogation.

The anſwer.

MY firſt queſtion (reuerend father) is concerning biſhops, how they ought to behaue themſelues toward their clerks, or of ſuch oblations as the faithfull offer vpon the altar: what portions or diuidens ought to be made thereof?

The anſwere.

How a biſhop ought to behaue himſelfe in the congregation, the holy ſcripture teſtifieth, which I doubt not but you know right well: eſpecially in the epiſtles of S. Paul to Timothie: wherein he laboureth to inſorme the ſaid Timothy how to behaue his converſation in the houſe of the Lord. The manner is of the ſe myſteries to intreate and diſpoſe all things, as good biſhops, of all their ſtipend, or that which is giuen, to make foure partitions. One to the biſhop for hoſpitalitie and receiuing commers in: another to the clergie; the third to the poore; the fourth to the repairing of churches. But becauſe your brotherhood inſtructed with rules of monaſticall diſcipline, can not line ſeparated from your clerks about you, therefore in the Engliſh church (which now through the prouidence of God is brought to the faith of Chriſt) you muſt obſerue this inſtitution concerning your converſation, which was in the firſt fathers in the beginning of the primitiue church, among whom there was not one, which counted any thing to be his owne proper of all that hee did poſſeſſe: but all was common among them.

Diſtribution of the churches goods.

The ſecond interrogation.

The ſecond interrogation.

I deſire to know and to be inſtructed, whether clerks that cannot containe, may marrie: and if they doe marrie, whether then they ought to returne to the ſecular ſtate againe or no?

The anſwere.

The anſwer.

If there be any clerkes out of holy orders, which cannot containe, let them haue their wiues, and take their ſtipends or wages without. For twee reade it is written of the foreſaid fathers, that they diuided to euery perſon according as their worke was. Therefore as concerning the ſtipend of ſuch, it muſt be prouided and thought vpon. And they muſt be alſo holden vnder eccleſiaſticall diſcipline, to line a godly converſation, to employ themſelues in ſinging pſalmes, and to reſtraine their tongue, hart & bodie (by the grace of God) from all things diſcreuable and vnlawfull. As for the vulgar and common ſort which line after the common condition of men, to deſcribe that partitions to make, what hoſpitalitie to keepe, or what works of mercie to exhibit, to ſuch I haue nothing to ſay, but to giue (as our maſter teacheth) in all our deeds of mercie of that which abounderh. Of that (ſaith he) which abounderh or is ouerplus, giue almes, and behold all things be cleane vnto you.

The gloſſe vpon the 12. to Titum, Vigil. ſaith that theſe now holden not, and altogether the Epiſt. Hector. commung ex. Ioh. &c. Wherby note how the popes decrees be repugnant to themſelues. Luke 11.

The third interrogation.

The third interrogation.

Seeing there is but one faith, how happeneth it then the ceremonies and cuſtomes of churches to be ſo diuers: as in the church of Rome there is one cuſtome and manner of maſſe, and the French church hath another?

The anſwer.

Anſwer.

The cuſtome of the church of Rome, ſeeing that it is your minde, wherein you remember that you haue been brought vp from your youth, but rather it pleaſeth me better, that whether it be in the church of Rome, or in any French church: where ye find any thing that ſeemeth better to the ſeruice & pleaſing of God, that ye chooſe the ſame, and ſo inſtrand bring into the Engliſh church (which is yet new in the faith) the beſt & pitcheſt things choſen out of many churches: for things are not to be beloued for the place ſake, but the place is to be beloued for the things that be good: wherefore ſuch things as be good, godly, and religious, thoſe chuſe out of all churches, and indoctrine to your people, that they may take root in the minds of Engliſhmen.

The fourth interrogation.

The fourth interrogation.

I pray you, what puniſhment iudge you for him, that ſhall ſteale or pilfer any thing out of the church?

The anſwer.

The anſwer.

This your brotherhood may ſoone diſcerne, by the perſon of a theefe, how it ought to be corrected. For ſome there be, which hauing ſufficient to liue vpon, yet doe ſteale. Others there be which ſteale of meere neceſſity. Wherfore conſidering the qualitie and difference of the crime, neceſſarie it is that ſome bee corrected by loſſe of goods, ſome by ſtripes, ſome others more ſharpli, and ſome more eaſie: yea, and when they are corrected in ſo to be executed, yet that muſt be done with charitie, & with no furie: for in puniſhing offendors, this is the cauſe and end wherefore they are puniſhed, becauſe they ſhould be ſaued & not periſh in hell fire. And ſo ought diſcipline to proceed in correcting the faithfull, as do good fathers in puniſhing their children, whom both they chaſten for their euill, and yet being chaſtened they looke to haue them their heires, and thinke to leaue them all they haue, notwithſtanding they correct them ſometimes in anger. Therefore this charitie muſt be kept in mind and in the correction there is a meaſure to be had, ſo that the mind neuer do any thing without the rule of reaſon. Be adde moreouer, with what recompence of meaſure thoſe things ought to bee required againe, which bee ſtollen out of churches. That God forbid that the church ſhould euer require againe with increaſe, that which is loſt in outward things, and to ſeeke her gaine by indamaging others.

Note a worthie ſaying of Cyprian.

The fifth interrogation.

Item, whether two brethren may marry two ſiſters, being far off from any part of kindred?

The anſwer.

The anſwer.

This is in no part of ſcripture ſo forbidden, but it may well and lawfullie be done.

The ſixth interrogation.

The firſt interrogation.

Item, to what degree of kindred may the matrimonie of the faithfull extend with their kindred, or whether is it lawfull to marrie with the ſtepmother and her kinſfolks?

The anſwer.

The anſwer.

A certeine terren law amongſt the old Romans doth permit, that either brother or ſiſter, or the ſonne and daughter of two brethren may marrie together. But by experience wee learne, that the iſſue of ſuch marriage doth neuer thriue, nor come forward. Alſo the holy law of God forbiddeth to reueale the turpitude of thy blood or kindred. Wherefore neceſſarie it is, that in the third or fourth degree the faithfull may lawfullie marrie; for in the ſecond (as being vnlawfull) they muſt needs reſtraine. To be coupled with the ſtepmother is vtterly abominable, for it is written in the law; Thou ſhalt not reueale the turpitude of thy father. For ſomuch then as it is ſo written in the law, And they ſhall be two in one fleſh: the ſonne then that preſumeth to reueale the turpitude of his ſtepmother, which is one fleſh with his father, what doth he then but reueale the turpitude of his owne father? Likewiſe it was forbidden and vnlawfull to marry with the kinſwoman, which by his firſt marriage was made one fleſh with thy brother: for the which cauſe John the Baptiſt alſo loſt his head, and was crowned a martyr. Who though he did not for the confeſſion of Chriſt, yet for ſomuch as Chriſt ſaith; I am the truth: therefore in that John Baptiſt was ſtatute for the truth, it may bee ſaid his bloud was ſhed for Chriſt.

In Iohar degrees of kindred a man may marrie.

By this rule the marriage of king Henrie the eight with Katherine Dowager was vnlawfull.

The ſeuenth interrogation.

The ſeuenth interrogation.

Item, whether ſuch as ſo be coupled together in filthy and vnlawfull matrimonie ought to be ſeparated, and denied the partaking of the holy communion?

The anſwer.

The anſwer.

Becauſe there bee many of the nation of Engliſhmen which being yet in their infidelitie, were ſo ioyned and coupled in ſuch execrable marriage: the ſame comming now to faith, are to be admoniſhed hereafter to abſtaine from the like, and that they know the ſame to be a grieuous ſin; that they dread the dreadfull iudgement of God, leſt for their carnall delectation they incur the torments of eternall puniſhment. And yet notwithſtanding they are not to be ſeluded therefore from the participation of Chriſts bodie and bloud, leſt we ſhould ſeeme to reuenge thoſe things in them, which they before their baptiſme through ignorance did commit. For in this time the holy church doth correct ſome faults more ſeuerelie, ſome faults ſhe ſuffereth againe through manſuetude and meeknes. ſome wittinglie and willinglie thee doth winke at and diſſemble: that ſame times the euill which ſhe doth deteſt through bearing and diſſembling the may ſtop and hinder. All they therefore which are come to the faith, muſt be admoniſhed that they commit no ſuch offence. Which thing if they doe, they are to be depriued of the communion of the Lords bodie and bloud. For like as in them that fall through ignorance, their default in this caſe is tollerable: ſo in them againe it is ſtrongly to be inſued, which knowing they do naught, yet feare not to commit.

A diſcreet ſaying of Gregorie to be noted.

The

The eight interrogation.

The eight interrogation. Item, in this I desire to be satisfied, after what maner I should deale or doe with the bishops of France. Deleance

The answer. The answere.

As touching the bishops in France, I giue you no authoritie or power ouer them. For the bishop of Arelas or Arelate hath by the old time of our predecessors receiued the pall, whom now we ought not to depriue of his authoritie. Therefore when your brotherhood shall go vnto the province of France, whatsoeuer ye shall haue there to do with the bishop of Deleance, so doe, that he lose nothing of that which he hath found and obtained of the ancient ordinance of our forefathers. But as concerning the bishops of Britaine, we commit them all to your brotherhood, that the ignoraunt may be taught, the infirme by perswasion may be confirmed, the wilfull by authoritie may be corrected.

Lect. 25. cap. 2. in Gallatanus.

The ninth interrogation.

The ninth interrogation. Whether a woman, being great with child, ought to be baptised, or after she hath childe, after how long time she ought to enter into the church? Or els, that which she hath brought forth, lest it should be preuented with death, after how many daies it ought to receiue baptisme? Or after how long time after her childbirth is it lawfull for her husband to resort to her? Or els if she be in her monthlie course, after the disease of women, whether then she may enter into the church, and receiue the sacrament of the holie communion? Or whether her husband after the lying with his wife, before he be washed with water, whether is it lawfull for him to enter the church, and to draw vnto the mysterie of the holy communion? All which things must be declared and opened to the rude multitude of Englishmen.

The answere. The answere.

The childing or bearing women, why may she not be baptised, seeing that the fruitfulnesse of the flesh is no fault before the eies of almightie God? For our first parents in paradise, after they had transgressed, lost their immortalitie by the iust iudgement of God, which they had taken before. Then because almightie God would not mankind vtterly to perish because of his fall (although he lost now his immortalitie for his trespasse) yet of his benigne pitie left notwithstanding to him the fruit and generation of life. Therefore the fruit and generation of mans nature, which is conceiued by the gift of almightie God, how can it be debarred from the grace of holie baptisme?

The churching of women. As concerning the churching of women, after they haue trauelled, where ye demand after how many daies they ought to goe to the church, this you haue learned in the old lawe, Pentateuch. for a man child thirtie dayes, after a woman child fortie and three daies be appointed her to keepe in: albeit this you must take to be vnderstood in a mysterie. For if she should the houre after her trauell enter into the church to giue thanks, she committed therein no sinne: for why? the lust and pleasure of the flesh, and not the trauell and paine of the flesh is sinne. In the coniunction of the flesh is pleasure, but in the trauell and bringing forth of the child is paine and groning: as vnto the mother of all it is said: In sorow thou shalt trauell. Therein is sinne forbid to the woman after her labor to enter into the church, then what doe we else but count the same punishment giuen vnto her for sinne? Therefore for the woman after her labor to be baptised, either that which the hath trauelled foorth (if present necessitie of death doth so require) yea in the selfe same houre, either she that hath brought forth, either that which is borne in the same houre when it is borne, to be baptised we doe not forbid.

He speaketh here after the custome of the time.

Mothers that nurse not their owne children reprehended.

Moreouer, for the man to companie with his wife: that he must not, before the child that is borne be wained. But now there is a leaud and naughtie custome risen in the condition of married folkes, that mothers doe contemne to nurse their owne children which they haue borne, but set them to other women out to nurse, which seemeth only to come of the cause of incontinencie: for whilst they will not contain themselues, therefore they put from them their children to nurse, &c.

As concerning the women in their menstruous course, whether she ought to enter the church? To this I answer: She ought not to be forbid. For the imperfaitie of nature in her ought not to be imputed for any fault, neither is it iust that she should be depriued of her accesse to the church, for that which she suffereth against her will. And if the woman did well, praising in touching the Lords cote in the time of her bloody issue: why then may not that be granted vnto all women infirmed by the fault of nature, which is commended in one person done in her infirmitie? Therefore to receiue the mysterie of the holie communion, it is not forbidden them. Albeit if she dare not so far presume in her great infirmitie, she is to be praised, but if she receiue, she is not to be iudged. This is a point of a good mind in some maner to acknowledge her sins there, where is no sinne: because many times that is done without fault, which commeth of fault. As when we be hungrie, wee eate without fault, notwithstanding it commeth by the fault of our first father to vs that we are hungrie, &c.

Where ye aske, if a man after the companie with his wife may resort to the church, or to the holy communion, before he be purged with water? The law giuen to the old people, commanded that a man (after the companie with his wife) both should bee purified with water, and also should tarrie the sunne set before hee came to the congregation. Which seemeth to be vnderstood spiritually: for then most true it is, that the man companieth with the woman, when his mind through delectation is ioyned to vnlawfull concupiscence in his heart and cogitation. At what time, before the said fire of concupiscence shall be remooued, let the person thinke himselfe vnworthie the entrance to the congregation, through the viciousnesse of his filthie will. But of this matter sundrie nations haue euerie one their sundrie customes: some one way and some another. The ancient maner of the Romans from our forefathers, hath been, that in such case, first they purge themselues with water, then so: a little they abstaine reuerently, and so resort to the church, &c.

After many other words debated of this matter, thus he inferreth. What if any person not for voluptuousnes of the flesh, but for procreation of children, doe companie with his wife, that man concerning either the comming to the church, or the receiuing the mysteries of the Lords bodie and bloud, is to be left to his owne iudgement: for he ought not to be forbid of us to come, which when he lieth in the fire will not burne, &c.

There is another question also to the same purpose, with his answer likewise to the same, concerning [illegible]tions in the night: but I thought these at this present to our English eares sufficient.

To returne now to the storie against: Gregorie after hee had sent these resolutions to the questions of Austin, sendeth moreouer to the church of England more coadiutors, and helpers, as Pelitus, Iustus, Paulinus, & Rustianus, with books & such other implements as he thought necessarie for the English church. Hee sendeth moreouer to the foresaid Austin a pall with letters, wherein he setteth an order betweene the two metropolitane sees, the one to be at London, the other to bee at Yorke. Notwithstanding he graunteth to the said Austin during his life to be the onely chiefe archbishop of all the land: and after his time, then to returne to the two foresaid sees of London and Yorke, as is in the same letter contained, the tenor whereof here followeth in his owne words, as insueth.

The copie of the epistle of Gregorie, sent to Austin into England.

Reuerendissimo & sanctissimo fratri Augustino coepiscopo, Gregorius seruus seruorum Dei. Cumcertum sit, pro omnipotente Deo laborantibus ineffabilia eterni regis præmia reseruari, nobis tamen est necesse ut bona quæ operamur in diuinitate operis studio ex remuneratione valeat multiplicius insudare, &c.

As followeth here in English.

TO the reuerend and vertuous brother Augustine, his fellow bishop, Gregorius the seruant of the seruants of God. Although it be most certaine, that vnspeakeable rewards of the heauenlie king be laid vp for all such as labour in the words of almightie God: yet it shall be requisit for vs to reward the same also with our benefits, to the end they may be more incouraged, to go forward in the studie of their spirituall worke. And forsomuch now, as the new church of Englishme is brought to the grace of almightie God, through his mightie helpe, and your trauell, therefore we haue granted to you the vse of the pall, onely to be vsed at the solemnitie of your masse: so that it shall be lawfull for you to ordaine twelue bishops, such as shall be subiect to your prouince or dition. So that hereafter alwaies the bishop of the citie of London shall be ordained and consecrated by his owne proper synod: and so to receiue the pal of honor from the holy and apostolike see, wherein I here (by the permission of God) do serue. And as touching the city of York, we will send also a bishop thither, whom you may think meet to ordaine. So that if that citie with other places bordering thereby, shall receiue the word of God, he shall haue power likewise to ordaine twelue bishops, & haue the honour of a metropolitane: to whom also if God spareme life, I intend by the fauour of God to send a pall: this prouided, that notwithstanding he shall be subiect to your brotherly appointment. But after your decease, the same metropolitane, so to be ouer the bishops who he ordreth, that he be in no wise subiect to the metropolitane of London after you. And hereafter betwixt these two prouinces, Londons and Yorke, let there be had such distinction of honor, that he shal haue the prioritie, which shall in time first be ordained. With common counsell, and affection of heart, let them go both together, disposing with one accord such things as be to be done for the zeale of Christ. Let them forethinke and deliberat together prudentlie, and what they deliberat wisely, let them accomplish concordly, not iarring nor swarning one from the other. But as for your part, you shall be indued with authoritie, not onely ouer those bishops, that you constitute, and ouer the other constituted by the bishop of Yorke; but also you to haue all other priests of whole Britaine, subiect vnto our Lord Iesus Christ: to the end that through your preaching and holinesse of life, they may learne both to beleeue rightlie and to liue purely, and so in directing their life, both by the rude of true faith & vertuous manners, they may attaine, when God shall call them, the fruition and kingdome of heauen. God preserue you in health reuerend brother.

The tenth before the kalends of July, in the raigne of our soueraigne lord Mauricius most vertuous emperour.

Gregorie calleth the emperour his lord.

A letter of Gregorie to Pelitus.

Besides this, the said Gregorie sendeth also another letter to Pelitus concerning his iudgement, that is to be done with the idolatrous temples and phanes of the Englishmen newlie conuerted, which phanes he thinketh not best to plucke downe, but to conuert the vse thereof, and so let them stand. And likewise of their sacrifices and killing of oxen, how the same ought to be ordered, and how to be altered: disputing by the occasions there of, of the sacrifices of the old Egyptians, permitted of God vnto the Iraelites, the end and vse thereof being altered, &c.

A letter of Gregorie to Austin.

He sendeth also another letter to the foresaid Austin, vpbraiding him not to be proud or puft vp for the miracles wrought of God by him, in conuerting the people of England, but rather to feare and tremble, lest so much as he were puft vp by the continuall work of miracles, so much he should fall vnwarily through the vaine glorie of his heart: and therefore wisely exhorteth him to represse the swelling glorie of heart, with the remembrance of his sinnes rather against God, whereby he rather hath cause to lament, then to reioyce for the other.

Not all the elect of God (saith hee) worke miracles, and yet haue they their names written in the booke of life. And therefore he should not count so much of those miracles done, but reioyce rather with trembling, and to haue his name written in the booke of life, where all the elect of God be contained, neither is there any end of that reioycing. And whatsoeuer miracles it hath pleased God by him to haue been done, he should remember they were not done for him, but for their conuertion, whose saluation God sought thereby, &c.

A letter of Gregorie to king Ethelbert.

Item, he directed another epistle to king Ethelbert, as is expressed at large in the booke of Henrie of Huntingdon, lib. 3. in the which epistle, first he praiseth God, then commendeth the godnesse of the king, by whom it pleased God so to worke such godnesse of the people. Secondly, exhorteth him to persist and continue in the godly profession of Christs faith, and to bee feruent and zealous in the same; in conuerting the multitude, in destroying the temples and works of idolatrie, in ruling and gouerning the people in all holinesse & godly conuersation, after the godly example of the emperor Constantinus the great. Lastly, comforting him with the promises of life and reward to come, with the Lord that raigneth and liueth for euer: premonishing him besides, of the terrors and distresses that shall happen (though not in his daies) yet before the terrible day of Gods iudgement. Wherefore he willeth him alwaies to be solicitous for his soule, and suspectfull of the houre of his death, & watchfull of the goodnesse of God, that he may be alwaies prepared to the same, when that iudgement shall come. In the end he desireth him to accept such presents and gifts which he thought good to send vnto him from Rome, &c.

{Anno 600} Polychronic. lib 5. cap. 9. Fab. part. 5. cap. 110.

Austin thus receiuing his pall from Gregorie, as is aboue said, and now of a monke being made an archbishop, after hee had baptised a great part of Kent: he after made two archbishops in prouinces by the commandement of Gregorie, as writeth Polychron. one at London, another at Yorke.

Archbishops of London and of Yorke made by Austin.

Pelitus bishop of London.

Pelitus, of whom mention is made before, was sent specially to the Eastsaxons in the prouince of Esser, where after he was made bishop of London, vnder Sigebert king of Esser; which Sigebert together with his vncle Ethelbert first builded the church and minster of S. Paul in London, and appointed it a See for the bishops there. Austin therefore with this Pelitus and Iustus through the helpe of Ethelbert assembled and gathered together the bishops and doctors of Britaine in a place, which taking the name of the said Austin, was called Austins Oke. In this assemblie he charged the said bishops, that they should preach with him the word of God to the Englishmen, and also that they should among themselues reforme certaine rites and vsages in their church, specially for keeping of their Easter tide, baptizing after the maner of Rome, and such other like. To these the Scots and Britains would not agree, refusing to leaue the custome, which they so long time had continued, without the assent of them all which bled the same. Where the stories both of Beda, Cestrensis in Polychron. Huntingtonensis, Iornalensis, Fabianus, & others more, write of a certaine miracle wrought vpon a blind Englishman, whom when the Britains could not helpe, Austin kneeling downe and praying, restored the blind man to sight before them all, for a confirmation (as these authors say) of his opinion in keeping of Easter. But concerning the credit of this miracle, that I leaue to the authors of whom I had it.

The Britains and Scots vtterly refuse the rites of Rome.

Then Austin gathered another synod, to the which came seuen bishops of Britaine, with the wisest men of that famous abbie of Bangor. Vnto the first they spake, counselling to vse wise and holie men, amongst them, what to doe; and whether they should be obedient to Austin or not. And he said: If he be the seruant of God agree vnto him. But how shall we know that, said they? To whom he answered againe: If he be meeke and humble of heart, by that know that he is the seruant of God. To this they said againe: And how shall we know him to be humble & meeke of heart? To this (quoth he) Seeing you are the greater number, if he at your comming into your synod rise vp, and curteouslie receiue you, perceiue him to be an humble and a meeke man. But if he shall contemne and despise you (being as ye are) the greater part, despise you him again. Thus the Britaine bishops entring into the councell, Austin after the Romish maner keeping his chaire would not remoue. Whereat they being not a little offended, after some heat of words, in disdaine & great displeasure departed thence. To whom then Austin spake, and said, that if they would not take peace with their brethren, they should receiue warre with their enemies: and if they disdained to preach vnto them the way of life to the English nation, they should suffer by their hands the reuenge of death. Which not long after so came to passe by the meanes of Ethelfride king of Northumberland: who being yet a pagan, and stirred with a fierce furie against the Britains, came with a great armie against the citie of Chester, where Brocmaile the counsell of that citie, a friend and helper of the Britains side, was ready with his force to receiue him. There was at the same time at Bangor in Wales an ordeining great monasterie, wherein was such a number of monks, as Galfridus with other authors do testifie, that if the whole companie were diuided into seuen parts, in euery of the seuen parts were contained not to few as 300. monks; which all did liue with the sweat of their browes, and labour of their owne hands, hauing one for their ruler named Dino. But of this monasterie came the monkes to Chester, to pray for the good successe of Brocmaile, fighting for them against the Saxons. Their daies they continued in fasting & prayer. When Ethelfride the foresaid king, seeing them so intentiue to their prayers, demanded the cause of their comming thither in such a company; & when he perceiued it was to pray for their counsell; Then (saith he) although they beare no weapon, yet they fight against vs, and with their prayers and preachings they persecute vs. Wherefore he commanded that Brocmaile, being ouercome to flee away, the king commanded his men to turne their weapons against the fellie harmed monks, of whom hee slue the same time, or rather martyred eleuen hundred, onely fiftie persons of that number did flee and escape away with Brocmaile: the rest were all slaine. The authors that write of this lamentable murder, declare and say how the forespeaking of Austin was here rather fulfilled vpon the Britons; which because they would not ioyne peace with their friends, he said should be the cause of their enemies. Of both these parties, the reader may iudge what he pleaseth: I cannot for but both together were to be blamed. And as I cannot but accuse the one, so I cannot defend the other. First Austin in this matter can in no wise bee excused: who being a monke before, and therefore a scholar and professor of humilitie, shewed so little humilitie in his assemblie, to whom bishops and an archbishop, comming at his commandement to the councell, that he thought scorne once to rise at their comming in. Much lesse would his pharisaicall solemnitie haue girded himselfe, and washed his brethrens feete after their trauell, as Christ our great master did to his disciples: seeing his lordship was so high, or rather so heauie, or rather so proud, that hee could not find in his heart to giue them a little mouing of his bodie, to declare a lowlinesse and humilitie in heart. Against the Britains were as much, or more to blame, who so much neglected their spirituall dutie, in reuenging their temporall iniurie, that they denied to ioyne vnto their helping labor, to turne the idolatrous Saxons to the way of life and saluation, in which respect all priuat cases ought to giue place, and to be forgotten. For the which cause, although lamentable to be, yet no great maruell is it, if the rode of Gods punishment did light vpon them, according to the words of Austin as is before declared. But especially the cruell king in this fact was most of all to blame, to curiouslie to flee vpon them, which had neither weapon to resist him, nor yet any will to harme him. And so likewise the same or like happened to himselfe afterward. For he was he also slaine in the field by christian Oswine, who succeeded him, as he had slaine the Britains before, which was done in the yeere of our Lord 610. But to turne to Austin againe, who by report of authors was departed before this cruelties was done, after he had baptised and christened ten thousand Saxons or Angles in the west riuer, that is called Swale, beside Yorke on a Christmas day, perceiuing his end to draw neere, he ordained a succession named Laurentius to rule after him the archbishops see of Dorobernia. Where note by the way (christian reader) that whereas Austin baptised them in riuers: it followeth, there was then no vse of fonts. Againe, if it be true that Fabian saith, he baptised ten thousand in one day; the rite then of baptising at Rome was not so ceremoniall, neither had so many trinkets at that time, as it hath had since; or else it could not be that he could baptise so many in one day.

{Anno 604} S. Dauid in Wales, otherwise called Dewie.

Meane season, about this time departed Gregorie bishop of Rome, of whom it is said, that of the number of all the first bishops before him in the primitiue time, he was the basest; of all them that came after him he was the best. About which time also died in Wales Dauid archbishop first of Karleon, who then translated the see from thence to Menenia, and therefore is called Dauid of Wales. Not long after this also departed the foresaid Austin in England, after he had sit there fiftéene or fiftrene yeeres; by the which count wee may note it, not to be true that Henrie Huntington and others doe witnesse, that Austin was dead before that battell of Ethelfride against the monks of Bangor. For if it be true that Polychronicon testifieth of this murder, to be done about the yere of our Lord 609; and the comming of Austin first into the realme to be An. 596; then Austin induring fiftéene yeres could not be dead at this battell. Moreouer Galfridus Monumetensis declareth concerning the same battell, that Ethelbert the king of Kent, being (as is said) conuerted by Austin to Christs faith; after he saw the Britaines to disdaine and denie their subiection vnto Austin, neither would assist him with preaching to the English nation: therfore stirred vp by the foresaid Ethelfride to warre against the Britains: But that for such rather suspicions then true, that he being a christian king, either could or much preuaile with a pagan idolater, or els would attempt so farre to communit such a cruell deede, But of vncertaine things I haue nothing certainly to say, lest I iudge.

Anno 610. Polyd. lib. 6. cap. 10. A storie of John patriarch of Alexandria.

About this present time about prefixed, which is An. 610, I reade in the storie of Ramulphus Cestrensis, the writer of Polychronicon, of Iohn the patriarch of Alexandria, who for his rare example of hospitalitie and bountifulnesse to the poore, I thought no lesse worthie to haue place amongst good men, then I for the same note to be followed of few. This John (being before beside a hard and sparing man) as he was at his prayer, vpon a time (it is said) there appeared to him a comely virgin, hauing on her head a garland of oliue leaues, which name her selfe Mercie, saying to him, and promising that she would take her to wife, he should prosper well. The next night were true or not, or else inuented for a moralitie, I would willingly not say, there appeared vnto him a faire young damsell so to be married to more then to this his flourishing husband, to whom he was affianced. This John, that he should not line so long a virgin now as the both, because no man will marrie her. But to returne to this patriarch, who after that day (as the storie recordeth) was so mercifull and so beneficiall, especially to the poore and needie, that he counted them as his masters, and himselfe as a seruant and steward vnto them. This patriarch was wont commonlie thrise a weeke to sit at his doore all the day long, to take vp matters, and to set vnite where was any variance. One day it happened, as he was sitting all the day before his gate, and saw no man come, he lamented that all that day hee had done no good: to whom his deacon standing by, answered again, that he had more cause to reioyce, seeing he had brought the citie in that order and in such peace, that there was neede of no reconcilement amongst them. Another time as the said John the patriarch was at seruice, and reading the gospell in the church, the people (as their vsed manner is) went out of the church to talke and iangle: he perceiuing that, went out likewise, and sat amongst them; whereat they marueiled to see him doe so. Why children (said he) where the flocke is, there ought the shepheard to be: wherefore either come you in, for I will also come in to you; or else if you tarrie out, I will likewise tarry out together with you, &c.

Mercie may loue a maiden, for no man will marrie her. The John beareth himself as a suter vnto a mayer with the Lord, whether the Lord should giue more, or he should bidde more of that which was giuen.

The acts of Gregorie the first.

As touching the acts and deeds of Gregorie aboue mentioned, how he withstood the ambitious pride of Iohn, patriarch of Constantinople, which would be the vniuersall priest, and onlie christ in bishop of all others, declaring him to be no lesse then the forerunner of antichrist, that would take that name vpon him; how also with what reasons he answered against the letters of the emperor Mauricius in that behalfe, sufficient relation is made thereof in the first entrie and beginning of this booke. This Gregorie among many other things induced into the church (the specialties whereof hereafter shall follow) Christ willing more at large) first began and brought in this title among the Romane bishops, to be called Seruus seruorum Dei: putting them in remembrance thereby both of their humblenesse, and also of their dutie in the church of Christ. Moreouer as concerning his act for the sole life of pastors first begun, and then broken againe; also concerning the order of Gregories masse booke to be receiued in all churches: hereof who so listeth to read more, shall find the same in other places hereafter, namelie when wee come to the time of pope Adrian the first.

Whereupon the Romane bishops vse in their titles, Seruus seruorum Dei.

Sabinianus bishop of Rome.

Bonifacius the third bishop of Rome.

How Rome began first to take an head aboue other churches.

After the death of Gregorie aboue mentioned, first came Sabinianus, who as he was a malicious detractor of Gregorie and of his workes, so he continued not long, scarse the space of two yeeres. After whom succéeded next Bonifacius the third, which albeit he raigned but one yeere, yet in that one yeere he did more hurt then Gregorie with so great labors, and in so many yeeres could do good before. For that subtill Grecian kept not his, but brought in, obtaining of Phocas the wicked emperor for him and his successors after him, that the see of Rome aboue all other churches should haue the preheminence, and that the bishop of Rome should be the vniuersall head through all churches of Christ in christendom; alleaging for him this frinolous reason, that S. Peter had left to his successors in Rome the keies of binding and loosing, &c. And thus began first Rome to take an head aboue all other churches, by the meanes of Boniface the third, who as he lacked no boldnesse nor ambition to seeke it, so neither lacked hee an emperor ready and meet to giue such a gift. This emperors name was Phocas, a man of such wickednesse and ambition, most like to his owne bishop Boniface, that to aspire to the empire, he murdered his owne master the emperour Mauricius & his children. Thus Phocas comming vp to be emperor, after his detestable villanie done, thinking to stablish his empire with friendship and fauour of his people, and especiallie with the bishop of Rome, quickelie condescended to all his petitions, and so granted him (as it is said) to be the first, he would, the vniuersall and head bishop ouer all christian churches. But as bloud commonlie requireth bloud again, so it came to passe on the said Phocas. For as he had cruellie slaine the lord and emperor Mauricius before, so he in like maner (or peraduenture the emperor succeeding him) had his hands and feet cut off, and so was cast into the sea. And thus wicked Phocas (which gaue the first supremacie to Rome, left his throne. But Rome would not so loose his supremacie once giuen, as the giuer lost his life: for euer since from that day it hath holden, defended, and maintained the same still, and yet doth to this present day, by all force and policie possible. And thus much concerning Boniface, whom by the words of Gregorie, we may well call the runner before antichrist. For as Gregorie brought in their title, Seruus seruorum Dei: so this Boniface brought in their head, Vniuersus ac mundanus, Statuimus ac præcipimus. That is: We will and command, We inioyne and charge you, &c.

Phocas traitor, & a murderer of his emperor.

Pention was made a little before of Ethelbert king of Kent, and also of Ethelfride king of Northfolcon or Northumbria. This Ethelbert hauing vnder his iubiection all the other Saxon kings vnto Humber, after he had first receiued himselfe, and caused to be receiued of others, the christian faith by the preaching of Austin, confirmed afterward in the same faith, amongst other codly deeds, with the helpe of Sigebert king of Eſſex his nephue then raigning vnder him, began the foundation of Paules church within the citie of London, & ordained it for the bishops see of London. For the archbishops se which before time had ben at London, was by Austin and this Ethelbert at the prayer of the citizes of Doworcris translated from to the said citie: Malmesburiensis lib. de pontific. Wherefore such authors as say that Paules was builded by Sigebert, say not amisse: which Sigebert was the king of Eſſex, in which prouince standeth the citie of London. This Ethelbert also founded the church of S. Amazeo in the citie of Dorubyes in Kent, now called Rochester, of one Rof, distant from Doworcestria fource and twentie miles. Of this same Iustus was he thus also ordained before by Austin. Moreouer the foresaid Ethelbert stirred vp a dweller of citizen of London to make a chapell or church of S. Peter in the west end of London, then called Thonie, now the towne of Westminster, which church or chapell was after by Edward the Confessor inlarged or new builded: latlie of Perrie the third it was newly againe redified and made as it is now a large monasterie, &c. After these thinges in the vnthie acts, this Ethelbert when he had raigned the course of fiftie and fiue yeeres, changed this mortall life about the yere of our Lord 616. whom some stories say to bee slaine in a fight betweene him and Ethelfride king of Northsaxons.

Bloud reuenged with bloud.

In the meane time the foresaid Ethelfride king of Northumberland, after the cruell murder of the monkes of Bangor, escaped not long from his hands: for after he had raigned seuen and twentie yeeres he was slaine in the field of Edwine, who succeeded in Northumberland after him.

Another danger of Edwine. Anno 627. Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 12. Henr. Hunt. lib. 3.

Fabianus part. 5. A part of a true tale betwixt.

This Edwine being the sonne not of Ethelfride (as Galfridus Monumetensis saith) but rather of Alla (as Giraldus Cambrensis seemeth to witnesse more truely) was first a pagan or idolater; afterward by Paulinus was christened and the first christened king in Northumberland. The occasion of which his conuersion, as is in furnise sorties contained, was this.

Edwine first christened king in Northumberland. Giraldus Cambrensis.

Edwin being yet a pagan, married the daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent, called Edelburge a christian woman, otherwise called Tace. But before this marriage, Edwin being yet young, Ethelfride the king conceiuing enuie against him, perlecuted him to the end, that he was forced to flie to Redwallus king of Eastangles, as is in the table of the kings is expressed. The which Redwaldus what for feare, what with bribes being corrupted of Ethelfride, at length pitiuile had intended to haue betraied Edwine. But as Gods will was, Edwine hauing warning thereof by a secret friend of his, was moued to flee, and to saue himselfe, being promised alſo of his friends to be safely conueyed away, if he would therto agree. To whom Edwine said, Whether shall I flie which haue so long seene the bottom of mine enemies, though all prouinces of the realme? And if I must needs be slaine. I had rather he should do it, then another vnworthie person. Thus he remaining by himselfe alone and solitarie, sitting in a great studie, there appeared vnto him suddenly a certaine stranger to him vnknowne, and said: I know well the cause of thy thought and heauinesse. What wouldest thou giue him that should deliuer thee out of this feare, and should reconcile king Redwald to thee again? I would giue him (said Edwine) all that I euer could make. And he said againe: And what if I make thee a mightier king then euer was any of thy progenitors? He answered againe as before. Moreouer (saith he) And what if hee thew thee a better kind and way of life, then euer was thewed to any of thine auncestors before thee; wilt thou obey him and doe doe after his counsell? Yea (said Edwine) promising most firmely with all his heart so to doe. Then he laying his hand vpon his head: Whē (said he) this token shall be giuen vnto thee, then remember this time of thy tribulation, and the promise which thou hast made, and the word which now I say vnto thee. And with that he vanished out of his sight suddenly. After this so done, as Edwine was sitting alone by himselfe pensiue and sad, his foresaid friend which moued him before to flie, commeth to him bidding him be of good cheere; For the heart (said he) of king Redwaldus which had before intended the destruction is now altered through the counsell of the queene, and is fully bent to keepe his promise with you, whatsoeuer shall fall thereupon. To make the storie short, Redwaldus the king (although Fabian following Henrie Huntington, saith it was Edwine) with all conuenient speed assembled an host, wherewith he suddenly comming vpon Ethelfride, gaue battell vnto him about the borders of Mercia, where Ethelfride king of Northumberland, also with Reiner Redwaldus sonne, was slaine in the field. By reason whereof Edwine (his enemies being destroyed) was quietly placed in the possession of Northumberland. All this while yet Edwine remained in his old paganisme, albeit his queene (as is aboue declared) king Ethelberts daughter a christian woman, with Paulinus the bishop, ceased not to thrue and perswade him vnto the christian faith. But he taking counsell with his nobles and counsellers vpon the matter, was loath to be vpon. Then the Lord, who disposeth all things after his purpose to bring all good things to passe, sent another trouble vpon him, by meanes thereof to call him: for by affliction God vseth commonly to call them whom he will saue, or by whom he will worke saluation vnto others. So his diuine wisedome thinketh good to make them first to know themselues before they come to knowledge, or to teach him to others. So it came to passe with Iacob, who was stricken downe before he was lifted vp, with Constantinus, Edwinus, & many more. How long was Joseph in prison before he bare rule? How hardly escaped this our queene now being (queene Elizabeth) by whom notwithstanding it hath pleased God to reuiue this his gospell now preached amongst vs? In what conflictes and agonies inwardly in his spirit was S. Luther before he came to preach the iustification of Christ openly? And so he all these most commonly, which come to any liuely feeling or sensible worshing of Christ the Lord.

Vita Edwini, lib. 1. Malmesburiensis, lib. de pontific. lib. 1. Huntingdon. lib. 3.

But to returne to Edwine againe. The occasion of his trouble was this. Quicelinus with Kinegilsus his brother, kings of Westsaxons (as aboue is mentioned in the table of the Saxon kings) conspiring the death of Edwine the noble king of Northumberland, vpon some malice sent vpon an Easter day a swoordman named Emner, priuilie to slay the said Edwine. This swoordman or cutthrote came to a citie beside the water of Darwent in Derbishire, there to wait his time, and lastlie found the king smally accompanied, and intended to haue run the king thorow with a sword inuenomed. But one Lilla the kings trustie seruant, disgarnished of a shield or other weapon to defend his master, first betweene the king and the sword, put to defend his master, first betweene the king and the sword, and with his whole bodie and bodie and died, and the king was wounded with the same stroke. And after he wounded also the third which was a knight, and so was taken, and confessed by whom he was sent to worke that treason. The other knight that was secondly wounded, died, and the king lay after long sicke ere he were healed.

Paulinus. A deacon then might baptize. Orpwaldus otherwise named Coppwaldus king of Eastangles conuerted to the faith of Christ.

After this, about Whitsuntide the king being scantlie whole of his wounds, assembled his host, entending to make against the king of the Westsaxons, promising to Christ to be christened if he would giue him the victorie ouer his enemies: and in token thereof called his daughter borne of Edelburge the same Easter day when he was wounded, named Eanfled, to be baptised, with twelue others of his familie, of Paulinus. Thus Edwine proceeded to the battell against Quicelinus and Kinegilsus with Ricmalcus and other enemies, who in the same battell being all vanquished and put to flight, Edwine through the power of Christ returneth home victor. But for all this victorie and other things giuen to him of God, as he was in wealth of the world, forgat his promise made, and had little mind thereof, saue only that he by the preaching of Paulinus forsooke his mammetrie: and for his peuish and blind might not entirely beare his old land, which his forefathers had kept so long, and suddenly to be christened without authoritie and good aduice of his counsell.

Edwine first christened king in Northumberland. Galfridus. Malmesburiensis. Polychron. Historia Iornadensis. Fabian. Strength of prayer ouercommeth armies. Penda beareth in the field. The commendation of king Oswald.

About the same season pope Boniface the fift sent also to the said Edwine letters exhortatorie, with sundrie presents from Rome to him, and to Edelburge the queene: but neither would that preuaile. Then Paulinus seeing the king so bent and conuerted, poured out his prayers to God for his conuersion, into the same time had reuealed to him by the holy Ghoſt, the oracle aboue mentioned, which was thewed to the king when hee was with Redwaldus king of the Eastangles. Whereupon Paulinus comming after to the king on a certaine day, and laying his hand vpon the kings head, asked him if he knew that token. The king hearing this, and remembring well the token, was readie to fall downe at his feet. But Paulinus not suffering that, did lift him vp againe, saying vnto him: Behold O king, you haue vanquished your enemies, you haue obtained your kingdome, now performe the third thing which you promised, that is, to receiue the faith of Christ, and to be obedient to him. Whereupon the king conferring with his counsell and his nobles, was baptised of the said Paulinus at Yorke, with many of his other subiects with him. In so much that Coifie the chiefe of the prelats of his old mammetrie, armed himselfe with his idolatrous bishops, and beſred god daies, which before he had lothed into they might not do, nor ride but only a mare: and so destroyed all the altars of the mammetrie, and their temple of idols which was at Godmundham, not far from Yorke. And this was in the eleuenth peare of his raigne.

The part of a godly bishop expressed in Paulinus. Edwine baptised. He was baptised in S. Peters church at Yorke, which he first caused to be made of wood, which after by S. Oswald was builded of stone.

From that time forth during the life of Edwine, which was the terme of fiue yeares more, Paulinus christened continually in the riuers of Swente and Swala, in both prouinces of Deira, and in Wernicia, where the fairdreers for his fonts, and preached in the shire of Lincelsie, where he builded also a church of stone at Lincolne.

Anno 628. Note Paulinus christened in riuers.

In this time was so great peace in the kingdome of Edwine after his conuersion, that a woman laden with gold might haue gone from the one side of the sea to the other, and no man moleſt her. Moreouer by the high way ſides, though all his kingdome was ouerlaid with fuell or lying to be chaunged a dish or a doll of braſſe, to take vp water for the refreshing of such as went by the way, which bolles of braſſe there remained safe, that no man touched them during all the life of the said Edwine. Such was then the tender care and studie of christian princes for the refreshing of their subiects. But what was then the braſen wood which now is growen to iron and lead, called Aetas ferrea, the yron time.

Certaine instance of a good prince may do in a realme. Great peace and reuerence among the people in the daies of Edwine.

This Edwine, who first brought in the faith in the north parts continuing after his baptisme fiue yeares, at length was slaine in battell by Cedwalla king of the Britaines, and by wicked Penda king of the Mercians, with his son alſo Offricus, in the field called Hatfield.

Anno 634. Archbishop of Canterburie ordained archbishop of the sea of Yorke, so he againe after the decease of Iustus ordained Honorius to be archbishop of Canterburie.

This Paulinus was the first archbishop of Yorke, and as he was of Rochester the first bishop of Canterburie ordained archbishop of the sea of Yorke, so he againe after the decease of Iustus ordained Honorius to be archbishop of Canterburie.

Ex Fabr. hist.

Paulinus after the death of godly Edwine, seeing himself cleane driuen out of his bishoprike, and wicked Penda with the idolatrous Mercians, to spoile the land in such sort, as they made no spare neither of age nor sex, nor religion, was compelled to flie with Edelburge the queene and Eanfled her daughter by water into Kent, where the said archbishop Paulinus remained bishop of Rochester the space of nineteene yeares. And so the church of Northumberland lacked a bishop for the space of thirtie yeares after. Notwithstanding he left there one James his deacon, a godman, who continued there baptising and preaching in the north parts, till that peace being recouered, and the number of the faithfull encreasing, the church came again to his day. Hunting. lib. 3.

By meanes of this Edwine, Eorpwaldus king of the Eastangles, sonne to Redwaldus aboue mentioned, was reduced to Christs faith.

Orpwaldus otherwise named Coppwaldus king of Eastangles conuerted to the faith of Christ.

After the decease of Edwine and his sonne Offrike, both slaine in battell, raigned Osricus and Eanfridus, the one in Deira, the other in Bernicia. Osricus was the sonne of Elfrica his vncle brother to Ethelfride. Eanfridus was the eldest sonne of Ethelfride, for Ethelfride had three sonnes, to wit, Eanfridus, Oswaldus, and Osricus. These two kings of Deira and Bernicia, Osricus and Eanfride, being first christened in Scotland, after being kings, returned to their idolatrie; and so in the yeares following were slaine one after the other by the foresaid Cedwalla and wicked Penda, as is in the table aboue expressed.

After whom succéded in Northumberland, the second sonne of Ethelfride named Oswaldus, hauing rule on both the prouinces, as well Deira, as Bernicia. Whereof when the foresaid Cedwalla (or Cadwallo) the Britaine king had vnderstanding, who before had made bandoke of the Saxons, and thought to haue rooted them vtterly out of England, he sent king Penda with a mightie host of the Britaines, thinking to slay also Oswald as he had before slaine his brother Eanfride, and king Edwine before them. But Oswald, when he was warned of the great strength of this Cedwall and Penda, made his prayers to God, and beſought him meekely of helpe to withstand his enemie, for the saluation of his people. Thus after Oswald had prayed for the sauing of his people, the two hosts met in a field named Denesburie, some say Heuenfield, where was fought a strong battell. But finally the armie and power of Penda and Cedwall, which were farre exceeding the number of Oswalds host, was chased and most part slaine by Oswaldus, after he raigned ouer the Britaines two and twentie yeares, leauing after him a sonne, whom Gaufridus called Cadwaladrus the last king of the Britaines.

Of this Oswald much praise and commendation is written in authors for his feruent zeale in Christs religion, and mercifull pitie towards the poore, with other great vertues more. bertuously disposed to the setting forth of Christs faith and doctrine, sent unto Scotland for a certaine bishop there called Aidanus, which was a famous preacher. The king at that time he was in Scotland banished, had learned the Scottish tongue perfectly: therefore as this Aidanus preached in his Scottish tongue to the Saxons, the king himselfe interpreting that which he had said, diligented not to preach and expound the same to his nobles and subiects in the English tongue.

Moreover, towards the poore and needie his pitie and tenderse was such, being notwithstanding of so high and princely calling, that upon a time being then Easter day, he sitting with the said Aidanus at meat, and served after the manner of kings in siluer: there commeth to him one of the seruiters, bringing him word that there was a great multitude of poore people sitting in the streete, which desired some almes of the king. He hearing this, commandeth not only the meat prepared for his owne table to be caried unto them, but also taking a siluer platter which stood before him, brake it in pieces and sent it amongst them, and so relieued his poore subiects not only with the meat of his table, but with his dishes also. Aidanus the bishop seeing this, marueiling thereat, taketh him by the hand, wishing and praying in this wise: This hand (saith he) I pray God may continue and neuer putrifie. What the stories say more concerning this hand of Oswald, I find not nor meddle further then simple, true, and due probability will beare me out. In those daies and partly by the meanes of the said Oswald, Kinigilsus king of the Westsaxons was converted to Christs faith, especially through the godly labour of Berinus which was sent by pope Honorius to preach in England, and was then made bishop of Dorchester. To whom Quicelinus brother of Kinigilsus after he had also receiued baptisme of the said Berinus gaue to him the said citie to make there his see. And as Guido witnesseth, the said Quicelinus gaue after to the bishop of Winchester seuen miles compasse of land to build there the bishops see, the which was accomplished and finished by Kenwalkus his sonne.

Of this Berinus, Malmesburie, Polychronicon, with diuers other writers do report a thing strange and miraculous, which if it be a fable, as no doubt it is, I cannot but marueil that so many authors so constantly agree in reporting and affirming the same the matter is this. This Berinus being sent, as is said, by Honorius to preach in England, promiseth him to trauell to the vttermost borders thereof, and there to preach the gospell where the name of Christ was neuer heard. Thus he setting forward in his iourney, passeth through France, and so to the sea side, where he found a pallage readie, and the winde serued faire, that he was called vp in an hasle, that he had no leasure to remember himselfe to take all things with him which he had to carrie. At length as he was on the sea saying, and almost in the middest course of his passage, remembred himselfe of a certaine relike left behind him for haste, which Honorius had giuen him at his comming out. Malmesburiensis calleth it Corporalia. Historia Iornalensis calleth it Pallulam super quam corpus Christi consecrarat, which we call a corporas or such a like thing, and what is included within it I cannot tell. Here Berinus great sorrow could not tell what to do: if he should haue spoken to the heathen mariners, to turne their course backe againe, they would haue mocked him, and it had been in vaine. Therefore as the stories write, he boldly stepped into the sea, and walking on foot backe againe, taketh him that which was left behind, and so returneth to his companie againe, hauing not one hach of his garment wet. Of his miracle, (so whether I should call it a fable rather, let the reader iudge thereof as he thinketh, because it is not written in the scripture we are not bound to beleiue it. But if it were true, it is then thought to be wrought of God, not for any holinesse in the man or in the corporas, but a speciall gift for the conuersion of the heathen, for whose saluation God suffereth oft many wonders to be done by his seruants) being brought to the sea againe with a great admiration of the mariners, being there with conuerted and baptised, was driuen at last by the weather to the coast of the Westsaxons, where Kinigilsus and his brother Quicelinus aboue mentioned did reigne. Which two kings the same time by the preaching of Berinus were conuerted and made christian men, with the people of the countrie, being before rude and barbarous. It hapned the same time when the foresaid kings should be christened, that Oswaldus (mentioned a little before) king of Northumberland, was then present, and the same day married Kinigilsus his daughter, and also was godfather to the king.

Thus Oswald after he had raigned nine yeares in such holinesse and perfectnesse of life, as is aboue specified, was slaine at length in the field called Marfield by wicked Penda, king of the Mercians: which Penda at length after all his tyrannie was ouercome and slaine by Oswie brother to Oswald, next king after Oswald of Northumberland, notwithstanding he had three the people which Oswie had. This Penda being a pagan, had three sonnes, Wolfere, Weda, and Egfridus. Of this second sonne Weda, Oswie had before time married his daughter by consent of Penda his father: the which Weda by helpe of Oswie was made king of Southmercia, the which kingship is severed from Northmercia by the riuer of Trent.

The same Weda moreouer, at what time he married the daughter of Oswie, promised to him that he would become a christian man: which thing he performed after the death of Penda his father, but afterwards within three yeres of his raigne, he was by treason of his wife slaine. And after him the kingdom fell to Wolferus the other brother, who being wedded to Ermenilda daughter of Ercombert king of Kent, was shortly after christened: so that he is accounted the first christened king of Mercia. This Wolferus conquered Berkwalcus king of Kent, and got the Ile of Wight, which after he gaue to Egbert king of the Saxaungles, vpon condition he would be christened. And thus the Saxaungles which before had expulsed Spe. tus their bishop, as is declared, recouered againe the christian faith vnder Sigbert their king, who by the meanes of the foresaid Wolferus was reduced and baptised by Finianus the bishop.

But to returne againe to Oswie, from whom we haue a little digressed, of whom we heined before how he succeeded after Oswald in the prouince of Bernicia, to whom also was ioyned Oswine his cosin ouer the prouince of Deira, and there, with his fellow Oswie raigned the space of seuen yeares. This Oswine was gentle and liberall to his people, and no lesse deuout toward God: who vpon a time had giuen to Aidanus the bishop aboue mentioned, a princely horse with the trapper and all that appertained thereto, because he should not so much trauell on foot, but sometimes ease himselfe withall. Thus Aidanus the Scottish bishop as he was riding vpon his kingly horse, by the way meeteth him a certaine poore man asking and crauing his charity. Aidanus hauing nothing else to giue him, lighted downe, and giueth to him his horse trapped and garnished as he was. The king vnderstanding this, and not contented therewith, as he was entring to dinner with the said Aidanus: What meint you father bishop (said he) to giue away my horse? I gaue you vnto the begger: Had not I other horses in my stable that might haue serued him well enough, but you must giue away that which of purpose was fetch out for you amongst the chiefest? To whom the bishop made answere againe saying or rather rebuking the king: What be these words (O king said he) that you speake? Why set you more price by an horse, which is but the sole of an horse, then you do by him which is the sonne of Dauid, yea which is the sonne of God? he said but this, when the king forthwith vnsetting his steed from about him (as he was then newly come in from hunting) falleth downe at the feet of the bishop, desiring him to forgiue him that, and he would neuer after speake word to him for any treasure he should afterward giue away of his. The bishop seeing the king so meekely affected, he then taking him vp, and chearing him againe with words, began thortly after to weepe and to be verie heauie. His minister asking the cause thereof, Aidanus answered in his Scottish language, saying to him: I know (saith he) for that this king cannot liue long. This people is not worthie to haue such a prince as he is to raigne amongst them. And so as Aidanus said, it came to passe. For not long after Oswie the king of Bernicia disdaining at him, when Diuine exhortation could not be had, Oswine either being not able or not willing to ioyne with him in battell, caused him traiterously to be slaine. And so Oswie with his son Egfride raigned in Northumberland alone.

In the time and also in the house of this Oswie king of Northumberland, was a certaine man named Benedict, who was the bringer vp of Bede from his youth, and take him to his institution when he was but seuen yeares old, and so taught him during his life. This Benedict or Bennet is reckoning of a noble house and rich him, and to add honour vnto Oswie: a famous seruice, heede, and all his kindred to serue Christ, and went to Rome (where he had been in his life time fiue times) and brought from thence bookes into monasteries, with other things which he thought then to serue to deuotion. This Benedict surnamed Bishop, was the first that brought in the art and vse of glasing into this land: for before that, all the windowes were not lincloose either in churches or houses.

In the raigne of the foresaid Oswie and Egfride his son, was Botulphus abbat, which builded in the east part of Lincolne an abbey. Also Aidanus, Finianus, and Colmannus, with three Scottish bishops of Northumberland holy men, held with the Britaines against the Romish order for the keeping of Easter day. Moreouer Cuthertus, Ieruumannus, Cedda, and Wilfridus liued the same time, who as I iudge to be bishops of holy conuersation, so I thought it sufficient here only to name them. As touching their miracles wherefore they were made saints in the popes kalender, seeing they are not written in the gospell, nor in my creed, but in certaine old chronicles of that age, so they are no matter of my faith: notwithstanding as touching their conuersation, this I reade, and also do credit, that the clergie both of Britaine and England at that time plied nothing that was worldly, but gaue them to preaching and teaching the word of our Sauiour, and followed the life that they preached by giuing of good ensample. And ouer that, as our histories record, they were so void of couetousnesse, that they receiued no possessions or territories as was forced vpon them.

nod or councell was holden against the Britaines and the Scottish bishops, for the right obseruing of Easter at Sternehalt. At what time Agilbertus bishop of Westsaxonia came to Northumberland, to institute Wilfride abbat of Ripon, where this question for Easter day began to be moued: For Colman then bishop of Northumberland followed not the custome of Rome nor of the Saxons, but followed the Britaines and the Scottish bishops his predecessours in the same see before. Thus on the one side was Colman the archbishop of Yorke, and Hilda the abbesse of Sternehalt, which alleaged for them the doings and examples of their predecessours, both godly and reuerend bishops, as Aidanus, Finianus, archbishops of that see of Yorke before them, and diuers more, who had bled alwaies to celebrate the Easter from the fourteenth day of the first moneth, till the eight and twentith of the same. And specially for that S. John the euangelist at Ephesus kept and obserued that day, &c. On the other side was Agilbert bishop of the Westsaxons, Iames the deacon of Paulinus aboue mentioned, Wilfride abbat of Ripon, and king Alfride Oswies sonne, with his queene, holding on the same side. The full contents of which disputation here followeth, according as in the storie of Beda at large is described, with their reasons and arguments on both sides as ensueth, &c.

The question of Easter and of shauing, and other ecclesiasticall matters being moued, it was determined that in the abbey which is called Sternehalt, of the which Hilda a deuout woman was abbesse, a conuocation should be had, and this question there determined. To the which place came both the kings the father and the sonne, bishop Colman with his clergie of Scotland, Agilbert with Agathon and Wilfride priests. Iames and Roman were on their sides, Hilda the abbesse with her companie was on the Scottish part, and the reuerend bishop Cedda was appointed prolocutor for both parties in that parlament. King Oswie began first with an oration, declaring that it was necessarie for such as serued one God, to liue in one vniforme order, and that such as looked for one kingdome in heauen should not differ in celebration of the mysteries sacramentes, but should rather seeke for the true tradition, and follow the same. This said, hee commanded his bishop Colman to declare what the rite and custome was in this behalfe that he vsed, and from whence it had the originall. Then Colman obeying his princes commandement, said: The Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my ancestors that sent me hither a bishop, the which all our forefathers being men of God did celebrat in like manner: and lest it should be contemned or despised of any man, it is manifestly apparant to be the verie same which the holy euangelist S. John (a disciple especially beloued of the Lord) did accustomablie vse in all churches and congregations where he had authoritie. When Colman had spoken many things to this effect, the king commanded Agilbert to declare his opinion in this behalfe, and to shew the order that he then vsed, from whence it came, and by what authoritie he obserued the same. Agilbert requested the king that his scholar Wilfride a priest, might speake for him, in as much as they both with the rest of his clergie were of one opinion herein, and that the said Wilfride could vtter his minde better and more plainly in the English tongue then he himselfe could. Then Wilfride at the kings commandement began on this sort and said: The Easter which we keepe, we haue seene at Rome, where as the holy apostles Peter and Paul did liue and teach, did suffer and were buried. The same also is vsed in Italie and in France, the which countries we haue trauelled for learning, and haue noted it to be celebrated of them all. And Asia also and in Affrike, in Egypt and in Greece, and finally in all the world, the same manner of Easter is obserued that we vse, saue only by these here present with their accomplices, the Pictes and the Britaines: with the which two (and yet not altogether agreeing) they condemn and striue foolishly in this order against the vniuersall world. To whom Colman replieth, saying: I marueil you will call this order foolish, that so great an apostle as was worthie to lie in the Lords lap, did vse, vpon all the world doth well know to haue liued most holily. And Wilfride answered, God forbid that I should reproue S. John of folly who kept the rites of Moses law according to the letter (the church being yet Iewish in many points) and the apostles not as yet able to abolish all the obseruations of the law before ordained. As for example, that they should not receiue images inuented of the diuell, the which all men that beleeue on Christ ought of necessitie to forsake and detest, lest they should be an offence to those Iewes that were amongst the Gentiles. For this cause did S. Paul circumcise Timothie, for this cause did he sacrifice in the temple, and did shaue his head with Aquila and Priscilla at Cenchris: which things were done to none other purpose but to eschew the offence of the Iewes. Peradnenture also said Iames to Paul, Thou seest brother how many thousand Iewes do beleeue, and all these be zealous (notwithstanding) of the law. Yet seeing the gospell is to manifestly preached in the world, it is not lawfull for the faithfull to be circumcised, neither to offer sacrifice of carnall things to God. Therefore John according to the custome of the law, the fourteenth day of the first month at euening, did begin the celebration of the feast of Easter, nothing respecting whether it were celebrated in the Sabbath, or in any other festall day. But Peter when he preached at Rome, remembring that the Lord did arise from death on the first day after the sabbath, giuing thereby an hope to the world of the resurrection, thought good to institute Easter on that day, and not after the vse and precepts of the law (that was) the fourteenth day of the first month: euen so John looking for the moone at night, (if it did arise, and the next day after were sunday, which then was called the sabbath, therwith he celebrate the Easter of the Lord in the euening, like as we vse to do euen at this day. But if sunday were not the next day after the fourteenth day, but fell on the fifteenth day, or seuentenh, or on any other day vnto the one and twentith, he taried alwaies for it, and did begin the holy solemnitie of Easter on the euening next before the sabbath. And so it came to passe, that Easter was alwaies kept on the sunday, and was not celebrated but from the fifteenth day vnto the one and twentith: neither doth this tradition of the apostle breake the law, but fulfill the same. In the which it is to be noted, that Easter was instituted from the fourteenth day of the first month at euening, vnto the one and twentith day of the same month at euening, the which maner all S. Johns successors in Asia after his death did follow, and the catholike church throughout the whole world. And that this is the true Easter, and only of all christians to be obserued, it was not newly decréed, but confirmed by the councell of Nice, as appeareth by the ecclesiasticall historie. Whereupon it is manifest that pope Victor by his letters commanded all the churches of Asia, with the churches adioining, that in this matter appertaining to faith, they should not be ouercome with contrarie opinion. Moreouer Polycrates bishop of Ephesus, and all the priests of Asia with him affirmed that they had receiued this tradition from their auncestors, saying that they ought to obserue the true day, neither adding nor diminishing any thing therein. In the which also was Polycarpus bishop and martyr, whom they had seene conuersant in their church, whose doctrine they had alwaies heard, and knew him to be a catholike father. Also Thraseas bishop of Eumenia, and his predecessor, who both (as they say) liued and died in the same opinion. Moreouer Sagaris bishop and martyr, with Papirius the blessed bishop, and Melito with all his eunuches, whose conuersation was alwaies holy, and rose from death the third day. All these obserued the day of the fourteenth moone, according to the gospell, neuer swerving from the truth, but ordering their feasts according to the rule of faith. Moreouer Polycrates himself, who was the seuenth bishop from them, and all his kinsfolke obserued the day which I haue said. Which seeing they were so many bishops and learned men, and had obserued the same day which I kept, according to the tradition of the apostles, and all the world, I thought I did not offend in obseruing the same. Whereas some of them were men of such godlinesse and vertue, as was declared by their wonderfull miracles. And I hereby (nothing doubting of their holinesse) do endeuour to follow their life, order and discipline. Then said Wilfride: It is certaine that Anatholius was both a godly and a learned man, and worthie of great commendation: but what haue you to do with him seeing you obserue not his order? For he following the true rule in keeping his Easter, obserueth the circle of nineteene yeares: the which either you know not, or if you do, you contemne the common order obserued in the vniuersall church of Christ. And moreouer, if the said Anatholius both for count the fourteenth day in the obseruation of Easter, as he confesseth the same to be the fifteenth day at night after the maner of the Egyptians, and likewise noteth the twentith day to be in the feast of Easter, the one and twentith in the euening: the which distinction that you know not, by this may appeare, for that you keepe the Easter on the thirteenth day before the full moone. Mytherfore I can not sée how you touching your father Columba and his successours, whose order you say you follow, moued thereto by their miracles, on this wise that the Lord will answere to many that shall say in the day of iudgement, that in his name they haue prophesied and cast out diuels, and haue done many miracles, &c: to whose he will not know, then ill. Whereupon I denie not but they were the seruants of God, and holy men, which loued the Lord of a good intent, though of a rude simplicitie: and I thinke that the order which they vsed in the Easter, did not much hurt them, so long as they had none amongst them that could shew them the right obseruation of the same for them. For I thinke, if the truth had been declared vnto them, they would as well haue receiued it in this matter as they did in others. But you and your fellowes if you refuse the order of the apostolicall see, or rather of the vniuersall church, which is confirmed by the holy scripture; without all doubt you do sinne. And though your forefathers were holie men, what is their seruentie being but a corner of an Iland, to be preferred before the vniuersall church of Iesus Christ dispersed throughout the whole world? And if Columba your father (and ours also being of Christ Iesus) were mightie in miracles, is he therefore to be preferred before the prince of the holy apostles?

Example of Peter alleaged, but no proofe thereof.

To whom the Lord said, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and I will giue thee the keyes of the kingdome of heauen.

Wilfride hauing thus ended his argument, the king said to Colman: Is it true that the Lord spake these things to S. Peter? And Colman answered, Yea. Then said the king: Can you declare any thing that the Lord gaue to Colman? Colman answered, No. Then quoth the king, Do both of you agree and consent in this matter without any controuersie, and that these words were principally spoken to Peter, and that the Lord gaue him the keyes of the kingdome of heauen? And they both answered, Yea. Then concluded the king on this wise: For so much as S. Peter is the doore keper of heauen, I will not gainesay him: but in that I am able, I will obey his orders in euery point, lest when I come to the gates of heauen, he shut them against me.

The king conclusterly.

Vpon this simple and rude reason of the king, the multitude of clearkes consented, and with them also Cedda was contented to giue ouer: only Colman the Scot being then archbishop of Yorke, in displeasure left the realme, and departed into Scotland, carying with him the bones of Aidanus. Bed. lib. 3. cap. 25. And thus much concerning this matter of Easter.

Mobile mutatur semper cum principe vulgus.

After the decease of Oswie, Egfride his sonne was king after him in Northumber land fifteene yeares. Vp this Egfride Cuthbert was promoted to the bishoprike of Lindisfarne: and Wilfride which before had been archbishop of Yorke, was displaced through the meanes of Theodore archbishop of Canturburie, and Cedda possessed that see. Wilfride when he was put out, went to Rome and complained of him to Agathon the bishop, and was well allowed in some things. But the king and Theodorus hab there such practises and friends, that he returned without speeding of his cause. Therefore he returned into the Southsaxons, and builded an abbey in Silesey, and preached vnto the Southsaxons fiftéene yeares. The king of the Southsaxons at ỳ time was Ethelwold, to whom he declared a little before that Wolferus king of the Mercians gaue the Ile of Wight vpon condition that he would be christened, and so was baptised by Werinus: the said Wolferus being his godfather, and some in law, both in one day. Wherefore Wolferus not being licensed by Ethelwold the king, preached vnto his nobles and people of Southsax, and conuerted them to Christ. In the time of whose baptising, the raine which before they lacked three yeares together, was giuen them plentifully, whereby their great famine slaked, and the countrie was made fruitfull, which before was dried vp with barrennes: in so much that (as in some stories is said) the people perished with famine, hauing ga forthe together vpon the rockes by the sea side, and tie king hands together would throw themselues downe to the sea. Moreouer, where they lacked before the art of fishing, the fore said Wilfride taught them how with nets to fish.

After Egfride who was slaine in the fraies of Scotland, next succeeded Alfride his brother, and bastard sonne to Oswie, and raigned eighteene or nineteene yeares in Northumberland. This Alfride restored againe the foresaid Wilfride to the see of Yorke, whom his brother had before expelled, and put in Cedda. Notwithstanding, the same king within fiue yeares after, expulsed the said Wilfride againe, and so went he to Rome. But at length by Osrike his successor was placed againe, the archbishop of Yorke, and Cedda was ordained by Theodorus bishop of Mercia. The which prouince of Mercia, the said Theodorus archbishop of Canturburie by the authoritie of the synod holden at Hatfield, did after diuide into fiue bishoprikes: that is, one to Chester, the second to Worcester, the third to Lichfield, the fourth to Cedorna in Lindsey, the fift to Dorchester, which was after translated to Lincolne.

Alfride king of Northumberland.

Wilfride restored againe to the see of Yorke.

Mercia diuided into fiue bishoprikes.

Neere about this time in the yeare of our Lord 666, the detestable sect of Mahumet began to take strength and place. Although Polychronicon differing a little in yeares, accounteth the beginning of this sect somewhat before, but the most diligent searchers of them which write now, refer it to this yeare, which well agreeth with the number of that beast signified in the Apocalypse, xiv. that is, 666. Of this Mahumet came the kingdome of Agarens (whom he after named Saracens) to whom he gaue sundrie lawes, patched of many sects and religions together: he taught them to pray euer to the south: and as we keepe the Sunday, so they keepe the Friday, which they call the day of Venus. He permitted them to haue as many wiues as they were able to maintaine, to haue as many concubines as they list, to abstaine from the vse of wine, except on certaine solemne daies in the yeare, to haue and worship only one God omnipotent, saying that Moses and the prophets were great men, but Christ was greater, and greatest of all the prophets, as being borne of the virgin Marie by the power of God, without mans seed, and at last was taken vp to heauen, but was not slaine, but another in his likenesse for him, with many other wicked blasphemies in his law contained. At length this kingdome of the Saracens began to be conquered of the Turkes, and in processe of time wholy subdued to them.

Ex Polychron. Ex Giraldo Cambrens. Ex Stephano Caniacensi.

But now to returne againe to the time of our English Saxons. In this meane season Theodorus was sent from Italie into England by Vitelianus the pope, to be archbishop of Canturburie, and with him diuers other monkes of Italie to set vp here in England Latine seruice, masses, ceremonies, letanies, with such other Romish ware, &c. This Theodorus being made archbishop and metropolitan of Canturburie, began to play the rex, placing and displacing the bishops at his pleasure. As for Cedda and Wilfride archbishops of Yorke, he thrust them both out, vnder the pretence that they were not lawfullie consecrated, notwithstanding they were sufficiently authorised by their kings, and were placed against their wils. Wherefore Wilfride, as is before touched, went vp to Rome, but could haue no redresse of his cause. Yet to shew what modestie this Wilfride vsed against his enemie being so violently molested as he was, because the words of his complaint are expressed by William Malmesburie, I thought here to expresse the same both for the commendation of the partie, and also for the good example of others, in case any shall be, whom god graunt pies will moue to well doing. This Wilfride therefore hauing such iniurie and violence offered vnto him by the hands of Theodore, although he had iust cause to do his vttermost: yet in prosecuting his complaint, how he temperd himselfe, what bridle of modestie he vsed, rather to defend his innocencie, then to trumpet his

If shauing of the crowne doth teach men patience as Peter writes, how commonly it is that we see none more waspish and restie then these shaue generalls of the church of Rome?

Simon Magus shauen, as he saith.

The difference betweene the shauing of Peter and Simon Magus.

Iudas kissed his master, but this Magus ought not to resemble wicked Iudas.

* There is but one mediatour betweene God and man, Christ Iesus.

The Scottish monkes and the English monkes differed in their shauing.

If Peter shall be in the state of God his lieutenant, Christ then formerly in little stead.

A note to admonish the reader.

And as the Lord bare a crowne of thorne on his head in his passion, whereby he tooke and carried away from vs the thornes and pricks of our sinnes, so must euery one of vs by shauing our heads, patiently beare and willingly suffer the mockes and scornes of the world for his sake, that we may receiue the crowne of eternall life, which God hath promised to all that loue him, and shall by shauing their corporall crownes beare the aduersitie, and contemne the prosperitie of this world. But the shauing which Simon Magus vsed, what faithfull man hath not detest together with his magicall art? The which at the first appearance hath a shew of a shauen crowne, but if you marke his necke, you shall find it curtailed in such wise, as you will say it is rather meet to be vsed of the Sarasonits then of the christians. And such (of foolish men) he thought worthie of the glorie of the eternall crowne, vsed as indeed for their ill liuing they are worthie not only to be depriued of the same, but also of eternall saluation. I speake not this against them that vse this kind of shauing, and liue catholickly in faith and good workes, but surely I beleeue there be diuers of them be verie holy and godly men; amongst the which is Adamnan the abbat and worthie priest of the Columbians: who when he came embassadour from his countrie vnto king Alfride, desired greatly of him our maisterie: where he beheld a wonderfull wisdome, humilitie and religion both in his maners and words. Amongst other talke I asked him, why he that did beleeue to come to the crowne of life that should neuer haue end, did vse contrarie to his beliefe a definit image of a crowne on his heade. And if you aske (quoth I) the fellowship of S. Peter, why do you vse the fashion of his crowne vpon you? Verily (quoth he) for the loue of his maister with whom you desire to liue eternally. Adamnan answered, saying; You know right well brother, though I vse Simons maner of shauing, after the custome of my countrie, yet do I detest and with all my heart abhorre his infidelitie. I desire notwithstanding to imitate the footsteps of the holy apostle as farre forth as my power will stand. Then said I, I beleeue it is so; but then is it apparant you imitate those things which the apostle Peter did from the bottome of your heart, if you vse the same vpon your face that you know he did: for I suppose your wisdome vnderstandeth that it is right decent to differ in the trimming your face or shauing, from his whom in your heart you abhorre. And contrariwise, as you desire to imitate the doings of him whom you desire to haue a * mediator betweene God and you, so it is meet you imitate the maner of his apparell and shauing. Thus much said I to Adamnan, who seemed then well to like our churches: in so much that he returning into Scotland reformed many of his churches there after our celebration, albeit he could not doe so amongst the monkes with whom he had special authoritie. He endeuoured also to haue reformed their maner of shauing if he had beene able. And now (O king) I exhort your maiestie to labour together with your people, ouer whom the King of kings and Lord of lords hath made you gouernour, to imitate likewise in all these points the catholike and apostolicall churches. So shall it come to passe, that in the end of this your temporall kingdome, the most blessed prince of the apostles shall open you the gates of the heauenly kingdome, together with the other elect of God. The grace of the eternall King preserue you most dearely beloued sonne in Christ long time to raigne ouer vs, to the great tranquillitie of vs all.

When this letter was read before king Ceolwlph with other of his learned men, and diligently considered of by his proper language, he seemed to reioyce very much at the exhortation thereof, in so much as rising vp from among his noble men, he kneeled on the ground, and gaue God thankes that he had deserued to receiue so worthie a present out of England, and so caused it forthwith by publike proclamation to be written out, learned and obserued throughout all the prouinces of the Picts, before the time that he had beene ioyned in the holie vnction of yeares. For all the ministers of the altar and all monkes were shauen on the crowne, and all the people reioyced for the new discipline of the most blessed prince of the apostle S. Peter which they had receiued.

Of this maner of shauing, more worthie to be laughed at then to be stoned, let vs now againe returne where as we left at king Iue, of whom W. Malmesburie and Fabian in his chronicle do record, that when the foresaid Iue had ruled the Westsaxons by the terme of 17 yeares, by the importunat perswasion and subtill policie of his wife Ethelburga, was allured to go to Rome, there to be made a monk. Which Ethelburga after she had a long time laboured him to leaue the world, and could not bring about her purpose; vpon a season when the king and she had rested them in a fayre palace richly behanged, and there vpon the mayden thence departed: the by her commandement caused the palace to be replenished with all kind of filth and dung, and hogs and vile beasts therein to be laid, as well in the chambers as other houses of office; and in their olsne chamber where they did lie, there was a sow laid with her yong pigs. And when she knew that this palace was thus be-fourned, being a certaine space out of the toune, she brought the king to visit the said palace. And when she had brought him thereunto, the said to him: I pray you my lord behold now this house, where are now the rich tapets and clothes of gold and silke, and other rich apparell, that we left here this other day? And where be the delicacies and pleasant seruitors, and costly dishes, that you and I lately were serued with? See not all these passed and gone? By lord (saith she) in like maner shall we banish away, as suddenly as you see these worldly things be passed. And our bodies, which now be delicatly kept, shall fall and turne into the filth of the earth. Wherefore haue in mind my words that before time to you I haue often shewed and told, and bulle you to purchase that palace that euer shall indure in toy without translutation.

By meanes of these words and other, the queene turned so the kings mind, that shortly after he resigned his gouernance of his kingdome vnto Ethelardus his nephew; and for the loue of Christ tooke on him the habit of a poore man, and setting apart all the pompe and pride of this wicked world, associated himselfe in the fellowship of poore men, and trauelled to Rome with great deuotion, where he had been king of Westsaxons (as before is said) thirtie seuen yeares. After whose departing, the said Ethelburga his wife went into Warking, seuen miles from London, there in the nunrie of Barking, before of Erkenwald founded, she continued and ended the rest of her life, when she had been abbesse of the place a certaine time. The said Saint Bunie in his Apice also testifieth, that this Iue was the first king that granted a penie of euery fire house through his dominion to be paid vnto the court of Rome, which afterward was called Romescot, or Peterpence, and long after was paid in many places of England.

This Iue, like as for his time he was worthie and valiant in his acts; so was he the first of the Saxon kings (that I reade of) which set forth any lawes to his countrie: the rehearsall of which lawes, to the number of fourescore and odde, here not vnpossible here to be inserted together, with other lawes of the Westsaxon kings after him, before the time of William the Conqueror; in case it were not for the length and prolixitie of this present volume. And thus much concerning the raigne of king Iue, king of the Westsaxons by the way. Now to repaire againe to the course of Northumberland kings something intermitted.

Next vnto the foresaid Osricus, followed Celnlfus, whom he had adopted, brother to Kenred aboue specified. This Celnlfus, as he was himselfe learned, so were in his time diuers learned men then flourishing in England, among whom was Beda, who vnto the same king Celnlfus offered his booke intituled Anglorum historia, not only to be certified by his authoritie, but also to be amended, as Malmesburiensis writeth, by his knowledge and learning.

And for so much as I haue here entred into the mention of Beda, a man of worthie and venerable memorie, because of the certifying of the truth of that man; and for that I see at writers (as touching his life) do not agree, some saying that he was no Englishman by nome: I thought it not impertinent for him, as I find by his owne words testified of himselfe in the latter end of his ecclesiasticall historie of England, offered to the said Celnlfus aboue mentioned; the words of whom be these:

Thus much (by the helpe of God) I Beda the seruant of Christ, and priest of the monastery of Peter and Paul at Wire, haue compiled as diligently concerning the Britaine historie. And so the same Beda proceeding further in his narration, declareth that he being borne in the territorie of the said monasterie, being of the age of seuen yeares, was committed of his parents and friends, to the tuition and education of Benedict (of whom aboue relation is made) and of Ceolfride abbats of the foresaid monasterie. In the which place 01 monasterie he continuing, from that time forth, all his lifetime, gaue himselfe and all his whole studie to the meditating of holy Scripture. And whatsoeuer time or leasure he had from his daily seruice in the church, that he spent either in learning, or teaching, or writing something. About nineteene yeares of his age, he was made deacon, the thirtith yeare of his age he was made priest. From the which time to the age of nine and fiftie yeares, he occupied himselfe in interpreting the coniectures of them for his owne vse, and the necessitie of others; and in writing of treatises: which came in all to the number of seuen and thirtie volumes, which he digested into three score and eightene bookes.

Some say that he went to Rome, either there to defend his bookes to be consonant to catholike doctrine: either else if they should be found faultie, to amend and correct the same, as he should therto be commanded. Albeit the reporter of this his life dare not certainly affirme that euer he was at Rome; but that he was inuited and called thither to come, both it is manifest in in storyes, and also this epistle of pope Sergius both sufficiently proue, declaring moreouer in what price and estimation Beda was accepted, as well in the court of Rome, as in other places besides. The epistle of Sergius sent to Celfride thus proceedeth, in tenor and forme as followeth in Latine.

The epistle of pope Sergius sent to Celfride, abbat of Wire abbie, requiring Beda to be sent vp to him to Rome, for the fame of his worthie learning.

An epistle to pope Sergius.

SErgius episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, Celfrido religioso abbati, Sal. Quibus modis ac verbis clementiam Dei nostri, atque incomparabilem prouidentiam possimus effari, & dignas grauiarum actiones pro immensis eius circa nos beneficijs persoluere, qui in tenebris & in vmbra mortis positos ad lumen scientiæ perduxit? Et infra benedictionis gratiam, quam nobis per præsentem portatorem tua deuota misit religio, libenti & hilari animo sicuti ab ea directa est, nos suscepisse, cognosce. Opportunis igitur ac dignis amplectendæ tuæ solicitudinis petitionibus arctissima deuotione satisfacientes, horatenus Deo dilectam religiositatis tuæ bonitatem, ve quia exortis quibusdam ecclesiasticarum capitulis, non sine examinatione longius innotescendis, opus nobis sunt ad conferendum artes literaturæ, sicut decet Deo deuotum auxiliatorem sanctæ matris vniuersalis ecclesiæ obedientem deuotionem huic nostræ exhortationi non desistas accommodare: sed absque vlla immeratione religiosum Dei famulum Bedam, venerabilem monasterij tui presbyterum, ad limina apostolorum principum domus meorum Petri & Pauli amatorum tuorum ac protectorum, ad nostræ mediocritatis conspectum non moreris dirigere. Erit enim vt confidimus etiam cunctis tibi credita profuturum, quicquid ecclesiæ generali claruerit per eius præstantiam impartitum, &c.

The famous learning of Beda.

So notable and famous was the learning of this foresaid Beda, that the church of Rome (as by this letter appeareth) both stood in need of his helpe, and also required the same, about the discussing of certain causes and controuersies appertaining to learning. Moreouer, the whole Latine church at that time gaue him the mastrie in iudgement and knowledge of the holy scriptures. In all his explanations his cheefest scope and purpose did euer driue to instruct and informe his reader, simplie and without all curiousnesse of stile, in the sincere loue of God and of his neighbour. As touching the holinesse and integritie of his life, it is not to be doubted. For how could it be, that he should attend to any vicious idlenesse, or had any leasure to the same, who in reading and digesting so many volumes, consumed all his whole cogitations in writing vpon the scriptures? for so hee testifieth of himselfe in the third booke vpon Samuel, saying in these words: If my treatises and expositions, saith he, bring with them no other vtilitie to the readers thereof, yet to my selfe they conduce not a little thus, that while all my studie and cogitation was set vpon them, in the meane while of the slippery inticements and vaine cogitations of this world I had little mind. Thus in this trauell of studie he continued till the age of sixtie two yeres: at length drawing to his latter end, being sicke seuen weekes together, besides other occuppings of his mind, and other studies which he did not intermit; he translated also the gospell of S. Iohn into English. At length with great comfort of spirit departed this life, pronouncing many comfortable sayings to them that stood about him, vpon Ascension day, the same yere when Nothelmus was instituted archbishop of Canturburie. And thus much concerning the storie of Beda.

Beda commended for integritie of life.

Also the said Benedict brought from Rome with him Iohn the archchanter, who first taught in England the singing in the quire after the manner of Rome. The number of the workes and bookes written by Beda.

Anno 747 Ex Malmesb. lib. de gestis pontif. Anglo. Cuthert archbishop of Canturburie.

1 First, that bishops should be more diligent in seeing to their office, and in admonishing the people of their faults.

2 That they should liue in a peaceable mino together, notwithstanding they were in place disseuered asunder.

3 That euery bishop once a yere should goe about all the parishes of his diocesse.

4 That the said bishops euerie one in his diocesse should monish their abbats and monks to liue regularlie: and that prelats should not oppresse their interiors, but loue them.

5 That they should teach the monasteries (which the secular men had inuaded, and could not then be taken from them, to liue regularly.

6 That none should be admitted to orders, before his life should be examined.

7 That in monasteries the reading of holy scripture should be more frequented.

8 That priests should bee no disposers of secular busines.

9 That they should take no monie for baptizing infants.

10 That they should both learne and teach the Lords prayer and creed in the English tongue.

11 That all should ioyne together in their ministerie after one vniforme rite and maner.

12 That in a modest voice they should sing in the church.

13 That all holy and festiuall daies should be celebrated at one time together.

14 That the sabbath day be reuerently obserued and kept.

15 That the bishoures canonicall euery day be obserued.

16 That the rogation daies both the greater and lesser should not be omitted.

17 That the feast of S. Gregory and S. Austin our patron should not be omitted.

18 That the fast of the foure times should be kept and obserued.

19 That monks & nuns should go regularly apparelled.

20 That bishops should see these decrees not to be neglected.

21 That the churchmen should not giue themselues vnto drunkennesse.

22 That the communion should not be neglected of the churchmen.

23 Item, that the same also should be obserued of the laymen, as time required.

24 That lay men first should be well tried, before they entered into monkerie.

25 That almes be not neglected.

26 That bishops should see these decrees to be notified to the people.

27 They disputed of the profit of almes.

28 They disputed of the profit of singing psalmes.

29 That the congregation should be constituted, after the abilitie of their goods.

30 That monks should not dwell among laymen.

31 That publik prayer should be made for kings & princes.

These decrees and ordinances being thus among the bishops concluded, Cuthert the archbishop sendeth the copie thereof to Boniface, which Boniface, otherwise named Winfride an Englishman borne, was then archbishop of Mentz, and after made a martyr, as the popish stories terme him.

This Boniface being, as is said, archbishop of Mentz in the time of this foresaid synod, wrote a letter to Ethelbald king of Mercelan: which Ethelbald was also present in the same synod, of whom Beda maketh mention in his historie, calling him proud Ethelbald, and the greatest of the Saxon kings in his time. First this Ethelbald after the departing of Ceolwlfe into his monkerie, inuaded and spoiled the countrie of Northumberland. Moreouer, he exercised mortall and horrible war a long space with Cuthred, otherwise of some named Cuthert, king of Westsaxons after thermine, he with other Saxon kings so impugned the Britains, that from that time they neuer durst prouoke the Saxons any more. At length the said Cuthred, refusing the intollerable exactions of proud Ethelbald, both incounter with him in battell: where notwithstanding the great power that Ethelbald had to him adioyned, of the Mercians, of the Eastsaxons, of the Eastangles, and of the Cantuarits: yet the said Cuthred though Gods power, and the meanes of certaine valiant warriors called Ethelhuns, a consull, ouer them he vnder the vaile of Ethelbald, after a sore and terrible conflict. Which Ethelbald notwithstanding repairing his power against the next yere after, renewed battell with the foresaid Cuthred; in the which battell Ethelbald (after hee had raigned one and fortie yeres in Mercia) was slaine by one Beonred, who after raigned in that diffon but a small time. For Offa nephue to the said Ethelbald expelled the said Beonred, and the Kingdom of Mercia, where he raigned nine & thirtie yeres, of whom more followeth hereafter (the Lord Iesu speding therein our purpole) to be declared, as place and time shall require. In the meane season not to forget the letter before mentioned of Boniface archbishop of Mentz, sent vnto this Ethelbald; I thought the same not vnworthie here to be inserted, at least the effect thereof, not so much for the authors sake, as for that some good matter peraduenture may be picked thereout for other princes to behold and consider.

The copie and tenor of the letter of Boniface archbishop of Mentz, and martyr of God (an Englishman) sent to Ethelbald king of Mercia, freely and yet charitable admonishing him of his adulterous life, and oppression of churches.

REgi & filio charissimo, & in Christi amore cæteris regibus Anglorum præferendo Ethelbaldo, Bonifacius archiepiscopus legatus Germanicus Romanæ ecclesiæ perpetuum in Christo sto charitatis salutem. Confitemur coram Deo, qui nouit an verè atque ex animo dicam: quando presperitatem vestram, & fidem, & bona opera audimus, lætamur: quando autem aliquid aduersum vel in cuentu bellorum, vel de periculo animarum de vobis cognoscimus, tristamur. Audiuimus enim quòd cleemosynis intentus, furta & rapinas prohibes, & pacem diligis, & defensor viduarum & pauperum es, & inde gratias Deo agimus. Quòd verò legitimum matrimonium spernis, si pro castitate faceres, esset laudabile: sed quia in luxu & adulteris & cum sanctimonialibus volutaris, est vituperabile & damnabile. Nam & finam gloriæ vestræ coram Deo & hominibus confundit, & inter idololatras constituit, quia templum Dei violasti. Quapropter fili charissime pœnitere, & memorare oportet, quàm turpe sit, vt tu qui multis gentibus, dono Dei, dominaris, ad iniuriam eius sis libidinis seruus. Audiuimus præterea quòd optimates penè omnis gentis Merciorum, tuo exemplo legitimis vxoribus defrauant, & adulteras & sanctimoniales contaminent. Quod quàm sit peregrinum ab honestate, docent vos alienæ gentis institutio. Nam in antiqua Saxonia, vbi nulla est Christi cognitio, si virgo in materna domo, vel maritata, sub coniuge fuerit adultera, manu propria strangularam cremant, & supra tossam sepultæ corruptorem suspendunt, aut cingulo tenus (vestibus abscissis) flagellant eam castæ matronæ, & cultellis pungunt; & de villa in villam nudatam per totam nouæ flagellatricis, donec consumatur. Insuper & Vinuli, quod est sordidissimum genus hominum, hunc habent morem, vt mulier viro mortuo, se in rogo cremantis pariter arsura præcipitet. Si ergo gentiles Deum ignorantes, tantum zelum castitatis habent, quid tibi conuenit fili charissime, qui christianus & rex es? Parce ergo animæ tuæ: parce multitudini populi tui pereuntis exemplo: de te mortis animabus redditur ratio. Exaudi & illud, quid in gestis Longobardorum (sicut in Francia, & Italia, & ab ipsis paganis nobis imperatur) spretis legitimis matrimoniis per adulteria deficit, nascitúrq; sit ex ea commixtione gens ignaua & Dei contemptrix, quæ perditis moribus patriam pessundet: sicut Burgundionibus & Prouincialibus, & Hispanis contigit, quos Saraceni multis annis infestarunt propter peccata præterita? Præterea nunciatum est nobis, quòd multa priuilegia ecclesiarum & monasteriorum auferens, ad hoc audendum duces tuos exemplo prouoces. Sed recogita quæso quàm terribilem vindictam Deus in anteriores reges exercuit, eiusdem culpæ consciós, quam in te arguimus. Nam Celredum prædecessorem tuum stupratorem sanctimonialium, & ecclesiasticorum priuilegiorum fractorem, splendide cum suis comitibus epulantem spiritus malignus arripuit: & sine confessione & viatico, cum diabolo sermocinanti, & legem Dei detestanti animam extorsit. Osredum quoque regem Deirorum & Bernicorum, exemplum culparum reum, ita efferatum regem egit, vt regnum & iuuenilem ætatem contempibili morte amitteret. Carolus quoque princeps Francorum monasteriorum multorum euersor, & ecclesiasticarum pecuniarum in vsus propios consumator, longa torsione, & verenda morte consumptus est. Et nox infra: Quapropter fili charissime, paternis & obnixis precibus deprecamur, vt non despicias consilium patrum tuorum, qui pro Dei amore cælestium rem tuam appellare satagunt. Nihil enim bono regi salubrius, quàm si talia continuò cum arguuntur, libenter emendentur, quia per Salomonem dicitur: Qui diligit disciplinam, diligit sapientiam. Ideo, fili charissime, offendentes consilium iustum, consectamur & obseruamus per viuentem Deum & per filium eius Iesum Christum, & per spiritum sanctum, vt recorderis quàm fugitiua sit vita præsens, & quàm breuis & momentanea delectatio spurcæ carnis: & quàm ignominiosum sit vt breuis vitæ homo mala exempla in perpetuum posteris relinquat. Incipe ergo melioribus moribus vitam componere, & prauetices errores iuuentutis corrigere, vt hic coram hominibus laudem habeas & in futuro æterna gloria gaudeas. Valete cælestitudinem tuam, & in bonis moribus proficere optamus.

Nihil facilius quàm non facium Prius.

In this epistle here is to be séene and noted, first the corruption and great disorder of life which alwaie from time to time hath béen found in these religious houses of nuns, whose professed vow of coated chastitie hath yet neuer béen good to the church, nor profitable to the commonwealth, and least of all to themselues. Of such poetrie and wanton tenderlings S. Paule in his time complaineth, 1. Tim. 5. which vowed take vpon them the wilfull profession of single life, which they were not able to performe, but falling into damnable luxurie, deserued worthilie to bée reprehended. How much better had it béen for these lascíuious nunns not to haue refused the safe yoke of christian matrimonie, then to intangle themselues in this their superstitious vow of perpetuall maidenhead, which neither was required of them, nor they were able to keepe?

Secondlie, no lesse are they also to be reprehended, which maintained these superstitious orders of vnprofitable nuns and of other religions. In the number of whom was this foresaid Boniface, otherwise called Winfride, who although in this epistle doth iustlie reprehend the vicious enormities both of seculer and of religious persons, yet he himselfe is not without the blame & reproofe greater reprehension, for that he gaue the occasion thereof in maintaining such superstitious orders of such lascíuious nuns and other religious, and refraining the same from lawfull mariage. For so we find of him in stories that he was a great setter vp and vpholder of such blind superstition, and of all poperie. Who being admitted by pope Gregorie the second, archbishop of Sayance, and indued with full authoritie legantine ouer the Germans, brought diuers countries there vnder the popes obedience, held many great councels, obtained bishops, builded monasteries, canonized saints, commanded relikes to be worshipped, permitted religious fathers to carrie about nuns with them a preaching. Amongst all other he founded the great monasterie of Fulda in Germanie of English monks, into the which no woman might enter but onely Lebana Tecla, two English nuns. Item, by the authoritie of the said archbishop Boniface, which he received from pope Zacharie, Childericus king of France was deposed from the right of his crowne, and Pipinus betraier of his maister was confirmed, or rather intruded in. From this Boniface proceeded that detestable doctrine which now standeth registred in the popes decrées, Dist. 40. cap. Si papa. Which in a certaine epistle of his is this: That in case the pope were of most filthie liuing, and for gettfull of negligent of pitifulnesse, and of the whole christianitie, in such sort, that hee led innumerable soules with him to hell: yet ought there no man to rebuke him in so doing, for he hath (saith he) power to iudge all men, and ought of no man to be iudged againe.

Childericus the French king deposed, and Pipinus intruded. Dist. 40. cap. Si papa.

In the time of this archbishop, pope Gregorie the second, also Gregorie the third, and pope Zacharie, and hither to all to pope Constantine the first, wrought great matteries against the Greeke emperors Philippicus and Leo, and others, for the maintaining of images to be set vp in churches. Of whom Philippicus lost both his empire and alle his eies. Leo for the same cause likewise was excommunicate of Gregorie the third. Item Gregorie the third (so far as Iean conjecture) was he that was the first author of the errour of the images in Greek, falsely bearing the name of Gregorie the first, which boke translated Zacharie his successor translated out of Greeke into Latine. Item, the said Gregorie the third first brought into the masse canon the clause for relikes, beginning Quorum solemnitates hodie in conspectu, &c. Item, brought into the said canon the memoriall, the offering and sacrifice for the dead: like as Zacharie brought in the two last wordes and ornaments, and as the foresaid Constantinus also was the first that gaue his feet to be kissed of the emperors. But to turne againe into the course of our English storie.

Images in churches suffered by emperors, maintained by popes. Philippicus by holding against images lost his empire and his eies.

Dist. 40. cap. Si papa.

Mistake in the booke called the dialogues of Gregorie. Memoriall of relikes, offring and sacrifice for the dead, brought into the masse canon.

The popes feet first kissed of the emperors. Whether king of Westsaxons.

In the time of this Egbert king of Northumberland, Sigebert or Sigbert raigned in Westsaxonie, a man of so cruell tyrannie to his subiects (turning the lawes and customs of his predecessors after his owne will and pleasure) that when he was somewhat sharpely admonished vp one of his nobles, an earle called Combranus, to change his manners, and to behaue him more prudentlie toward his people; he therefore malitiouslie caused him to be put to cruell death. Whereupon the said king Sigebert continuing in his cruell conditions, by his subiects conspiring against him, was put from his kingdie dignitie, and brought into such desolation, that wandering alone in a wood without comfort, was there slaine by the shepherd of the said earle, whom before he had so wrongfully murthered, as partly is aboue touched. Wherby is to be séene the cruell tyrannie of princes neuer to prosper well, without the fast reuenge both of God and man.

This Sigebert being slaine, in his place succéeded Kenalphus, in the yeere of our Lord 748. who with the agreement of the Estsaxons, was one of the chiefe doers against Sigebert his maister. This Kenulphus kept trouble his louisse against Offa, and against the power of all his enemies, till at length after that he had raigned, as Fabian saith, one and thirtie yéeres, he resigned to a paramour which hee kept at Merton, was there beset and likewise slaine by the traine & meanes of a certaine kinsman of the foresaid Sigebert, named Cliro or Cinerun, reuenging the cruell king Sigeberts death.

Moreouer, in the reigne of the foresaid Egbert king of Northumberland, and in the eight yeere of Kenulphus king of Westsaxons; Offa after he had slaine the tyrant Beorredus, which before had slaine Ethelbald king of Mercia, and vncle to this foresaid Offa, raigned king of that prouince.

Offa king of Mercia.

Of this Offa are told many notable deeds, which because they concerne rather politicall affaires, and doe not greatlie appertaine to the matter of this present treatise, I omit here to recite. As his wars and victories against Egbert king of the Northumbers, as also against Ethelred king of Eastangles. Item, against Egbert king of Kent, otherwise called Wiren, whom (as Fabian saith) he tooke prisoner, and led bound with him to Mercia. Spalmesburie witnesseth otherwise this to be done not by Offa, but by Kenulphus, as Stall telling, hereafter shall appeare. After these things, Offa had such displeasure vnto the citizens of Canturbury, that he ransomed the archbishops see, and lands of Lambrith archbishop of Canturburie (by the agreement of pope Adrian) vnto Lichfeld. He also chased the Britains or Welshmen into Wales, & made a famous ditch betwixt Wales and the vtter bounds of Mercia or middle England, which was called Offaditch, and builded there a church which long time after was called Offaditch. This Offa also married one of his daughters to Brightricus that was king of Westsaxons. And for that in his time was variance betwéene him and the Frenchmen, in so much that the passage of merchants was forbidden. Therefore he sent Alcuinus a learned man vnto Charles the great then king of France, to commune the meanes of peace: which Charles had after that the said Alcuinus in great fauour and estimation, and afterwards made him abbat of Turonia in France.

An intricate note in the liues of Fabianus.

The pilmacle of Canturburie remooued to Lichfeld. Lambrith archbishop of Canturburie.

This Alcuinus is commended for his learning next to Aristotle and Beda about all Saxons.

About the latter time of the raigne of Offa, king of Mercia, Ethelbert being then king of Eastangles (a learned and a right godly prince) came to the court of Offa, prouoked by the counsell of his nobles to sue for the mariage of his daughter, well accompanied like a prince with his men about him. Whereupon the quéene conceiuing a false suspicion, and fearing that which was neuer minded: that Ethelbert with his companie vnder the pretence and made matter of marriage, was come to worke some violence against her husband, and the kingdome of Mercia, so he persuaded with king Offa and certaine of her counsell that night; that the next day following, Offa caused him to be traine into his palace alone from his companie by one called Guimbertus, who tok him and bound him, and there strucke off his head, which forthwith hee then presented to the king and quéene. And thus the innocent king Ethelred was wrongfully murthered, about the yeere of our Lord 793. but not without a iust reuenge at Gods hand. For (as the storie recordeth) the foresaid quéene, vvoman like vnkind, long liued not aboue two months after, and in her death was so tormented, that she was faine to bite and rent her tongue in péeces with her owne teeth. Offa vnderstanding at length the innocencie of this king, and the hainous cruelti of his fact, gaue the tenth part of his goods to holy church; and to the church of Hereford, in the remembrance of this Ethelbert, he bestowed great lands. Moreouer, he builded the abbeie of S. Albons and many moe monasteries besides. And so afterward he went vp to Rome for his penance, where hee gaue to the church of saint Peter a penie through euery house in his dominion, which was called commonly Romehot, or Peterpence, paid to the church of saint Peter: and there at length was translated from a king to a monke, about the yeere of our Lord 794. with Berredus king of Northumberland aboue mentioned, although some doo say he was buried at Hereford.

Egfretus king of Mercia. Alcuinus Osberto parricida. The fathers fault punished in the child.

After Offa king of Mercia, when he had raigned nine and thirtie yeeres, succéeded his sonne Egfretus, who raigned but foure months, of whom thus writeth the foresaid Alcuinus: Non arbitror quòd nobilissimus iuuenis Egfretus, propter peccata sua mortuus sit: sed quia pater suus, pro confirmatione regni eius multum sanguinem effudit, &c. that is, This noble young man (as I suppose) died not for his fathers sinne, as for that his father had spilled much blood to confirme him in his kingdome.

Egfretus slaine.

Ex Durando, Naucliro, Iacob. de Voragine, & vitis Greg.

Next to which Egfretus, succéeded Kenulphus in the said kingdome of Mercia, which Kenulphus keeping and retaining the hatred of Offa his predecessor against the Cantuarits, made warre vpon them, where he tooke Egbert their king, otherwise called Wiren, and caused him to be bound and led captiue. Notwithstanding, shortly after being mollified with princely clemencie in the towne of Winchcombe, where he had builded the same time a church, vpon the day when hee should dedicate the same in the presence of thirteene bishops, and of Cuthert whom he had placed in the same kingdome of Canturburie before, and ten dukes, and many other great estates, king Kenulphus brought the said Egbert king of Kent out of prison, and led him to the church, where he inlarged him out of imprisonment, and restored him to his place againe. At the sight whereof, not one Cuthert the foresaid king reioyced, but also all the estates and people being there present, made such an exclamation of ioy and gladnesse, that the church (and not onely the church, but also the streets) rang withall. At which time such bountifulnesse of gifts and largesse was then bestowed, that from the highest estate to the lowest, none departed without something giuen, according as to euery degrée was thought méet. Although Fabian referreth this fréedome to king Offa, yet causes there be why I assent rather vnto Palmesburie and to Polychronicon, which attributeth the same to Kenulphus the second king of Mercia, after Offa.

A place of Fabian doubted.

A little before in speaking of certaine bishops of Rome, mention was made of pope Constantine the first, pope Gregorie the second, pope Gregorie the third, and of pope Zacharie, which deposed Childerike, and set vp Pipinus the French king, &c. Next after this Zacharie in order, followed pope Stephan the second, to whom the foresaid Pipinus, to gratifie against the see of Rome for this their benefit shewed to him, graue and contributed to the said see of Rome, the exarchat or princedome of Rauenna, the kingdome of the Lombards, and many other great possessions of Italy, with all the cities thereto adioyning vnto the borders of Mentice. And this donation of Pipin, no doubt if the truth were rightly tried, should be found to be the same, which hitherto falsly hath béene thought to be the donation of Constantine. For else how could it be that the exarchat of Rauenna could belong all this while to the emperors of Constantinople, if Constantine before had giuen it and all Italie from the empire to the see of Rome?

Pope Stephan the second.

The donation of Constantine falsly taken to bee the donation of Constantine.

Ex Polyer. li. 5. cap. 15.

To this Pipinus, as witnesseth Polychronicon, was sent first into France, the inuention of the organs out of Grecia, by Constantine emperour of Constantinople, in the yeere of our Lord 757.

Pope Paul the first.

Next to this Stephan the second, succéeded Paul the first, who following his predecessors, thundered out great excommunications against Constantius the emperor of Constantinople, for abrogating and plucking downe images set vp in temples. Notwithstanding this Constantine neglecting the popes vaine curses, persecuted in his blessed purpose, in destroying idolatrie til the end of his life. Then came to be pope Constantinus the second, a lay man, and brother to Desiderius the king of Lombardie, for the which cause hee was shortlie deposed, and thrust into a monasterie, hauing his eies put out.

Images against maintained by the pope against the emperour. A lay man pope, who was deposed, and had his eies put out.

In whose stead succéeded Stephan the third, who ordained after, that no lay man should be pope: condemning moreouer the councell of Constantinople the seuenth for heretical, because in that councell the worshipping of images was reproued and condemned. Contrarie to the which councell, this pope not onely maintained the filthie idolatrie of images in christian temples, but also aduanced their veneration, commanding them most ethnically to be incensed, &c. At this time Carolus Magnus called Charles the great a little before mentioned began to raigne, by whom this pope caused Desiderius the Lombard king to be deposed.

Pope Stephan the third. The councell of Constantinople the seuenth condemned of the pope, for condemning images.

Glorius in exemples to be found in the masse at saint Peters, alias by the cardinals.

Then in the time of pope, after this Stephan the third, succeeded Adrianus the first, who likewise following the steps of his forefathers the popes, added and attributed to the veneration of images more then all the other had done before, writing a boke for the adoration and the vtilitie proceeding of them, commanding them to be taken for lay mens kalendars, holding moreouer a synod at Rome against Felix, and all others that spake against the setting vp of such books and images. And as Paul the first before him made much of the body of Petronilla S. Peters daughter: so this Adrian clothed the bodie of S. Peter all in siluer, and couered the altar of saint Paul with a pall of gold. This pope Adrian was hee whom we declared in the former part of this treatise, to ratifie and confirme by reuelation the order of S. Gregories masse, aboue the order of S. Ambrose masse, for vnto this time, which was about the yeere of our Lord 780. the liturgie of S. Ambrose was moe vsed in the Italian churches. The rosie therof because it is registred in Durandus, Nauclerus, and Iacobus de Voragine, I thought here to insert the same to this especiall purpose, for the reader to vnderstand the time when this vsuall masse of the papists began first to be vniuersall and vniforme, and generally in that thee to be receiued. Thus it followeth in the storie of the foresaid authors set forth, Iacobus de Voragine, in the life of pope Gregorie the first, telleth a tale concerning this matter.

Pope Adrian the first. The bodie of S. Peter clothed in siluer. The author of the Romish masse booke wrongfully taketh him.

Ex Durando, Naucliro, Iacob. de Voragine, & vitis Greg.

In times past (saith he) when the seruice which Ambrose made, was more frequented and vsed in churches then was the seruice which Gregorie had appointed, the bishop of Rome then called Adrian gathered a councell together in the which it was ordained, that Gregories seruice should be celebrated and kept vniuersally. Which determination of the councell, Charles the emperour did diligentlie put in execution, while he ran about by diuers prouinces, and inioyned all the clergie, partly with threatnings and partly with punishments to receiue that order. And as touching the bokes of Ambrose seruice, he burnt them to ashes in all places, and them into prison, that would not conforme themselues to the order of the matter. Blessed Eugenius the bishop comming vnto the councell, found that it was dissolued three daies before his comming. Notwithstanding through his wisdome, he so perswaded the lord pope, that hee called againe all the prelats that had been present at the councell, and were now departed by the space of three daies. Therefore when the councell was gathered againe together, in this all the fathers did consent and agree, that both the maner bookes of Ambrose and Gregorie should be laid vpon the altar of blessed S. Peter the apostle, and the church doores diligentlie shut, and most vrainie sealed vp with the signets of many and diuers bishops. Againe, that they should all the whole night giue themselues to prayer, that the Lord might reueale, open, and shew vnto them by some euident signe or token, which of these two seruices he would haue vsed in the temples. This being done in all points as they had determined, in the morning opened the church doores, and found both the missals or masse bookes open vpon the altar: or rather (as some say) they found Gregories masse booke vtterly plucked asunder one piece from another, and scattered ouer all the church. As touching Ambrose booke, they onely found it open vpon the altar in the very same place where they before laid it. Whereupon pope Adrian the wise expounder of dreames saith, that as the leaues were torne and blowne abroad all the church ouer, so should Gregories booke bee vsed throughout the world. Whereupon they thought themselues sufficiently instructed and taught of God, that the seruice which Gregorie had made ought to be set abroad and vsed throughout the world, and that Ambrose his seruice should onely be obserued and kept in his owne church of Mediolanum, where he sometime was bishop.

Es ista ipsis commentum placeri, Terent.

Note well the practise of prelats in planting their popish masse.

Thus hath thou heard (brother reader) the full and whole narration of this mysticall miracle, with the popes expositian vpon vpon the same, which semeth to be as true as that which Daniel speaketh of, how the idoll Bell did eat vp all the meat that was set before him all the night, Daniel. 14. Concerning the which miracle, I need not admonish thee to smell out the blind practises of these nightcrowes, to blind the world with forged inuentions in stead of true stories. Albeit to grant the miracle to be most true and infallible, yet as touching the exposition thereof, another man beside the pope perchaunce might interpret this great miracle otherwise, as thus: that God was angrie with Gregories booke, and therfore rent it in peeces, and scattered it abroad, and the other as good, lay sound, vntouched, and at the least so to be preferred. Notwithstanding, whatsoeuer is to be thought of this miracle with the exposition thereof, thus the matter fell out, that Gregories seruice had ouerle the place, and yet hath to this day in the greatest part of Europe, the seruice of Ambrose being excluded. And thus much touching the great act of pope Adrian for the setting vp of the masse. By the relation whereof, yet this knowledge may come to the reader, at least to vnderstand how that commonly in christian nations abroad, as yet no vniforme order of any missall or massebooke was receiued, as hath been hitherto discourssed.

Gregories missle taketh place in Europe.

Now from the popes to returne againe to the emperours, from whence we digressed: like as Pipinus the father of Charles (as hath bin before sufficiently told) had giuen to the se papall all the princedome of Rauenna, with other donations and reuenues and lands in Italie: so this Carolus following his fathers benition, did confirme the same, adding moreouer thereunto, the citie and dominion of Venice, Istria, the duke-dome Forojulience, the dukedome Spoletanum, & Beneuen-tanum, and other possessions more, to the patrimonie of S. Peter, making him the prince of Rome & of Italie. The pope againe to recompence his so gentle kindnesse, made him to bee intituled Most christian king, and made him Patricium Romanum, moreouer ordained him only to be taken for emperour of Rome. For these and other causes more, Carolus bare no little affection to the said Adrian above all other popes: as may well appeare by this letter of Carolus Magnus sent to king Offa, what time the said Offa (as is aboue prefixed) sent to him Alcuinus for intreatie of peace: whereto the foresaid Carolus answereth againe to the message of Offa in a letter, the contents whereof be these.

Carolus Magnus translateth all to the see of Rome.

New christianities intituled to France.

The tenor of a letter sent by Carolus Magnus to king Offa, answering to his request concerning the increasie of peace betweene them.

A letter of Charles the great sent to king Offa.

CArolus rex Francorum & Longobardorum, patricius Romanorum, viro venerando, & fratri charissimo Offæ regi Merciorum, salutē. Primò gratias agimus omnipotenti Deo, de catholicæ fidei sinceritate, quam in vestris laudabilibus paginis reperimus exaratam. De peregrinis verò, qui pro amore Dei, & salute animarum suarum, beatorum apostolorum limina desiderant adire, cum pace sue omni perturbatione vadant. Sed si aliqui religioni non seruientes, sed lucra sectantes inueniantur inter eos, locis opportunis statuta soluane telonia. Negociatores quoque vestros vt ex mandato nostro patrocinium habeant in regno nostro legitimè. Et si in aliquo loco iniusta affligantur oppressione, reclament se ad nos, vel nostros iudices, & plenam iustitiam iubemus fieri. Cognoscat quoque dilectio vestra, quod aliquam benignitatem de Delmaticis nostris vel pallijs ad singulas sedes episcopales regni vestri vel Ethelredi direximus, in eleemosynam domini apostolici Adriani, deprecantes vt pro eo interredi iubeatis, nullam habentes dubitationem beatam illius animam in requie esse, sed vt fidem & dilectionem ostendamus in amicum nobis charissimum. Sed & de thesauro humanarum rerum, quum Dominus Iesus gratuita pietate concessit aliquid per metropolitanas ciuitates; direximus vestræ quoque dilectioni vnum baltheum, & vnum gladium, & duo pallia serica, &c.

Offa sendeth gifts to Charles.

The cause why this Carolus writeth so fauorably of Adrian partly is touched before, partly also was, for that Carolo-man his elder brother being dead, his wife called Bertha with her two children came to Adrian, to haue them confirmed in their fathers kingdome, whereunto the pope to shew a pleasure to Carolus would not agree: but gaue the mother with her two children, & Desiderius the Lombard king with his triple kingdome, his wife and children, into the hands of the said Carolus, who led them with him captiue into France, and there kept them in seruitude during their life.

The pope translateth the see of peace with powers and seppans.

Thus Carolus Magnus being proclaimed emperour of Rome, through the preferment of Adrian and pope Leo the third, which succeded next after him, was the empire translated from the Grecians about the yeere of our Lord 801. vnto the Frenchmen, where it continued about one hundred and two yeeres, till the comming of Contacus and his nephue Otho, which were Germans: and so hath continued after them among the Almans vnto this present time. This Charles builded so many monasteries as there be letters in the rowe of the A B C. he was beneficiall chiefly to churchmen, also mercifull to the poore, in his acts valiant and triumphant, studi in all languages: he held a councell at Francford, where was condemned the councell of Nice and Irene, for setting vp and worshipping images, &c.

Images written against as contrary to the true faith.

Concerning which councell of Nice, and things there concluded and enacted (because no man shall thinke the detesting of images to be any new thing now begun) thus I find it recorded in an ancient written historie of Roger Houeden, called Continuationes Bedæ: his words in Latine be these. Anno 792. Carolus rex Francorum misit synodalem librum ad Britanniam, sibi a Constantinopoli directum. In quo lib. heu proh dolor, multa inconuenientia, & veræ fidei cōtraria reperiuntur, maximè quòd pene omnium orientalium doctorum non minus quàm 300. vel eo amplius episcoporum vnanimi assertione confirmatum sit, imagines adorari debere: quod omnino ecclesia Dei execratur. Contra quod scripsit Albinus epistolam ex autoritate diuinarum scripturarum mirabiliter affirmatam, illāmque cum eodem libro ex persona episcoporum ac principū nostrorum, regi Francorum attulit. Hæc ille. That is, In the peere of our Lord 792. Charles the French king sent a booke containing the acts of a certaine synod, into Britaine, directed vnto him from Constantinople. In the which booke (lamentable to be told) manye things inconuenient and cleane contrarie vnto the true faith are there to be found: especially for that by the common consent of almost all the learned bishops of the East church, not so few as 300. it was there agreed, that images should be worshipped: which thing the church of God hath always abhorred. Against which booke Alcuinus sonte an epistle substantially grounded out of the authorities of holie scripture, which epistle with the booke the said Albinus, in the name and person of our bishops and princes, did present to the French king.

This Albinus was Alcuinus aboue mentioned.

The bishops and princes of England against images.

And thus much by the way of Romish matters: now to returne againe to the Northumberland kings, where we left at Egbert: which Egbert (as is before declared) succeeded after Ceolulphus, after he was banished the land. During the said Egbert also following the deuotion of his vncle Ceolulphus, and Beneedus before him, was likewise shorne monke after he had raigned twentie yeeres in Northumberland, leauing his son Ethelphus after him to succed. About which time, and in the same yeere, when Ceolulphus deceased in his monasterie, which was the yeere of our Lord 764. diuers cities were burnt with fadden fire, as the citie of Wicate, the citie of London the citie of Yorke, Doncaster, with diuers other townes besides: Roger Houeden, lib. Contin. post Bedā. Who the first yeere of his raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord 757. being innocently slaine, next to him followed Pollo, otherwise called Adelwald, who likewise being slaine of Alcredus, after he had raigned eleuen yeeres, departed. After, Alcredus when he had raigned ten yeeres, was expulsed out of his kingdome by his people. Then was Ethelbert otherwise named Adelred, the sonne of the foresaid Pollo, received king of Northumberland: which Ethelbert or Adelred in like sort after he had raigned fiue yeeres, was expulsed. After whom succeded Alfwold, who likewise when he had raigned eleuen yeeres, was vniustly slaine. So likewise after him his nephue and the sonne of Alcredus named Osredus, raigned one yeere, and was slaine. Then the foresaid Ethelbert the sonne of Pollo, after twelue yeeres banishment, raigned againe in Northumberland the space of foure yeeres, & was slaine, the cause whereof (as I find in an old written booke) was, that forsaking his old wife, he maried a new. Concerning whom Alcuinus writeth in this maner. Benedictus Deus qui facit mirabilia solus. Nuper Ethelbertus Eadbaldi filius Eadbertus, familiter & Edelredo regi, & ad suas episcoporum sedes direxit dona. Sed heu pro dolor, donis datis, & epistolis in manus missorum, superuenit tristis legatio per missos qui de Scotia per nos reuersi sunt, de infidelitate gentis, & nece regis. Ita Carolus retracta donorum largitate in tantum iratus est contra gentem illam, vt ait, perfidam & peruersam, & homicidam dominorum suorum, peiorem cunctis paganis æstimans, vt nisi ego intercessor essem pro ea, quicquid eis boni abstrahere potuisset, & mali machinari, iam fecisset, &c.

King Egbert made a monke. ⟨ Anno 757 ⟩ Ethelphus, Adelphe, otherwise called Adelwold, Alcredus or Alured us. Ethelbert, otherwise named Adelred, or Eardulph. Alfwold, Osredus, Adelred again king of Northumberland.

The kingdome of Northumberland ceaseth.

Northumberland kingdome ceaseth.

Thus as you haue heard, after the raigne of king Egbert before mentioned, such trouble and perturbation was in the dominion of Northumberland, both staying, expulsing and deposing their kings one after another, that after the murthering of this Edelred aboue specified, none durst take the gouernment vpon him, seeing the great danger thereupon insuing. Insomuch that the foresaid kingdome did lie void and wast the space of three and thirtie yeeres together, after the terme of which yeeres this kingdome of Northumberland, with the kingdomes also of the other Saxons besides, came alto-altogether into the hands of Egbert king of Westsaxons, and his progenie: which monarchie began in the yeere of our Lord 827. and in the eight and twentie yeere of the raigne of the said Egbert: whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Of this troublesome and ragious time of Northumberland people, speaketh also the said learned man Alcuinus, otherwise called Albinus, in the same countrie borne, writing out of France into England, and complaining of the same in diuers his letters, as first to Offa, where he thus writeth: Ego paratus eram cum muneribus Caroli regis ad vos venire, & in patriam reuerti. Sed melius visum est propter pacem gentis mex in peregrinatione remanere, nescions quid fecissem inter eos, vbi nullus securus esse, vel in salubri consilio proficere potest. Ecclesia sancta a paganis vastata, altaria per iurijs fœdata, monasteria adulterijs violata, terra sanguine dominorum & principum fœdata, &c. Moreouer the said Alcuinus writing to the foresaid Edelred a little aboue mentioned, after the same tenor reporteth: Ecce ecclesia sancti Cuthberti sacerdotum Dei sanguine aspersa (omnibus spoliata ornamentis) locus cunctis in Britannia venerabilior, paganis gentibus datur ad deprædandum. Et vbi primùm post decessum S. Cuthberti ab Eboraco, christiana religio in nostra gente sumpsit exordium, ibi miseriæ & calamitatis coepit initium, &c. Item, writing to Offa a noble peere of the Mercians, complaining on the same matter, saith: Regnum nostrum Northumbrorum penè perijt, propter intestinas dissensiones, & fallaces coniurationes, &c.

Alcuinus or thewise called Albinus.

The troubles of the kingdome of Northumberland described by Alcuinus.

Item, in another place the said Alcuinus writing to Adelard archbishop of Canturburie, complaineth moreouer: Hoc dico propter flagellum, quod nuper accidit patribus insulæ nostræ, quæ prope trecentis & quadraginta annis gentibus inhabitata est nostris. Legitur in libro Gildæ sapientissimi Britonum, quòd iidem Britones, propter auaritiam & rapinam principum, propter intquitatem & iniustitiam iudicum, propter desidiam prædicationis episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidere. Caueamus hæc eadem vitia nostris temporibus inolescere, quatenus benedictio diuina nobis patrium consortia & prosperitates bonas, quam nobis misericordissima pietate perdonare dignatus est, &c.

Moreouer writing vnto the foresaid Edelred king of Northumberland, maketh record of a strange sight which he himselfe did see the same time in the citie of Yorke, to raine blood: whereof his words which he wrote concerning the same vnto the said king Edelred bee these. Quid significat pluuia sanguinis, quam quadragesimali tempore in Eboraco ciuitate, quæ caput est totius regni, in ecclesia beati principis apostolorum, vidimus de borealibus partibus dornus, sereno aere, de fumnitate minanter cadere? Nonne potest putari, a borealibus partibus venire sanguinem super terram? That is: What signifieth the raine of blood which in time of Lent, in the citie of Yorke the chiefe citie of that dominion, and in the church of saint Peter the chefe of the apostles, we our selues did see to fall from the church top (the element being cleere) out of the north parts of the temple, &c. This wonderous sight testified by Malmesburiensis, is thought of Fabian to happen in the second peere of the raigne of Wightricus, as with the time both well agree) which was the peere of our Lord seuen hundred and eightie, and is thought to be portento to betoken the comming of the Danes into this land, which entred shortly after about seuen yeeres, in the ninth peere of the raigne of Wightricus king of the Westsaxons. Wlfhyth Wightricus in defence thereof sent forth his steward of his houshold with a small companie, which shortlie was slaine: but by the strength of the said Wightricus and the other Saxon kings, they were compelled to void the land for that time, which was in the yeere 790. To this Wightricus king Offa, as is aforesaid, gaue his daughter Edelburga to wife, by whom he at length was impoisoned, besides certaine other of his nobles, vpon whom the said queene before him had practised the same wickednesse. Who then after that fled ouer to Charles the great into France, where she being offered for her beautie to marrie either to him or his sonne, because she chose rather his sonne married neither the one nor yet the other; but was shuft in a monasterie, where shee then playing the harlot with a monke, was expulsed from thence, and ended her life in penurie and miserie.

Irene. ⟨ Anno 784 ⟩

In the meane time, while this Edelburga was thus working her feates in England, Irene empesse of the Grækes was as busie also for her part at Constantinople, who first through the persuasion of Pope Adrian, tooke vp the bodie of Constantine emperour of Constantinople, her owne husbands father. And when she had burned the same, she caused the ashes to be cast into the sea, because he disanulled images. Afterwards raigning with her sonne Constantine the first, sonne to Leo the fourth (whom also wee declared before to be excommunicated for taking away images) being of insufficient wit him, caused him to be taken and laid in prison, who afterward through power of friends, being restored to his empire againe, at last he caused the same her owne sonne to bee cast in prison, and his eies to bee put out so cruelly, that within short space hee died. After this the said Irene empeselle, with the counsell of Tharasius bishop of Constantinople, held a councell at Nicea, where it was decreed, that images should againe bee resored vnto the church; which councell after was repealed by another councell holden at Francford by Charles the great. At length she was deposed by Nicephorus (who reigned after) and was expulsed the empire: who after the example of Edelburga above mentioned (condignlie punished for her wickednesse) ended likewise her life in much penurie and miserie.

The wickednes of Irene condignly rewarded.

About the time when the foresaid Wightricus was impoisoned by Edelburga his wife, died also king Offa, which was about the yeare of our Lord 795. or (as some say) 802. After which Offa (as is aforesaid) succeeded Egfert, then Kenelphus, after whom succeded Kenelmus his sonne, who in his younger age was wickedly murthered by his sister Quinreda, and Aethelbertus, about the yeare of our Lord 819, and in the church of Winchcombe was counted for an holy martyr. After him succeded his vncle Ceolulphus, whom Bernulphus in the first yeare of his reigne expulsed, and reigned in his place. Who likewise the third yeare of his raigne was ouercome and expulsed by Egbert king of the Westsaxons, and afterward slaine by the Saxangles. And the kingdome of Mercia also ceased, and came into the hands of the Westsaxons.

Kenelmus king of Mercia innocently slaine.

Ceolulphus, Bernulphus, kings of Mercia.

The kingdome of Mercia ceaseth.

Hitherto I haue brought (as thou seest good reader) the confused and turbulent raignes of these seuen Saxon kings, who after the expulsion of the Britains ruled and raigned asunder in sundrie quarters of this land together, vnto this present time of Egbert king of the Westsaxons. By whom it so pleased God to begin to reduce and vnite all these scattered kingdomes into one monarchicall forme of dominion. Wherefore as in the foresaid Egbert beginneth a new alteration of the commonwealth here in this land among the Saxons: so my purpose is (the Lord willing) with the same Egbert to enter a new beginning of my third booke, after a briefe recapitulation first made of such things as in this second booke before are to be collected and noted, especially touching the monasteries builded, the kings who haue entred the life and profession of monkishe: also queenes and quenes daughters, which the same time professed solitarie life in monasteries, which they or their ancestors had created.

The conclusion of the storie precedent, concerning the seuen kingdomes of the Saxon kings aboue mentioned.

And thus hast thou (gentle reader) concerning the seuen kingdomes of these Saxons, ruling all together in England, the course and order of their doings briefelie described and discoursed vnto thee, in such order, as the matter being so intricate, in such confusion and diuersitie of things incident together, would permit: following especiallie in this storie hitherto the line of the Northumberland kings, as the other stories most follow the line of Westsaxon kings. The which seuen kingdomes of these said Saxons, after they had vntrulie expulsed and chased out the Britains from their land, like as they neuer were in quietnesse among themselues, raigning thus together till the time of this Egbert; so also after the raigne of Egbert, the same be realme being reduced into one regiment, no lesse were they impugned and afflicted by the Danes continuallie from time to time, till the last Conquest of William the Norman. Thus it pleased God (euer lightly) to reuenge with blood blodie violence, and the vniust dealings of men with iust and like retribution. But of this let the christian reader consider, as Gods grace shall worke in him. In the meane time foe, as much as by vs did lie, fulfilling the part of an historiān, haue thus hitherto set forth and declared concerning these seuen foresaid kingdomes: first the names and lineall descent of the kings seuerallie by themselues, as by the table prefixed may appeare: then what were the doings and acts of the same, how first being pagans, they were conuerted to the christian faith: what things in their time happened in the church, how many of them of kings were made monks: how deuout they were then to holy church and to the churchmen, and especially to the church of Rome. But the churchmen then were much otherwise in life then afterwards they declared themselues to bee. Through which deuotion of the said kings, first came in the Peterpence or Romeshots in this realme, as by the first in his dominion, then by Offa in his lordship, and afterwards by Adelwolph wrought in and ratified through the whole realme: where also is to be noted, that by the foresaid kings and quenes of the said Saxons, the most part of the greatest abbies and nunneries in this realme were first begun and builded, as partly the names of some here following to be seene.

Diuers deuillishe kings of mere iustlie rewarded.

First the church or minster of Saint Paul in London was founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert king of Essex about the yeere of our Lord 604.

The first crosse and altar within this realme was first set vp in the north parts in Heuenfield, vpon the occasion of Oswald king of Northumberland, fighting against Cadwalla, where he in the same place set vp the signe of the crosse, kneeling and praying there for victorie: Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 12. Two things to be wished in them that first builded monasteries.

The article of free iustification not knowne.

The church of Winchester was first begun and founded by Kinegilsus king of Mercians, hauing nine miles about it: after finished by his sonne Kenwalcus, where Wine, of Englishmen was first bishop, An. 636, Guliel. Malms. lib. de gestis pont. Ang.

The church of Lincolne first founded by Paulinus bishop, An. 629.

The church of Westminster began first by acertaine citizen of London, through the instigation of Ethelbert king of Kent, which before was an ile of thornes: Bed. An. 614.

The common schooles first erected at Cambridge by Sigebert king of Eastangles, An. 636.

The abbie of Kirkinburgh builded by Furceus the hermit, An. 637.

The monasterie of Malmesburie by one Meldulphus a Scot, about the yere of our Lord 640. afterward inlarged by Agilbert bishop of Winchester.

The monasterie in Glocester first builded by Osricus king of Mercia, as Cestrensis saith; but as William Malmesburie writeth, by Ulferus and Ethelred, brethren to Kineburga abbesse of the same house, An. 679.

The monasterie of Paikrose by the flood of Twide by Aidanus a Scotish bishop.

The nunrie of Hexenton by Heni, who was the first nun in Northumberland: Beda lib. 4. cap. 1.

The monasterie of Hetesche by Oswie king of Northumberland, who also with his daughter Elfred gaue possessions for twelue monasteries in the parts of Northumberland, Anno 656.

The monasterie of S. Martin in Douer, builded by Whitred king of Kent.

The abbie of Lessingie by Ceadda (whom wee call saint Ced) through the grant of Oswald, sonne to S. Oswald, king of Northumberland, An. 651.

The monasterie of Whitbie called otherwise Stenhalt by Hilda daughter to the nephue of Edwin king of Northumberland, An. 657.

Item another monasterie called Hacanos, not farre from the same place, builded by the said Hilda the same yeere.

The abbie of Abington builded by Sissa king of Southser, An. 666.

Item, an abbie in the east side of Lincolne called Joanno, by S. Botulph: Polychro. lib. 5. cap. 16. An. 654.

The nunrie in Elie founded by Etheldred or Ethelrida daughter of Anna king of Eastangles, and the wife of Elfride king of Northumberland, An. 674.

The monasterie of Chertsie in Southerie, founded by Erkenwald bishop of London, An. 674. throwne downe by the Danes, after reedified by king Edgar.

Item, the nunrie of Berking edified by the said Erkenwalous bishop of London about the same time.

The abbie of Peterborough called otherwise Nodeham-sted founded by K. Ethelwald king of the Mercians, An. 675.

Bardenie abbie by Ethelredus king of the Mercians, An. 700.

Glastenburie by Ina king of the Westsaxons, and after repared and inriched by king Edgar, An. 701.

Ramsie in the time of king Edgar, by one Aillwinus a noble man, An. 973. King Edgar builded in his time fortie monasteries, who raigned An. 901.

The nunrie of Wilnburne builded by Cuthburga sister to Ingulfus, king Ina his brother, An. 717.

The monastery of Sealesie by the ile of Wight, by Wilfridus bishop of Poike, An. 678.

The monasterie of Wincombe by Kenulphus king of the Mercians, An. 737.

Saint Albons builded by Offa king of the Mercians, An. 755.

The abbie of Cutham by Edwinus bishop, An. 691.

Ripon in the north by Wilfridus bishop, An. 709.

The abbie of Schlingheie by king Alfredus, An. 891.

The nunrie of Shaftesburie by the same Alfredus, the same yeere.

Thus ye see what monasteries and in what time began to be founded by the Saxon kings, newly conuerted to the christian faith, within the space of two hundred yeeres; the, as they seemed then to haue a certaine zeale and deuotion to Godward, according to the leading and teaching that then was: so it seemeth againe to me, two things to bee wished in these foresaid kings: first, that they which began to erect these monasteries and cels of monks and nuns, to liue solie and single by themselues out of the holy Rate of matrimonie, had foreseene what danger, and what abuse enormities might and also did thereof insue, both publikely to the church of Christ, and priuately to their owne soules: secondly, that vnto this their zeale and deuotion had ben ioyned like knowledge & doctrine in Christs gospell, especially in the article of our free iustification by the faith of Jesu Christ; because of the lacke whereof, as well the builders & founders thereof, as they that were professed in the same, seeme both to haue run the wrong way, and to haue ben deceiued. For albeit in them there was a deuotion and zeale of mind, that thought well in this their doing, which I will not here reprehend: yet the end and cause of their deeds & buildings cannot be excused, being contrarie to the rule of Christs gospel, for so much as they did these things lacking thereby merits with God, and so remedie of their soules, and remission of their sinnes, as may appeare testified in their owne records, whereof one here I thought to set forth for probation of the same. Read this chart (if it please thee gentle reader) of king Ethelbald his donation giuen to churches & religious persons, which Ethelbald was the builder (as is said) of Peterborough. The woords of his record and instrument be these.

The donations and priuiledges granted and giuen by king Ethelbald to religious men of the church.

PLerumque contingere solet, pro incerta temporum vicissitudine, vt ea quæ multarum fidelium personarum testimonio consilióque roborata fuerint; fraudulenter per contumaciam plurimorum, & machinamenta simulationis, sine vlla consideratione rationis, periculosè dissipentur, nisi autoritate literarum (testamento chirographorum) æternæ memoriæ committantur. Quapropter, ego Ethelbaldus rex Merciorum, pro amore cœlestis patriæ, & remedio animæ meæ, studendum esse putaui, vt eam per ista opera liberam efficerem in omni vinculo delictorum. Quoniam enim mihi omnipotens Deus per misericordiam clementiæ suæ, absque vllo antecedente merito, sceptra reginimis largitus est: ideo libenter ei, ex eo quod dedit, retribuo. Huius rei gratiâ hanc donationem, me viuente, concedo, vt omnia monasteria & ecclesiæ regni mei, à publicis vectigalibus, & operibus, & oneribus absoluantur: nisi instructionibus arcium, vel pontium, quæ nulli vnquam prosunt. Præterea, habeant famuli Dei propriam libertatem in fructibus syluarum & agrorum, & in captura piscium, ne minusculà præbeant vel regi, vel principibus, nisi voluntaria; sed liberi Deo seruiant, &c.

By the contents hereof may well be vnderstood (as where be faith) Pro amore cœlestis patriæ, pro remedio animæ, pro liberatione animæ, & absolutione delictorum, &c.) how great the ignorance and blindnesse of these men was, who lacking no zeale, onely lacked knowledge to rule it withall: lacking their saluation not by Christ onely, but by their owne deseruings and meritorious deeds. Which I recite not here to any infamie or reprehension of them; but rather to put vs in mind and memorie, how much we at this present are bound to God for the true sinceritie of his truth, hidden so long before to our forefathers, & opened now vnto vs by the good will of our God, in his sonne Christ Jesu. This only lamenting by the way, to see them to haue such workes and to lacke our faith, and vs to haue the right faith, & to lacke their workes. And this blind ignorance of that age thus aboue prenoted, was the cause not only why these kings builded so many monasteries vpon zealous superstition: but also why so many of them, forsaking their orderly vocation of princely regiment, gaue themselues ouer to monasticall profession, or rather vtter superstition. Concerning the names and number of such kings that were professed monks, is sufficiently in the storie before declared: the names of whom we shewed to be seuen or eight, within the space of these two hundred yeeres. Such was then the superstitious deuotion of kings and princes in that age; and no lesse also to be noted in queenes and kings daughters, with other noble women of the same age and time; the names of whom it were too long here to recite. As Hilda daughter to the nephue of Edwin king of Northumberland, abbesse of Elie. Ethengoda with her sister Ermenilda daughters of Ercombertus king of Kent, which Ercheregoda was professed in saint Brigets order in France. Item Edelberga wife and queene to king Edwin of Northumberland daughter of king Anna, which was also in the same house of saint Brigit made a nun. Item, Etheldreda whom we terme saint Audrie, wife to king Ecfride of Northumberland, who being married to two husbands, could not be obtained to giue her consent to either of them, during the space of twelue yeeres, but would néeds line a virgin, and was professed nun at Helings. Tiedburga was the daughter of Ulferus king of Mercians, and mother of Elie. Kineswitha sister of king Ulferus and Kinsfusida her sister, were both nuns professed. Sexburga daughter of king Anna king of Percians, and wife of Ercombert king of Kent, was abbesse at Elie. Ediva daughter of Oswie king of Northumberland was abbesse of Wilstineir: Sidroda, Sidburga, & Silgunda, all three daughters of Sexburga king of Westsaxerians, entred the profession and vow of mumish virginitie. Kineburga wife of Alfride king of Northumberland, and sister to Ulferus king of Mercians, and daughter of king Penda, was professed abbesse of the monasterie in Glocester. Etheda daughter of Oswie king, and wife of Beda, some of king Penda, likewise inclosed her selfe in the same profession and vow of vnmith chastity. Ethelvise Alfritha wife to king Edgar, and Editha daughter to the said Edgar, both Wolfrith her mother, &c. All which holy nuns with diuers mo, the Romish catholikes haue canonized for saints, and put the most part of them in their kalendar, and onely onely because of the vow of chastitie solemnely professed. Concerning which chastitie, whether they kept it or no, little I haue to say against them, and lesse to sweare for them. But whether they so kept it or not, if this gift of chastitie which they professed, were giuen them of God, small praise or worthie was it in them to keep it. If it were not giuen them, I will not say here of them so much, as hath been said of some other, which sufficiently haue painted out to the world the demeanor of these holie votaries. But this will I say, that although they kept it neuer so perfectlie, yet it is not that which maketh saints before God, but onely the bloud of Christ Jesus, and a true faith in him.

Likewise remaineth, that as we haue declared the deuotion of these noble women, which professing monastike life, haue cast off all worldlie dignitie and delights: so wee should also intreat of such noble men, who among the Saxon kings in like zeale of deuotion, haue giuen ouer themselues from the world (as they thought) vnto the contemplatiue life of monkish profession. The names of whom as in the catalogue of the Saxon kings before is described, be these, to the number of nine.

Of which kings and their doings, what is to be iudged, looke gentle reader before.

By these histories it is apparant, what mutations, what perturbations, what alteration of state hath been in this realme of Britaine, first from Britains kings, to Romans, then to Britains againe, afterward to the Saxons. First to seuen all together raigning, then to one, &c. And this alteration not onelie hapned in the ciuill gouernance, but also followed in the state ecclesiasticall. For as in the Britans time the metropolitan see was in London, so in the Saxons time after the coming of Austin, it was remoued to Canturburie: the catalogue and order of which metropolitans, from the time of Austin to Egbertus, is thus, as in the historie of Malmesburiensis is described.

During the course of these seuenteene archbishops of Canturburie in Rome passed in the meane time foure and thirtie popes, of whom partly heretofore we haue declared.

And thus much touching the time of the seuen kingdomes of the Saxons, ruling together in England, from the raigne of Hengist vnto Egbert, the first king and monarch of the whole land, after the expulsion of the Britans.

NOw remaineth (by the grace of Christ) in the next booke following, to prosecute the order of such kings as principally raigning alone, had this realme in their possession, from the time of Egbert king of Westsaxons, to the comming of William Conqueror the Norman, comprehending therein the rest of the next 300. yeeres, with the acts & state of religion, as in that space was in the church: wherin may appeare the declining time of the church, and of true religion, preparing the way to antichrist, which not long after followed. For here is to be noted, that during yet this meane time, Satan (as is said) was bound vp from his raging & furious violence, counting from the time of Constantinus, to the next loosing out of Satan, which was foretold by the Reuelation of S. John aboue mentioned, to be a thousand yeeres; whereof by the order of the historie (Christ granting) more shall be laid hereafter.

The end of the second booke.

The third Booke containing the next three hundred yeeres, from the raigne of king Egbertus vnto the time of William Conqueror.

NOw remaineth likewise, as before I did in describing the descent and diuersitie of the seuen kings, all together reigning and ruling in this land: so to prosecute all like order the lineall succession of them, which after Egbertus king of the Westsaxons, gouerned and ruled solie, vntill the conquest of William the Norman; first expressing their names, and afterwards importing such acts, as in their time happened in the church worthie to bee noted. Albeit, as touching the acts and doings of these kings, because they are sufficiently and at large described, and taken out of Latine writers into the English tongue by diuers and sundrie authors, and namelie in the historie or chronicle of Fabian; I shall not spend much trauell thereupon, but rather refer the reader vnto him or to some other, where the troublesome tumults betweene the Englishmen and the Danes at that time may be seene, who so list to read them. Onelie the table of their names and raigne, and acts done vnder their raigne, I haue compendiouslie abridged, vsing such breuitie as the matter would suffer.

A table of the Saxon kings, which ruled alone from king Egbert vnto VVilliam Conqueror.

Here is to be noted, that before the reigne of Edward the Confessor, the Danes obtained the crowne vnder their captaine Canutus who reigned yeres 19
Haraldus Harefoot sonne of Canutus 4
Hardeknutus sonne of Canutus 2
Edward the Confessor an Englishman, son of Ethelred 24
Haraldus sonne of earle Godwin an vsurper 1
William Conqueror, a Norman.

King Egbertus.

Egbert king of the Eest Saxons afterward monarch and king of the whole realme.

IN the reigne of Brightricus a little before mentioned about the yere of Grace 795, there was in his dominion a noble personage, of some called Egbert, of some Ethelbright, who being feared of the same Brightricus became he was of a kingly blood, and nere vnto the crowne, was by the force and conspiracie of the forenamed Brightricus, chased and pursued out of the land of Britaine into France, where he indured till the death of the said Brightricus. After the hearing whereof, Egbert sped him effsones out of France, vnto his countrie of Westsax, where he in such wise behaued himselfe, that he obtained the regiment and gouernance of the aboue said kingdome.

In this time came in the Danes, first into the south parts and were driuen out again.

Anno 807

Bernulphus king of Mercia aboue mentioned, with other kings had this Egbert in such derision, that they made of him diuers scoffing tells, and scorning rimes, all which he sustained for a time. But when he was more eſtablished in his kingdome, and had pryued the minds of his subiects, and especially God working withall, he afterward assembled his knights, and gaue to the said Bernulphus a battell in a place called Gindon in the prouince of Hampton; and notwithstanding in that fight were great odds of number, as sir or eight against one, yet Egbert through the might of the Lord vnto whom giueth victorie as pleaseth him, had the better, and wan the field; which done, he seazed that to his ship into his hand: and that also done, he made war vpon the Kentish Saxons, and at length in like wise obtained the victorie. And as it is in Polychronicon testified, he also subdued Northumberland, and caused the kings of those three kingdomes to liue vnder him as tributaries, or loyned them to his kingdome: Ex Flor. hist. This Egbert also wan from the Britains or Welchmen, the towne of Chester, which they had kept possession of till that day. After these and other victories, he peaceably inioying the land, called a counsell of his lords at Winchester, where by their aduices he was crowned king and chiefe lord ouer this land, which before that day was called Britain: but then he sent out into all coasts of the land his commandements and commissions, charging straightly that from that day forward the Saxons should bee called Angles, and the land Anglia.

Of this victorie went a prouerb: Klaus cruore rubuit, ruina reſtitit, ſaxone ſalutis.

Anno 826

This land first called Anglia.

About the thirtith yeare of the reigne of Egbert, the heathenish people of the Danes, which a little before had made horrible destruction in Northumberland, and especially in the isle of Lindesarne, where they spoiled the churches, and murdered the ministers, with their women & children, after a cruell manner, entred now the second time with a great hall into this land, and spoiled the isle of Sheppie in Kent, nere to Rent: where Egbert hearing therof, assembled his people, & met with them at Carrum. But in that conflict he sped not so well as he was wont in times before, but with his knights was compelled to forsake the field. Notwithstanding in the next battell, the said Egbert with a small power, ouerthrew a great multitude of them, and so draue them backe. The next yeare following, the said Danes presuming vpon their victorie before, made their returne again into the land westward, where ioyning with the Britains, by the helpe and power of them they assailed the lands of Egbert, and did much harme in many places of his dominion, and elsewhere, so that after this they were continually abiding in one place of the realme of England or other, till the time of Hardeknutus last king of the Danes blood, so that many of them were married to English women, and many that now bee, or in times past were called Englishmen, are descended of them. And albeit that they were many and sundrie times driuen out of the land, and chased from one country to another, yet that notwithstanding, they euer gathered new strengths and powers, that they abode still within the land.

Danes now the second time entred in this land.

Fabian. cap. 138. Reg. Hoved. lib. 1. cap. 1

And thus (as by the stories appeareth) this troublesome land of Britain, now called England, hath been hitherto by sundrie outward nations plagued. First by the Romans, then by the Scots and Picts; thirdly, by the Saxons; fourthly, by the Danes, of whose outragious cruelty and hostilitie our English histories do most exclaime and complaine: fiftly by the Normans, which I pray God bee the last.

England fiue times plagued by other nations.

Ex Reg. Hoved. lib. 1.

Then it followeth in the storie, that the time of this persecution of the foresaid pagans and Danes continuing, king Egbert when he had ruled the Westsaxons, and ouer the more part of England, by the terme of seuen and thirty yeares, died, and was buried at Winchester, leauing to his son Ethelwolfe his kingdome, which first was bishop of Winchester (as Houeden recordeth) & after vpon necessitie made king, leauing withall and pronouncing this saying to his sonne: Felicem fore ſe regnum, quod multa rexerat induſtrie, illa conſpicua genti illi non interruperet ignauia.

King Ethelwulfus.

Anno 837

A place in Kebant to be amended.

ETHelwulfus the son of Egbert, in his former age had entred into the order of subdeacon, as some others say was made bishop of Winchester, but afterwards being the only son of Egbert, was made king through the dispensation (as Fabian saith) of pope Paschalis: but that cannot bee: for Paschalis then was not bishop: so that by the computation of time, it should rather seeme to be Gregorie the fourth. This Ethelwulfe (as being himselfe once nuzled in that order) was always good and benoint to holy church and religious orders, in so much that he gaue to them the tith of all his goods and lands in Westsaxons, with liberte and fredome from all seruage and ciuill charges. Whereof his chart instrument beareth testimonie after this tenor proceeding much like to the donation of Ethelbaldus king of Mercians aboue mentioned.

The priuiledges and donations giuen by king Ethelwulfus to the clergie.

Anno 844

Priuiledges & temporalties granted to the church by king Ethelwolfe.

REgnante Domino nostro in perpetuum. Dum in nostris temporibus per bellorum incendia, & direptiones opum nostrarum, nec non & vastantium crudelissimas depræ dationes hostium barbarorum, paganarumq; gentium, multiplices tribulationes ad affligendum vsque ad internecionem, tempora cernimus iucubere periculosa. Ex Flor. hiſtor.

Pro remiſſo.

Note the blind ignorance and erroneous teaching in those daies.

HEereby may it appeare, how when the churches of England began first to be indued with temporalties and lands; also with priuileges and exemptions inlarged: moreouer (and that which speciallie is to be considered and lamented) what pernicious doctrine was this, wherewith they were led, thus to set remission of their sinnes, and remedie of their soules, in this donation and such other deeds of their donation, contrarie to the information of Gods word, and no small derogation to the crosse of Christ?

These things thus done within the realme, then the said Ethelwolfe the king, taking his iourney to Rome with Alfred his youngest sonne, committed him to the bringing vp of pope Leo the fourth, where he also reedified the English schole at Rome: which being founded by king Offa, or rather by Ine king of Mercians (as in the Flowers of histories is affirmed) was lately in the time of king Egbert his father consumed with fire. Further and besides, this king gaue & granted there vnto Rome, of euery fire house a penie to be paid through his whole land, as king Ine in his dominion had done before. Also he graue and granted yeerely to be paid to Rome 300 marks, that is, to the maintenance of the light of S. Peter 100 marks, to the light of S. Paul 100 marks, to the vse of the pope also an other hundred. This done, he returning home through France, married there Judith the daughter of Carolus Calnus, the French king: whom he reloued afterward (contrarie to the lawes of the Westsaxons) to the title and throne of a queene. For before it was decreed among the Westsaxons (by the occasion of wicked Ethelburga, who poisoned Brightricus her olome husband) that after that, no kings wife there should haue the name or place of a queene.

Peter pence graunted to Rome: whose beginning is to be found in this light.

And forsomuch as I haue here entred into the mention of Judith daughter of Carolus Calnus; the occasion thereof pertaineth me in memorie, here to insert by the way a matter done, although not in this realme, yet not impertinent to this ecclesiasticall historie. And first to deduct the narration hereof from the first originall; the father of this Carolus Calnus, whose name was Ludouicus, first of that name, called Pius king of France, had two wiues: whereof by the first he had three sonnes, Lotharie, Pipin, and Lewis. Which three sonnes vnnaturallie & vnkindlie conspiring against their father and his second wife, with her sonne their yongest brother, executed him so, that through a certaine councell of lords spirituall and temporall, they deposed the same their naturall and right godly father, dispossessing and discharging him of all rule and dominion. Moreouer, caused him to renounce his temporall habit, inclosing him in the monasterie of S. Marke, for a monke or rather a prisoner. All which done, they diuided his empire and kingdome among themselues.

Ludouicus Pius emperor, king of France.

Thus was Ludouicus Pius, of impious sorines left desolat. But the power of God, which worketh when as all earthlie power ceaseth, of his diuine mercie so aided and recouered him out of all his tribulation, to his imperiall dignitie again, that it was to all his enimies confusion, and to all good men a miracle. What this by the way. By his second wife, whose name was Judith, he had this Charles the Bald here mentioned. Which Judith was thought and so accused to the pope, to be within such degree of alliance, that by the popes law she might not continue his wife without the popes dispensation. It so fell out in the meane time, that this Ludouicus the emperour, had promoted a young man named Frederike to be bishop of Vtricht; and to him had giuen sad and good exhortation, that he remembring and following the constancie of his predecessours would maintaine right and truth without all exception of any person, and punish misdoers with excommunication, as well the rich as the poore, with such like words of godlie counsell. Frederike hearing the king thus to say, sitting at dinner with him, as the manner was, being nothe inuelled, in these words answered the emperour againe: I thanke your maiestie (saith he) which with your so wholsome exhortation put me in mind of my profession. But I beseech you of your benigne fauour and patience, that I may freelie disclose that which hath long incumbred and pierced my conscience. To whom leaue being giuen, thus he began: I pray you (o lord emperor) to theto me here in your mind (pointing to the filly before him) whether is it more accoding, to attaine this filly here present, beginning first at the head or at the taile? What a tale is this (quoth the emperour) of the taile and of the head? At the head (quoth he.) Then Frederike, taking thereof his occasion, procedeth: Euen so let it be lord emperour (saith he) as you haue said. Let christian faith and charitie first begin with your selfe, as with the head, admonishing you to cease from your lust and erro, that your subiects by your example be not bolsered to follow your misdoing. Wherefore first forsake you your vnlawfull wedlocke, which you haue made with Judith your nere kinswoman. These words of the new bishop, although they moued Ludouicus the emperour not a little; yet he, with a gentle modestie, and modest silence was contented, suffering the bishop to go home in peace. But the words being vttered in such an audience, could not so be concealed, but spred and burst out in much talke in the whole court, and especiallie among the bishops, consulting earnestlie with themselues about the matter. Whereby whole counsell and labour so at length it fell, that the emperour was constrained to leaue the company of his wife, till he had purchased a licence of the bishop of Rome to retaine her againe, who then forgaue the said bishop all that was past. But the woman hired two knights that slue him in his bedments, when he had ended his masse. Ranulphus and Guli. lib. de Pontificib. giue vnto this storie in his great commendation to die a martyr. Whereof I haue not to iudge, nor here to pronounce, but that rather I thinke him to be commended in his dying, then the woman for her killing.

Note, there were two Iudiths, one, the mother of Carolus Calnus, the other his daughter, who first Ethelwolfe did marrie.

Frederike bishop of Utricht iudged of some a martyr.

Example of the woman more readie in reuenge then the man.

And for so much as mention hath beene made of Ludouicus Pius, here is to be noted, that in France then was vsed of priests and churchmen, pretious and shining vestures, and golden and rich skaring girdles, with rings & other ornaments of gold. Wherefore the said Lewis purchased of the bishop of Rome, a correction for all such as vsed such diuine apparell, causing them to weare hoolme and sad colours, according to their sadnesse. Fab.

Of this Lewis the papists doe faine, that because he concurred certaine of their church goods and patrimonie to the wages of his souldiers, his bodie (say they) was caried out of his tombe by diuels, and was no more seene.

And this a little hauing digressed out of our course, now let vs returne out of France into England againe. King Ethelwolfus, who comming now from Rome by the countrie of France, was now returned againe into his owne dominion, where he continued not long after.

Swithinus bishop of Cantorbyrie.

This Ethelwolfus had especiallie about him two bishops, whose counsell he was most ruled by, Swithinus bishop of Winchester, and Adelstanus bishop of Shirebourne. Of the which two, the one was more skilfull in temporall and ciuill affairs touching the kings wars, and filling of his coffers, and other furniture for the king. The other (which was Swithinus) was of a contrarie sort, wholie disposed and inclined to spirituall meditation, and to minister spirituall counsell to the king: who had beene schoolemaster to the king before. Wherein appeared one good condition of this kings nature, among his other vertues, not only in following the precepts and aduertisements of his old schoolemaster: but also in that he like a kind and thankefull pupill did so reuerence his bringer vp, and old schoolemaster (as he called him) that he ceased not, till he made him bishop of Winchester, by the consecration of Welnoth then archbishop of Canturburie. But as concerning the miracles which are read in the church of Winchester, of this Swithinus, them I leaue to be read together with the Iliads of Homer, or tales of Robinhod.

This Gregorie the fourth here in this present chapter aboue mentioned, was the third pope which succeeded after Paschalis the first, being but foure yeeres betwixt them; which Paschalis succeeded after Stephan the fourth, who followed after Leo the third next pope vnto Adrian aboue in our historie mentioned, whereas he intreated of Charles the great. From the time of that Adrian the first, vnto pope Adrian the third, the emperours had some stroke in the election (at least in the confirmation) of the Romane pope. Notwithstanding, diuers of those foresaid popes in the meane time began to worke their practises to bring that purpose about. But yet all their deuices could take no full effect, before the said Adrian the third, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared. So that the emperours all this while bare some rule in chosing the popes, and in assembling generall councels. Wherefore by the commandement of Ludouicus the emperour, in the time of this Gregorie the fourth a generall synod was commanded at Aquisgrane, where it was decreed by the said Gregorie and his assistants: First, that euery church should haue sufficient of his owne proper lands & reuenues, to find the priests therof, that none should nede to lacke or goe about a begging. Item, that none of the clergie of what order or degree soeuer he be, should vse any vesture of any pretious or scarlet colour. Neither shall weare rings on their fingers, vnlesse it be when prelats be at masse, or giue their consecrations. Item, that prelats should not keep to great posts or families, nor keepe great horses, bis dice, or harlots. And the monks should not exceed measure in gluttonie or riot. Item, that none of the clergie, being either anointed or shauen, should vse either gold or siluer in their shoes, slippers, or girdles, like to lacigabalus. By this it may be conieatured, what pompe and pride in those daies was crept into the clergie. Moreouer, by the said pope Gregorie the fourth, at the commandement of Ludouicus emperour, the feast of All saints was first brought into the church.

Pope Sergius the second. When the popes names began first to be altered.

After this pope came Sergius the second, which first brought in the altering of the popes names, because he was named before Os porci, that is, Swines snout: which also ordained the agnus thrice to be sung at the masse, and the host to be diuided into three parts.

After him was pope Leo the fourth, to whom this king Ethelwolfe (as in this present chapter is aboue specified) did commit the tuition of his sonne Alured. By this pope Leo it came in, and was first enacted in a councell of his, that no bishop should be condemned vnder three score and twelue witnesses, according as ye see in the witnesses at the condemnation of Stephan Gardiner, of derke praesised.

Pope Leo the fourth.

Item, contrarie to the lawe of Gregorie the fourth his predecessor, this pope ordained the crosse (all see with gold & pretious stones) to be caried before him, like a pope.

And here next vnto followeth and commeth in the whore of Babylon (rightly in her true colours by the permission of God and manifestlie without all tergiuersation) to appeare to the whole world: and that not onely after the spirituall sense, but after the very letter, and the right forme of an whore in deed. For after this Leo aboue mentioned, the cardinals proceeding to their ordinarie election (after a solemne masse of the holie ghost, to the perpetuall shame of them & of that see) in stead of a man pope, elected an whore in deed to minister sacraments, to say masses, to giue orders, to constitute deacons, priests, and bishops, to promote prelats, to make abbats, to consecrat churches and altars, to haue the reigne and rule of emperors and kings: and so she did in deed, called by name Ione the eight. This womans proper name was Gilberta (a Dutch woman of Magunce) who went with an Englishmonke out of the abbey of Fulda in mans apparell vnto Athens, and after through her dexteritie of wit and learning was promoted to the popedome, where she sat two yeres and sir monethes. At last openly in the face of a generall procession, fell in labor and trauell of child, and so died. By reason whereof, the cardinals yet to this day do auoide to come nere by that street where this shame was taken. By Benedictus the third, who succeded next in the whorish see, was first ordained (as most writers do record) the dirge to be said for the dead. Albeit before him, Gregorie the third had done in that matter worthylie for his part alreadie.

A woman pope called Ione the eight. The church of Rome after 7 yeres vse of the holie ghost crept creep.

Pope Benedictus the third. Dirge for the dead.

After him sate pope Nicholas the first, who inlarged the popes decrees with many constitutions, equalling the authoritie of them with the writings of the apostles. He ordained that no secular prince, nor the emperor himselfe, should be present at their councels, vnlesse in matters concerning the faith: to the end that such as they iudged to be heretikes, they should execute and murther. Also, that no laic men should sit in iudgement vpon the clergie men, or reason vpon the popes power. Item, that no christian magistrat should haue any power vpon any prelat, alleging that a prelat is called god. Item, that all church seruice should be in Latine: yet notwithstanding, dispensing with the Sclauonians and Polonians to retaine still their vulgar language. Sequences in the masse were by him first allowed. By this pope, priests began to be restrained and debarred from marrying: whereof Hulderike bishop of Ausbrough (a learned and an holie man) sending a letter vnto the pope granely and learnedly refuteth and reclaimeth against his indiscreet proceedings touching that matter. The copie of which letter, as I thought it vnworthie to be suppressed, so I iudged it here worthy & meet for the better instruction of the reader to be inserted. The words thereof here follow out of Latine into Englishtranslated.

This marriage of priests hath been to be forbidden.

A learned epistle of Hulderike bishop of Ausbrough, sent to pope Nicholas the first, prooving by probations substantiall, that priests ought not to be restrained from marriage.

Anno 867

A letter written to pope Nicholae concerning priests not to refraine from marriage.

Nicholao domino & patri, pernigili sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ praesuli, Huldericus solo nomine episcopus, amorē ut filius, timorē ut seruus. Cùm tuus (ô pater & domine) decreta super clericorum continentiam, &c. The same in English.

Hulderike bishop onely by name, vnto the reuerend father Nicholas the vigilant prouisor of the holie church of Rome, with due commendation sendeth loue as a sonne, and feare as a seruant. Vnderstanding (reuerend father) your decrees which you sent to me concerning the single life of the clergie, to be far discrepant from all discretion, I was troubled partly with feare, and partly with heauinesse. With feare, for that (as it is said) the sentence of the pastor, whether it be iust or vniust, is to be feared. For I was afraid for the weake hearers of the scripture (which scarslie obey the iust sentence of their pastour) much more despising this vniust decrement, through the onerous and importable transgression of their pastor, should shew themselues disobedient. With heauinesse I was troubled, and with compassion, for that I doubted how the members of the bodie should do, their head being so greatly out of frame. For what can be more grieuous or more to be lamented, touching the state of the church, then for you, being the bishop of the principall see, to whom apperteineth the regiment of the whole church, to swerue neuer so little out of the right way? Certes in this you haue not a little erred, in that you haue gone about to constraine your clergie to singlenesse of life, through your imperious tyrannie: whom rather you ought to stir vp to the continencie of marriage. For is not this to be counted a violence and tyrannie to the iudgement of all wise men, when a man is compelled by your decrees to doe that which is against the institution of the gospell and the proceeding of the Holie ghost? Seeing then there be so many holie examples both of the old and new testament, teaching vs (as you know) due information: I desire your patience not to thinke it grieuous for me to bring a few heere out of many.

Priests marriage in the old law permitted, in the new law not forbidden.

First in the old law, the Lord permitteth marriage vnto the priests, which afterward in the new law we do not reade to be restrained, but in the gospell thus he saith: There be some eunuchs which haue geelded themselues for the kingdome of heauen, but all men do not take this word; he that can take it, let him take it. Wherefore the apostle saith, concerning virgins, I haue no commandement of the Lord, but onlie I giue counsell. Which counsell also all men do not take, as in the commandement of the Lord before; but many there be, false dissemblers and flatterers, going about to please men and not God, whom we see vnder a false pretence of continencie, to fall into horrible wickednes: some to lie with their fathers wiues, some to be Sodomits, & not to abhor to play the beasts with brute beasts. And therefore left through the infection of this wicked pestilence, the state of the church should too much go to ruine: therfore he said, Because of fornication, let euery man haue his owne wife. Touching which saying, our false hypocrits falslie do lie and faine: as though only it pertained to the laitie, and not to them. And yet they themselues seeming to be set in the most holie order, are not afraid to abuse other mens wiues, and as we see (with weeping eies) all they doe outrage in the foresaid wickednesse.

The incommenience of single life.

These men haue not rightlie vnderstood the scripture, whose breests while they sucke so hard in stead of milke they sucke out bloud. For the saying of the apostle: Let euery man haue his owne wife, doth except none in very deed, but him only which hath the gift of continencie, prefixing with himselfe to keepe and to continue his virgin in the Lord. Wherefore (ô reuerend father) it shall be your part to cause and ouer see, that whosoeuer, either with hand or mouth, hath made a vow of continencie, and afterward would forsake, either should be compelled to keepe his vow, or else by lawfull authoritie should be deposed from his order.

The saying of the apostle. Let euery one haue his owne wife.

And to bring this to passe, you shall not only haue me, but also all other of my order, to be helpers vnto you. But that you may vnderstand, that such which know not what a vow doth meane, are not to be violentlie compelled thereunto, heare what the apostle saith to Timothie: A bishop (saith he) must be irreprehensible, the husband of one wife. Which sentence left you should turne and applie onely to the church; marke what he inferreth after: He that knoweth not (saith he) to rule his owne household and familie, how should he rule the church of God? And likewise the deacons (saith he) let them be the husbands of one wife, which haue knowledge to gouerne their owne house and children. And this wife, how she is woont to be bleft of the priest, you vnderstand sufficientlie I suppose, by the decrees of holie Sylueste the pope.

Note well the saying of Augustine.

To these and such other holie sentences of the scripture agreeth also he that is the writer of the rule of the clergie, writing after this maner: A clerke must be chast and continent, or els let him be coupled in the bands of matrimonie, hauing one wife. Whereby it is to be gathered, that the bishop and deacon are noted infamous and reprehensible, if they be diuided in more women then one: otherwise, if they doe forsake one vnder the pretence of religion, both they together, as well the bishop as the deacon be heere condemned by the canonicall sentence, which saith: Let no bishop or priest forsake his owne wife, vnder the colour and pretence of religion. If he do forsake her, let him be excommunicat. And if he so continue, let him be degraded. S. Augustine also (a man of discreet holinesse) saith in these words: There is no offense so great or grieuous, but it is to auoid a greater euill.

What it is to marrie in the Lord.

Furthermore, we reade in the second booke of the tripartite historie: that when the councell of Nice, going about to establish the same decree, would enact that bishops, priests, and deacons, after their conferation, either should abstaine vtterlie from their owne wiues, or els should be deposed; then Paphnutius (one of those holie martyrs, whom the emperor Maximus had put out the right eie, and hocke their left legs) rising vp amongst the, withstood their purposed decrement: confessing marriage to be honorable, and calling the bed of matrimonie to be chastitie, and so persuaded the councell from making that law, declaring thereby what occasion might come to themselues and their wiues of fornication. And thus much did Paphnutius (being vnmaried himselfe) declare vnto them. And the whole councell commending his sentence, gaue place thereto, and left the matter freelie without compulsion, to the will of euery man, to doe therein as he thought.

This decree is contrarie to the bishops and prelats in queene Maries time.

What a virgin is by the definition of the apostle.

Notwithstanding there be some, which take S. Gregorie for their defence in this matter, whose temeritie I laugh at, and ignorance I lament: for they know not, being ignorantlie deceiued, ceiued, how dangerouslie the decree of this heresie was (being made of S. Gregorie) who afterwards well reuoked the same, with condigne fruite of repentance.

For vpon a certeine daie as he sent vnto his fishpond to haue fish, & did see more than six thousand infants heads brought to him, which were taken out of the same pond or more, did greatlie repent in himselfe the decree made before, touching the single life of priests, which he confessed to be the cause of that so lamentable a murther. And so purging the same with condigne fruite of repentance, altered againe the things which he had decreed before, commending that counsell of the Apostle, which saith: It is better to marrie than to burne; adding moreouer of himselfe thereunto, and saying: It is better to marrie than to giue occasion of death.

Those then six thousand heads of infants found in the pope's more than in the wicked decree of the single life of priests. Let priests note well the saying of Gregorie.

Peraduenture if these men had read with me this, which so hapned, I thinke they would not be so rash in their doing and iudging; fearing at least the Lords commandement: Doe not iudge, that you be not iudged. And S. Paul saith, Who art thou that iudgest an other mans seruant? Either he standeth or falleth to his owne master: but he shall stand; for the Lord is mightie and able to make him stand. Therefore let your holines cease to compell and inforce those, whom onelie you ought to admonish, left through your owne priuat commandement (which God forbid) you be found cõtrarie, as well to the old testament, as to the new. For as S. Augustine saith to Donatus, This is onelie that we do feare in your iustice, left (not for the confideration of christian lenitie, but for the greeuousnesse and greatnesse of transgressions committed) you be thought to vse violence in executing punishment of that which onelie we doe desire you (by Christ) not to do. For transgressions are so to be punished, that the life of the transgressors may repent. Also an other saying of Augustine we would you to remember, which is this: Nil nocendi sit cupiditate, omnia consulendi charitate, & nihil fiat immaniter, nihil inhumaniter; that is, Let nothing be done through the greedines of hurting, but all things through the charitie of profiting: neither let any thing be done cruellie, nothing vngentile. Item, of the same Augustine it is written: In the feare and name of Christ I exhort you, which of you soeuer haue not the goods of this world, be not greedie to haue them. Such as haue them, presume not too much vpon them. For I say, to haue them is no damnation; but if you presume vpon them, that is damnation, if for the hauing of them you shall seeme great in your owne sight, or if you do forget the common condition of man through the excellencie of any thing you haue. Vse therefore therein due discretion, tempered with moderation, the which cup of discretion is drawne out of the fountein of the apostolike preaching, which saith: Art thou loose from thy wife? Do not seeke for thy wife. Art thou bound to thy wife? Seeke not to be loosed from hir. Where also it followeth: Such as haue wiues, let them be as though they had them not, and they that vse the world, let them be as not vsing it.

August. ad Donatum.

The absurd dissenting and contradicting of papists.

Item, concerning the Widow, he saith: Let hir marrie to whom she will, onlie in the Lord. To marrie in the Lord, is nothing else but to attempt nothing in contracting of Matrimonie, which the Lord doth forbid. Ieremie also saith: Trust not in the words of lies, saying: The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord. The which saying of Ieremie, Hierome expounding, saith thus: This may agree also, and be applied to such virgins, which brag and vaunt of their virginitie with an impudent face, pretending chastitie, when they haue an euil thing in their cõscience, and know not how the apostle defineth the virgine, that she should be holie in bodie, and also in spirit. For what auaileth the chastitie of the bodie, if the mind inwardlie be defloured? Or if it haue not the other vertues, which the propheticall sermon doth describe. The which vertues, forsomuch as we see partly to be in you, and because we are not ignorant, that this discretion (although neglected in this part, yet in the other actions of your life to be kept honestlie of you) do not despaire, but you will also soone amend the little lacke which is behind. And therefore with as much grauitie as we can, we cease not to call vpon you, to correct and amend this your negligence. For although according to our common calling, a bishop is greater than a priest, yet Austin being lesse then Hierome (notwithstanding the good correction proceeding from the lesser to the greater) was not to be refused or disdained, especiallie when he which is corrected, is found to striue against the truth to please mẽ. For as S. Augustine saith, writing to Bonifface: The disputations of all men, be they neuer so rathe like or approoued persons, ought not to be had in stead of the canonicall scriptures. So that we may displeasure or refuse (sauing the honor & reuerence which is due vnto them) any thing that is in their writings, if any thing there be found cõtrarie to truth. And what can be found more contrarie to the truth then this? When as the truth is selfe, speaking of continencie, not of one onelie, but of all together (the number onlie excepted of them which haue professed continencie) saith: He that can take, let him take: the which saying, these men (mooued, I cannot tell by what occasion) do turne and say: He that cannot take, let him be accursed. And what can be more foolish amõgst men, then whẽ any Bishop or Archdeacon run themselues headlong into all kind of lust, to adulterie & incest, & also sodomitrie? yet shame not to saie, that the chast marriage of priests doth stinke before them: and as void of all compassion of true righteousnesse, doe not desire or admonish their clerks, as their fellow seruants to abstein, but to command them and inforce them as seruants, violentlie to abstein. Vnto the which imperious commandement of theirs or counsell (whether you will call it) they ad also this fooolish & filthie suggestion, saying: that, It is more meet, priuilie to haue to do with many women, then apertlie in the sight and consciences of many men to be bound to one wife. The which truly they would not say, if they were either of him, or in him, which saith: Wo to you Pharisies, which do all things before men. And by the Psalmist: Because they please men, they are confounded, for the Lord hath despised them. Thus be the men, who rather ought to persuade vs that we should shame to sin priuilie in the sight of him, to whom all things be open, then seeme in the sight of men to be cleane. These men therefore, although through their sinfull wickednes deserue no counsell of godlines to be giuen them: yet we not forgetting our humanitie, cease not to giue them counsell by the authoritie of Gods word, which seeketh all mens saluation, desiring them by the bowels of charitie, and saying with the words of scripture: Cast out (thou hypocrite) first the beame out of thine own eie, & then thou shalt see to cast the mote out of the eie of thy brother.

Moreouer, this also we desire them to attend what the Lord saith of the adulterous woman: Which of you that is without sin, let him cast the first stone against her. As though he would say: If Moses bid you, I also bid you. But yet I require you that be the competent ministers and executors of the law, take heed what ye ad thereunto, take heed also (I pray you) what you are your selues: for if (as the scripture saith) thou shalt well consider thy selfe, thou wilt neuer defame or detract another.

Moreouer, it is signified vnto vs also, that some there be of the, which (when they ought like vnto good shepherds to giue their liues for the Lords flock) yet are they puffed vp with such pride, that without all reason they presume to rend and teare the Lords flock with whippings and beatings, whose vnreasonable doings S. Gregorie bewailing, thus saith: Quid fiat de ouibus quando pastores lupi fiunt? that is: What shall become of the sheepe when the pastors themselues be woolues? But who is ouercome but he which exerciseth crueltie? Or who shall iudge the persecutor, but he which gaue patientlie his backe to stripes? And this is the fruite which commeth to the church by such persecutors, also which commeth to the clergie by such despightfull handling of their bishops or rather infidels. For why may you not call them infidels, of whom S. Paul thus speaketh, and writeth to Timothie? that, In the later daies there shall certeine depart from the faith, giue heed to spirits of error and doctrine of diuels, of them that speake false through hypocrise, and hauing their consciences marked with an hote iron, forbidding to marrie, and commanding to abstein from meates, &c. And this is (if it be well marked) the whole hand-full of the darnell and cockell growing amongst the corne: this is the couent of all madnesse, that whiles they of the clergie be compelled to relinquish the companie of their owne lawfull wiues; they become afterward fornicators and adulterers with other women, and wicked ministers of other sinfull filthinesse. These be they which bring into the church of God this heresie (as blind guides leading the blind) that it might be fulfilled which the Psalme speaketh of, as foreseeing the errors of such men, & accursing them after this maner: Let their eies be blinded that they see not, and bow downe alwaies their backe. For so much then (ô apostolical sir) as no man which knoweth you, is ignorant, that if you through the light of your discretion had vnderstood and seene what poisoned pestilence might haue come into the church through the sentence of this your decree, they would neuer haue consented to the suggestions of certaine wicked persons. Wherefore we counsell you by the fidelitie of our due subiection, that with all diligence you would put away so great slander from the church of God: and through your discreet discipline, you will remoue this Pharisaicall doctrine from the flocke of God: so that this onely Sunamite of the Lords (vsing no more adulterous husbands) doe not separate the holie people, and the kinglie priesthood from hir spouse which is Christ, through an vnrecouerable diuorcement: seeing that no man without chastitie (not onlie in the virgins state, but also in the state of matrimonie) shall see our Lord, who with the Father and the Holie Ghost liueth and reigneth for euer, Amen.

Gregorius.

Inuenitur hæc epistola in vetustis membranarum libris (ut fama fert) apud Vrbinates Illyrico in colonia, Veneriis oppidum epistolæ Aeneæ Sylvii, in sua peregrinatione, & Germaniæ descriptione.

¶ By this epistle of bishop Hulderike (aboue prefixed) the matter is plaine (gentle reader) to conceiue what was then the sentence of learned men concerning the marriage of ministers: but that here by the waie, the reader is to be admonished, that this epistle which by error of the writer is referred to pope Nicholas the first, in my mind is rather to be attributed to the name and time of Nicholas the second, or Nicholas the third.

Pope Adrian the second, Iohn the ninth, Martin the second, Adrian the third, Stephan the fift.

After this pope Nicholas succeeded Adrianus the second, Iohannes the ninth, Martinus the second. After these came Adrian the third, Stephan the fift. By this Adrian it was first decreed that no Emperour after that time should intermeddle or haue any thing to do in the election of the Pope. And thus began the Emperours first decaie, and the papacie to swell and rise aloft.

And thus much concerning Romish matters for this time.

Then to returne where we left, touching the storie of king Ethelwulfe. About the latter end of his reigne, the Danes which before had inuaded the realme, in the time of king Egbert, as is aboue declared, now made their reentre againe, with three and thirtie ships arriuing about Hamshire: through the barbarous tyrannie of whom, much bloudshed and murther hapned here among Englishmen. Denseshire, about Dertmouth in Kent, in Essexangle, in Lindsie, at Rochesser, about London, and in Westsex, where Ethelwolfe the king was o uerthrow, besides diuers other kings and dukes, whom the Danes daily approching, in great multitudes, in diuers places had put to flight. At length king Ethelwolfe, with his sonne Ethelbaldus warring against them in Southsexe, at Okley, droue them to the Ile of Whight, where they hunting a spare, after a while past in against with horrible rage and cruelnie, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared, so much as to our purpose shall serue, professing in this historie to write not of matters externe and politike, but onelie pertaining to the church. The cause of this great affliction sent of God vnto this realme thus I found expressed and collected in a certeine old written storie, which hath no name: the words of which writer, for the same cause as he thought to recite them, writing (as he saith) Ad cautelam futurorum, I thought also for the same there not to be omitted, albeit in all parts of his commendation I do not fullie with him accord. The words of the writer be these.

Ex Gulielmo Malmesbiriensi de Gestis Reg. Ang. lib. 2. c. 4.

In Anglorum quidem ecclesia primitiua, religio clarissime resplenduit: ita vt reges & regina, & principes ac duces, comites, & barones, &c. In English thus.

In the primitiue church, saith he, of the Englishmen, religion did most cleerelie shine, in so much that kings, queenes, princes and dukes, consuls, barons, and rulers of churches, incensed with the desire of the kingdome of heauen, labouring and striuing among themselues to enter into monkerie, into voluntarie exile and solitarie life, forsooke all and followed the Lord. Where, in processe of time, all vertue so much decaied among them, that in fraud and trecherie none seemed like vnto them: neither was to them any thing in price or honor, but ciuill war and shedding of innocent bloud. Wherefore almighie God sent vpon them pagan and cruell nations, like swarmes of bees, which neither spared women, nor children, as Danes, Norwegians, Gothes, Suetians, Vandals, and Frisians. Who, from the beginning of the reigne of king Ethelwolfe, till the comming of the Normans, by the space neere of two hundred and thirtie yeers, destroied their fruitfull land of the one side of the sea to the other, from man also to beast. For why? They inuading England eft times, of euerie side, were not about to subdue and possesse it, but onely to spoile and destroy it. And if it hed chanced them at any time to be ouercome of Englishmen, it auailed nothing, when as other swarmes still with greater power in other places were ready, vpon a bidden and vnawares, to approch vpon them, &c. Historia Curiosa.

The cause of Gods wrath, why the people of England was ouerthrowen by the Danes.

Thus far haue you the words of mine author, declaring the cause which prouoked Gods anger: wherevnto may be adioined the testimonie, not onelie of them but of their forefathers also before them, who falselie breaking the faith and promisse made with the Britains, did cruellie murther their nobles, wickedlie oppressed their commons, inhumanlie persecuted the innocent christians, iniuriouslie possessed their land and habitation: chasing the inhabitants out of house and countrie, bedded the violent murther of the monks of Bangor, and diuers soule slaughters among the poor Britains, who sent for them to be their helpers. Wherefore Gods iust recompense falling vpon them from that time, neuer suffered them to be quiet from forren enimies, till the comming of William the Norman, &c.

Moreouer, concerning the outward occasions giuen of the Englishmens parts, meaning the Danes first to inuade the realme, I find in certeine stories two most especiallie aggraued. The one vniustlie giuen, and iniustlie taken. The other not giuen iustlie, and vniustlie taken. Of the which two, the first was giuen in Northumberland by meanes of Offaright reigning vnder king of Westsaxons, in the north parts. This Offaright vpon a time comming to the court, and finding there the bodie of one of his nephues called Burr. Who hauing at home a wife of great beautie, she being absent abrode the king after his manner, allured with the excellencie of her beautie, tooke her to a secret chamber, where he forceable contrarie to her will did rauish her: wherevpon she being greatlie displeased, and vered in her mind made them an vow to her selfe neuer returning. At this his silence in nature received. Mater ansuleting with his friends, first went to the king, resigning into his hands all such seruice and possessions which he did hold of him: that done, take shipping and sailed into Denmarke, where he had great friends, and had his beginning no before. There making his mone to Godwin the lord, desired his aid in reuenging of the great villanie of Offaright against him and his wife. Godwinus hearing this, was glad to haue some iust quarrell to enter that land, leuied an armie with all speed; and preparing all things necessarie for the same, sendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren, his chiefe captains, with an innumerable multitude of Danes into England; who first arriuing at Holdernesse, there burnt vp the countrie, and killed without mercie, both men, women and children, whom they could lay hands vpon. Then marching toward Yorke, entred their battell with the foresaid Offaright, where he with the most part of his armie was slaine. And so the Danes entred the possession of the citie of Yorke. Some others say, and is by the most part of those writers recorded, that the chiefe cause of the comming of Inguar and Hubba with the Danes, was to reuenge king Edmund reigning vnder the Westsaxons ouer the Estsaxingles in Northfolke and Suffolke: for the murthering of a certeine Dane being father to Inguar and Hubba, which was falslie imputed to king Edmund. The storie is thus told.

Another cause of the comming of the Danes.

K. Edmund king of Estsaxingles.

A certeine noble man of the Danes of the kings stocke called Lothbroke father to Inguar and Hubba, entring vpon a time with his hauke into a certeine schaffe of cockebote alone; by chance through tempest was driuen with his hauke to the coast of Northfolke named Redham, where he being found and beriended, was presented to the king. The king vnderstanding his parentage, and seeing his cast, entertained him in his court accordingle, and exercise day more and more perceiuing his actiuities and great dexteritie in hunting and hauking, bare speciall fauour vnto him. In so much that the kings falconer, or master of his game, bearing priuie enuie against him, secretlie as they were hunting together in a wood, did murther him, and thrust him in a bush. The Lothbroke, being missed, within two or three daies began to be missed in the kings house: of whom no tidings could be heard, but onelie by a dog or spaniell of his, which continuing in the wood with the corps of his master, at sundrie times came y fawned vpon the king: so long that at the length they following the trace of y hound, were brought to the place where Lothbroke lay. Wherevpon inquisition being made, at length by certeine circumstances of words and other endeuors, it was knowne how and by whom he was murthered, that was by the kings huntsman named Ecrike. Who thereupon being conuicted, was set into the same hole of Lothbroke, alone and without any tackling to draw by from either to be saued by the tether, or to be bestowed in the brege. And as it chanced Lothbroke from Denmarke to be driuen to Northfolke, so it hapned that from Northfolke he was carried into Denmarke, where the sote of Lothbroke being well knowne, hands were laid vpon him, and inquisition made of the parcle. In fine to his torments, to saue himself he vttered an vtterith of king Edmund, saying, that he is ng had put him to death in the countie of Northfolke. Whereupon grudge first was conceiued, then an armie appointed, and great multitudes sent into England to reuenge that fact, where first they arriuing in Northumberland, deuested (as is said) those parts first. From thence sailing into Northfolke they exercise the like tyrannie there, vpon the inhabitants thereof, especiallie vpon the innocent prince, and blessed martyr of God, king Edmund. Concerning the farther declaration whereof hereafter shall follow (Christ our Lord so permitting) more to be spoken, as place and obseruation of time and peeres shall require.

In the meane season, king Ethelwolfe in this chapter here presentlie touched, when he had chased the foresaid Danes (as is aboue rehearsed) from place to place, causing them to take the sea, he in the meane while departeth himselfe both from land and like: leauing behind him foure sonnes, which reigned euerie one in his order, after the decease of their father. The names of whom were Ethelbaldus, Ethelrightius, Etheredus, and Alured.

King Ethelbald.

KIng Ethelbald the eldest sonne of Ethelwolfe, succeeding his father in the prouince of Westsax, and Ethelbright in the prouince of Kent, reigned both together the terme of fiue peeres. one with the other. Of the which two, Ethelbald the first left this infamie behind him in stories, for marrying and lying with his stepmother, wife to his owne father, named Iudith. After these two succeeded Etheldred, the third sonne, who in his time was to incumbred with the Danes, bursting in on o uer the Estsaxingles about Yorke (which they then spoiled and burnt vp) that he in one yeere had in nine battels against them, with the helpe of Alured his brother. In the beginning of this kings reigne, the Danes landed in east England, o Northfolke and Suffolke. But (as Fabian writeth) they were compelled to forsake that countrie, and so take againe shipping, and sailed northward, and landed in Northumberland: where they were met of the kings then there reigning, called Osbright and Ella, which gaue to them a strong fight. But notwithstanding the Danes, with the helpe of such as inhabited the countrie, wan the citie of Yorke, and held a certeine season, as is aboue fore touched.

Duke Etheldred slaine.

Osbright king of Northumberland.

Ex Gulielmo Malmesbiriensi. Ex historia Roudensi. Ex Fabiano & alijs.

In the reigne of this Etheldred, the Northumberlanders rebelling against the king, thought to recouer again the former state of their kingdome out of the Westsaxons hand. By reason of which discord (as hapneth in all lands where dissention is) the strength of the English nation was thereby not a little weakened, and the Danes the more thereby prouailed.

Civil discord both in a commen wealth.

About the latter time of the reigne of this Etheldred, which was about the peare of our Lord 870, certeine of the foresaid Danes being thus possessed of the north countrie: after their cruell persecution and murther done there (as parte is touched before) take shipping from thence, intending to saile toward the Estsaxingles, who by the way vpon the sea met with a fleet of Danes: whereof the captains or leaders were named Inguar and Hubba. Who ioining all together in one counsell, made all one course,, and lastlie landed in east England, o Northfolke, and in processe of time came to Thetford. Thereof hearing Edmund, then vnder-king of that province, assembled an host that gaue to them battell. But Edmund and his company was forced to forsake the field, and the king with a few persons fled vnto the castell of Framingham, whom the Danes pursued. But he in short wise after prepared himselfe to the persecution of the Danes: answering in this maner to the messenger, that told him in the name of Inguar prince of the Danes; which most victoriouslie (saith he) was come with innumerable legions, subduing both by sea and land many nations vnto him: and so now arriued in those parts, requireth him likewise to submit himselfe, yeelding to him his kingdome, treasures, and such other goods of his ancestors, and so to reigne vnder him: which thing if he would not do, he should (said he) be iudged by vnstable both of life and reigne. Edmund hearing this proud message of the pagan, conflicted with certeine of his friends: and am nigst others, with one of his bishops, being then his secretarie, who seeing the present danger of the king, gaue him counsell to yeeld to the conditions. Vpon this the king pausing a little with himselfe, at length rendred this answer: bidding the messenger go to tell his lord in these words, that Edmund a christian king, for the loue of temporall life, will not submit himselfe to a pagan duke, vnles he before would be a christian. Ine nstinent vpon the same, the wicked and craftie Dane approching in mail hastie speed vpon the king, incountred with him in battell (as some say) at Thetford: where the king being put to the worse, and pitying the terrible slaughter of his men, thinking with himselfe rather to submit his glorie perforce to danger, then his people should be slaine, did flie (as Fabian saith) to the castell of Framingham, o (as mine author writeth) to Halesdon, now called S. Edmundsburie, where this blessed man, being on euerie side compassed of his cruell enimies, yeelded himselfe to their persecution. And for that he would not renie ve Christ and his lawes, they therefore most cruellie bounde him vnto a tree, and caused him to be shot to death: and lastlie caused his head to be smitten from his bodie, and cast into the thicke bushes. Which head and bodie at the same time was by his friends taken vp, and solemnlie buried at the said Halesdon, otherwise now named S. Edmundsburie. Whose brother named Edwoldus (notwithstanding of right the kingdome fell next vnto him) for the great feare and displeasure of the world, became an heremit at the abbeie of Crowm, in the countrie of Dorset.

Another battell fought with the Danes at Merton.

What diuers and rebellious sorts in a realme.

The death of Ethelred.

The abbeie of Bredtford founded.

After this, the Danes yet reassembled their people, and gathered a new host, to that within fifteene daies they met at Wallingstoke, and there gaue battell vnto the king, and had the better. Then the king againe gathered his men, which at that field were dispatched and with fresh soldiours further accompanied, met the Danes within two moneths after at the towne of Merton, where he gaue them a sharp battell: so that much people were slaine as well of the christians, as of the Danes, but in the end the Danes had the honour of the field, and king Ethelred there was wounded, and therefore faine to saue himselfe.

After these two fields thus wonne by the Danes, they obteined great circuit of ground, and destroied man and child that would not yeeld to them. And churches and temples they turned to the vse of stables, and other vile occupations.

Thus the king beset with enemies on euerie sore, seeing the land so miserablie oppressed of the Danes, his knights and soudiors consumed, his owne land of Westsaxons in such desolation, he being also wounded himselfe, but specialle for that he sending his commissions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and Estsaxingles, could haue of them but sm all or little comfort (because they though wicked rebellion were more willing to take the part of the Danes then of their king) was for perplexed therewithall, as the other kings were both before him and after him, at that time. So that, as Palmesburie witneseth Magis optarent honestum exitium, quam tam acerbum inperium: that is, They rather wished honestie to die, then with such trouble and sorrow to reigne. And thus this king not long after deceassed, when he had reigned (as Fabian saith) eight yeares. o as Palmesburie writeth, but fiue yeares. During which time of his reigne, notwithstanding his so great troubles and veratians in martiall affaires (as is in some stories mentioned) he founded the house o college of canons at Breeder, and was buried at the abbeie of Wilborne o Wilborne. After whose decease, for lacke of issue of his bodie, the rule of the land fell vnto his brother Alured.

¶ King Alured, otherwise called Alfred.

AMong the Saxon kings hitherto in this storie afore mentioned, I find few o none to be preferred (o almost to be compared) vnto this Alured o Alfred, for the great and singular qualities in this king, worthie of high renowme and commendation: whether we behold in him the valiant acts and manifold trauels, which he continuallie from time to time sustained against his enimies in warre, during almost all the time of his reigne for the publike preseruation of his people: o whether we consider in him his godlie and excellent vertues, ioined with a publike and tender care, and a zealous studie for the common peace and tranquillitie of the weale publike: appearing as well in his prudent lawes by him both carefullie set forth, e with the like care executed; as also by his own priuat exercises touching the vertuous institution of his life: o whether we respect that in him, which with equall praise matched with both the other before: that is, his notable knowledge of godletters, with a feruent loue and princelie desire to set forth the same through all his realme, before his time both rude and barbarous. All which his heroicall properties, ioined together in one prince as it is a thing most rare, and seldome seene in princes now adaies: so I thought the same the more to be noted and remplified in this good king. Thereby either to moue all rulers and princes in the e our dai s, to his imitation, o els to shew them what hath been in times past in their ancestors which ought to be e pet is not found in them. Wherfore of these three parts to discourse either part in order first we will cater to intreat of his acts and paines all trauels sustained in defence of the realme publike, against the ragings and furies of the Danes, as they be described in the Latine histories of Roger Houeden, and Huntington: whom Fabian also followeth in this pt somewhat to fool o. King Alfred therefore, the first of all the English kings, taking his creation and vnction at Rome of pope Leo (as by timeburie and Polychronicon do record) in the beginning of his reigne, perceiuing his lands and people miserablie vexed and defaced, by the reason of the great hoars of Danes, he led had against the Danes: pet as well as he could, gathered a strength of men vnto him, and in the second moneth that he was in the king he met with the Danes beside Wilton, where he gaue to them battell. But being far ouermatched, though the multitude of the enimies part, was put there to the worse: although not without a great slaughter of the pagan armie. Which a time then of the Danes, after that hoars of Danes had dom, where they abode all that winter. Where Halden their king, taking truce with Burthred king of Mercians, the next yeare following boided those parts, and drew to Lindsey, in robbing and spoiling the townes and villages as they went, and holding the common people under their seruage. From thence after to Repingdon, where they winning with the three other kings of the Danes (called Sidrolfum, Osketell, and Harmund) drew thereby in mightie force and strength. Who then dividing their armie in two parts, the one halfe remained with Halden in the countrie of Northumberland: the residue were with the other three kings, wintering & soiourning all the next yeare at Granebridge, which was the fourth yeare of king Alfred. In the which yeare king Alfred his men had a conflict on the sea with fiue of the Danes ships, of which one they take, the other fled away. In this yeare went Rollo the Dane into Normandie, where he was duke thirtie yeares, and afterward was baptised in the faith of Christ, and named Robert. The foresaid armie of the three Dane kings aboue mentioned from Granebridge returned againe to Westfarorie, and entred the castell of Marcham: where Alfred with a sufficient power of men was readie to assault them. But the Danes seeing his strength, durst not attempt with him, but sought delaies, whilest more aid might come. In the meane season they were constrained to intreat for truce: leauing also sufficient pledges in the kings hand, promising moreouer vpon their oth, to auoid the countrie of the Westsaxons. The king vpon the fauorite let them go. But they falselie breaking their league, priuilie in the night brake out, taking their iourney toward Exceter. In which iourney, they lost fiue score of their small ships, by a tempest at Sandwich (as Henrie Huntington in his storie recordeth.) Then king Alfred followed after the horsemen of the Danes, but could not ouertake them before they came to Exceter, where he take of them pledges and faire promises of peace, and so returned. Notwithstanding the number of the pagans did dailie more and more increase, in so much (as one of my authors saith) that if in one day thirtie thousand of them were slaine, thostlie after they increased double as manie againe. After this truce taken with king Alfred, the Danes then boided to the land of Mercia, whereof part of that kingdome they kept themselues, part they committed to one Ceolulphus: vpon condition that he should be vassall to them, and at their commandement, with his people at all times.

Rollo a Dane made duke of Normandie.

Anno 879

The next yeare insuing, which was the seuenth yeare of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes, who now hauing all the rule of the north part of England, from the riuer of Thames, with Mercia, London, and Oxford; disdained that Alfred should beare anie dominion on the other side of Thames southward. Whereupon the foresaid three kings with all the forces and strength they could make, marched toward Chippenham in Wiltshire, with such a multitude, that the king with his people was not able to resist them. In so much that the people which inhabited there, some fled ouer the sea, some remained with the king, diuers submitted themselues to the Danes. Thus Alfred being ouerset with multitude of enemies, and forsaken of his people, hauing neither land to hold, nor hope to recouer that which he had lost, withdrew himselfe with a few of his nobles about him into a certeine woodcountrie in Sommersetshire, called Sthelinge: where he had right scant to liue with, but such as he and his people might purchase by hunting and fishing. This Sthelinge or Stheling, or Sthelingsey, standeth in a great marsh or more, so that there is no accesse vnto it without ship or bote: and hath in it a great wood called Selwood, and in the middle a little plaine, about two acres of ground, in which He is venison, and other wild beasts, with fern & rushes great plentie. In this wood, king Alfred at his first comming, espied a certeine desert cotage of a poore swineherd, keeping swine in the wood, named Dunwolphus: of whom the king then vnknowne was intertained and cherished, with such poore fare as he and his wife could make him. For the which, king Alfred afterward set the poore swineherd to learning, and made him bishop of Winchester.

King Alfred withdraweth himself into Sthelinge.

Sthelinge, which is in deede, as it were, an Ile of nobles.

A Swineherd made bishop of Winchester.

In the meane season, while king Alfred accompanied with a feaw, was thus in the desert wood, waiting the euent of these miseries, certeine stories record of a poore begger, which there came and asked his almes of the king. And the night following he appeared to the king in his sleepe: saying, his name was Cuthert, promising (as sent from God vnto him for his good charitie) great victories against the Danes. But to let these dreaming fables passe, although they be testified by diuers authors, as both Wilhelmus li. de reg. Polychronicon, Rog. Houeden, Iornalensis, and others more. Notwithstanding the king in processe of time was strengthened & comforted more, though the prouidence of God: respecting the miserable ruine of the Englishmen. First the brother of king Halden the Dane beeing remembred, comming in with three and thirtie ships, landed about Deuonshire: where by chance being resisted by a busshment of king Alfreds men (who for their safegard there laie in garrison) were slaine to the number of 1300 men, and their ensigne called the rauen was taken. Houedenus in his booke of Continuations writeth, that in the same conflict both Ingmar and Hubba were slaine among the other Danes. After this, king Alfred being better cheared, shewed himselfe more at large; so that dailie resorted to him men of Wiltshire, Sommersetshire, and Hamshire, till that he was stronglie accompanied.

Hunt. Huntingd. lib. 5. de Hist. Angl.

Ingmar and Hubba slaine.

A bold aduenture of king Alfred, venturing himselfe into the tents of the Danes.

Then the king put himselfe in a bold and dangerous venture, as writeth Wilhelmus lib. de reg. Polychron, and Fabian, which followed them both. For he apparelling him in the habit of a minstrell (as he was verie skilfull in all Saxon poems) with his instrument of musike entered into the tents of the Danes, lying then at Odendune: and in shewing there his interlude and songs, espied all their sloth and wickednesse, and heard much of their counsell: and after returning to his companie, declared vnto them the whole manner of the Danes. Shortlie vpon the same, the king suddenlie in the night fell vpon the foresaid Danes, and distressed and slue of them a great multitude, chased them frō that coast. In so much that through his strong and valiant assaults vpon his enemies, out of his tower of Edeling neuer fortified, he so incombered them, that he clearlie voided the countrie of them, betweene that and Selwood. His valiants exhaces, hearing of these his valiant victories & manfull deeds, drew to him dailie out of all coasts. Who through the helpe of God, and their assistance, held the Danes so short, that he wonne from them Winchester and diuers other good townes. Wherelie, at length he forced them to seeke for peace: the which was concluded vpon certeine conuenants. Whereof one and the principall was, that the forenamed Gutrum their king should be christened. The other was, that such as would not be christened, should depart and void the countrie.

Ex Fabiano.

Gutrum the prince of the Danes was christened.

Upon these couenants, first the said Gutrum the Danish prince (comming to Winchester, was there christened) with twentie of his greatest dukes & nobles. To the which Gutrum king Alfred being his godfather at his baptisme, named him Athelstan. Who after a certeine season that he had stalled the said Danes, he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto their king the countrie of Saffanglia, containing Northfolke and Suffolke, and part of Cambridgeshire. Moreouer (as saith Polychronicon) he granted to the Danes that were christened, the countrie of Northumberland. So the residue that would not be christened, departed the land, and sailed into France: where, what veration and harme they wrought, the chronicles of France doe partlie comprehend.

King Athelstan named Athulphus.

Northfolke and Southfolke granted to king Gutrum.

King Athelstan thus hauing the possession of these countries, had all Saffanglies vnder his obedience. And albeit that he held the said prouince as in fee of the king, and promised to diuell there as his liege man: yet that notwithstanding, he continued more like a tyrant, by the terme of eleuen yeares, and died in the twelfth yeare. During the which space, king Alfred hauing some more rest and peace, repaired certaine townes and strong holds alone by the Danes impaired. Also he builded diuers houses of religion, as the house of nuns at Shaftesburie. An other religious house at Etheling he founded. Item an other in Winchester, named the new monasterie. Item he induced richlie the church of S. Cuthert in Durham. He sent also to India to paie and perfourme his vowes to S. Thomas of Inde, which he made during the time of his distresse against the Danes.

The nunnerie of Shaftesburie builded.

The new minster at Winchester besieged of the Danes.

About the seuenth yeare of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes returning from France to England, landed in Kent, and so came to Rochester, and besieged that citie: and there laie so long, that they builded a tower of timber against the gates of the citie. But by strength of the citizens, that tower was destroied, and the citie defended, till king Alfred came and rescued them. Whereby the Danes were so distressed, and so sore trapped, that for feare they left their horses behind them, and fled to their ships by night. But the king when he was thereof ware, sent after them and take fiftene of their ships, and slue manie of the said Danes. This done, the king returned to London, and repaired the same honorablie (as saith Houedenus) and made it habitable, which before was lore decaied & forbid by the Danes.

The godlie petition of king Alfred.

The third yeare after this, which was the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of king Alfred, the foresaid Athelstan the Danish king of Northfolke (which by Alfred was christened before) deceased. Not long after this, about the one and twentith yeare of this kings reigne, the Danes against landed in foure places of this land: (which was, in Saffanglia, in the North, and in the West, in two places. Before the landing of these Danes, it chanced king Alfred, hearing of the death of king Athelstan and of other complaints of the Danes, was then in Saffanglād, when these tidings came to him.

Anno 892

The Danes driuen from Northfolke.

When king Alfred was herof aduertised, forsomuch as some of the Danes were landed in that coast, thinking with themselues the further they went in their parties, the lesse resistance to haue, and the more spoil, as they were wont to haue before: Alfred therefore sending messengers in all hast to Ethelred duke of Mercia, to assemble to him an host, to withstand the Danes which landed in the West, made forth toward his enemies there, where he was in Saffanglia, whom he pursued so sharplie, that he brake them out from their parties. They then landed in Kent, whither the king with his people sped him, & in like maner draue the Danes frō thence, without anie great fight, so farre as in our authors we can see. After this this, againe the Danes take shipping, and sailed into Northwales, and there robbed and spoiled the Britains, and from thence returned by the sea into Saffanglia, with an hundred ships, and there reised them, for so much as the king then was gone Westward.

The Danes repaire again to Northwales.

The Danes flie out of Exeter.

The fourth host of the Danes the same yeare came to Exceter, which at length they wonne, but then the countrie adioining, pressed so sore vpon them, and besieged them so long, keeping themselues within the citie, that at length they gaue ouer the towne, and went about by Northwales to Northumberland, which was about the three and twentith yeare of king Alfred: Which Alfred in the meane while with his host sped him thitherward. Then the Danes, leauing their strong holds and castels, garnished with men and victell, take againe shipping, and set their course in such wise that they landed in Sussex, and so came to the port of Lewes: and from thence toward London, and builded a tower or castell there vnto the riuer of Lute, twentie miles from London. But the Londoners hearing thereof, manned out a certaine number of men of armes, who with the assistance of them of that countrie, put the Danes from that tower, and after beat it downe to the ground. Some after the king came downe thither, and to preuent the dangers that might ishue, commanded the riuer of Lute to be diuided in three streames: so that where a ship might saile in times before, there a little bote might scantlie row. From thence the Danes, leauing their ships and wiues, were forced to flie that countrie, & take their way againe toward Wales, & came to Quadrize neere to the riuer of Seuerne. Where, vpon the borders thereof, they builded them a castell, there resting themselues for a time, vpon the king ecckones with his armie pursued. In the meane time, the Londoners at Lute tawe the Danes ships, some of them they brought to London, the rest they fired. During all these three yeares, from the first comming of the Danes to Lute, England was afflicted with three manner of sorowes: with the Danes, with the pestilence of men, and more sore of beasts. The which troubles notwithstanding, yet the king manfully resisted the malice of his enemies, and thanked God allwaies, what trouble soeuer fell to him, & into his realme, and susteined it with great patience and humilitie. These three yeares ouerpast, the next yeare following, which was the eight and twentith of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes diuided their host, of whom part went to Northumberland, some to Northfolke, part sailed ouer to France, some others came to Wessex, where they had diuers conflicts with the Englishmen, both by land, and especially vpon the sea: of whom some were slaine, many by shipwracke perished, diuers other were taken and hanged, and thirtie of their ships were taken.

Not long after this, king Alfred, when he had reigned nine and twentie yeares and six monethes, changed this mortall life. And thus much (and more peraduenture than will seeme to this our ecclesiasticall storie apperteining) touching the painfull labours and trauels of this good king: which he no lesse valiantlie atchieued, then patientlie susteined, for the necessarie defence of his realme and subiects.

Now, if there be any prince, who liketh to see and follow the vertuous and godlie disposition of this king, both touching the institution of his owne life, and also concerning his carefull gouernement of the commonweale, thus the histories of him do record. That at what time he being young, perceiued himselfe somewhat disposed to the vice of the flesh, and thereby letted from many vertuous purposes, did not as many young princes and kings somnes in the world be now wont to doo, that is, to resolue themselues into all kind of carnall licence, and dissolute sensualitie, running and following without bridle whither soeuer their licence giuen doth leade them, as therefore not without cause the common prouerbe reporteth of them, that kings somnes learne nothing well els, but onlie to ride. Speaming thereby, that princes & kings somnes hauing about them flatterers, which bolster them in their faults, onely their horses giue to them no more then to any other: but if they sit not fast, they will cast them. But this young king, seeing in himselfe the inclination of his sleshlie nature, minding not to giue himselfe so much as he might take, but rather by resistance to auoid the tentation thereof, belought God that he would send to him some continuall sickneslie, in quenching of that vice, whereby he might be more prostitable to the publike businesse of the commonwealth, and more apt to serue God in his calling. Cestren. lib. 5. cap. 1. Fab. cap. 17.

Then at Gods ordinance, he had the cuill called Ficus, till he came to the age of twentie yeares, whereof at length he was cured: as is laid in some stories by the virgin called Modwen, an Irish woman. After this sickneslie being taken away, to him fell an other, which continued with him from the twentith yeare of his age, to fortie and fiue (according to his olone petition and request made vnto God) whereby he was the more reclamed and attempered from other more great incommeniences, and lesse disposed to that which he did most abhore.

at the towne of Greglade, which afterward was called Kirkelade, the other for Latine, which place was then called Latinlade, afterward Lethelade neere to Oxford.

But howsoeuer it chanced that the knowledge and studie of good letters being once planted in this realme, afterward went to decay: yet king Alfred deserueth no little praise, for restoring or rather increasing the same. After whose time they haue euer since continued, albeit not continuallie through euerie age in like perfection. But this we may see, what it is to haue a prince learned himselfe, who seeing and tasting the price and value of science and knowledge, is thereby not onely the more apt to rule, but also to instruct and frame his subiects, from a rude barbaritie, to a more ciuill congruence of life, and to a better vnderstanding of things: as we see in this famous prince to happen. Concerning whose first education and bringing vp, although it was somewhat late before he entred any letter: yet sith was the apt towardnesse and docilitie of his nature, that being a child, he had the Saxon poems (such as were vsed then in his owne tongue) by heart & memorie. Who afterwards with yeares and time greiw vp in such perfection of learning and knowledge, in so much that (as mine author saith) Nullus Anglorum fuerit vel intelligendo acutior, vel interpretando elegantior. The which thing in him the more was to be maruelled, for that he was twelue yeares of age before he knew any letter. Then his mother, carefull and tender ouer him, hauing by chance a booke in her hand, which he would faine haue, promised to giue him the same, so that he would learne it. Whereupon he for greedinesse of the booke, first one learned the letters, hauing to his schoolemaster Pleimundus, after bishop of Canturburie. And so daily greiw he more and more in knowledge, that at length, as mine author saith: Plurimam partem Romanæ bibliothecæ Anglorum auribus dedit, optimam prædam peregrinarum mercium ciuium vsibus conuertens, that is: A great part of the Latine librairie he translated into English, conuerting to the vses of his citizens a notable preie of forrein ware and merchandize, &c. Of which bookes by him and through him translated, was Orosius, Pastorale Gregorij, the historie of Beda, Boetius de consolatione philosophiæ. Also a booke of his owne making & in his owne tongue, which in the English speech he called A handbooke, in Greeke called it Enchiridion, in Latin A manuell. Besides the historie of Beda translated into the Saxons tongue, he also himselfe compiled a storie in the same speech, called The storie of Alfred, &c. which both bookes in the Saxons tongue I haue seene, though the language I doe not vnderstand. And as he was learned himselfe excellentlie well, so likewise did he inflame all his countrimen to the loue of liberall letters, as the words of the storie reporteth: Illos præmijs, hos minis hortando, neminem illiteratum ad quamlibet curiæ dignitatem aspirare permittens: that is: He exhorted and stirred his people to the studie of learning, some with gifts, some by threats, suffering no man to aspire to any dignitie in the court, except he were learned. Moreouer an other storie thus saith, speaking of his nobles: Optimates quoque suos ad literaturam addiscendam in tantum prouocauit, vt sibi filios suos, vel saltem si filios non haberent, seruos suos literis commendarent, that is: Also his nobles so much he did allure to the imbracing of good letters, that they set all their sonnes to schole: or if they had no sonnes, yet their seruants they caused to be learned. Whereby the common prouerb may be found not so common as true; Such as is the prince, such be the subiects. He began moreouer to translate the psalter in English, and had almost finished the same, had not death preuented him. Guliel. de regib. Angl. In the prologue of the booke intituled Pastorale Gregorij, thus he writeth: declaring the cause why he was so earnest and diligent in translating good bookes from Latine into English, shewing the cause therof why he so did, as followeth: Quòd ecclesiæ in quibus innumeræ priscæ bibliothecæ continebantur, cum libris à Danis incensæ sint: quódque in tota insula studium literarum ita abolitum esset, vt quisque minùs timeret capitis periculum, quàm studiorum exercitia adire. Quapropter se in hoc Anglis suis consulere, &c. that is; The cause was, for that innumerable ancient libraries, which were kept in churches, were consumed with fire by the Danes: and that men had rather suffer perill of their life, than to follow the exercises of studies: and therefore he thought thereby to prouide before for the people of the English nation, &c.

It is told of him both in Polychronicon, Palmesburie, Iornalensis, and other stories more, whereof I haue no names, that he seeing his countrie (namelie Westsaxon) to be so destitute of schooles and learning, partlie to profit himselfe, partlie to furnish his countrie and subiects with better knowledge, first sent for Grimbaldus a learned monke out of France, to come into England. Also he sent for an other learned man out from the parts of Wales, whose name was Asserius, whom he made bishop of Shirebourne. Item out of Mercia, he sent for Werefrithus, bishop of Worcester, to whom he put the dialogues of Gregorie to be translated. But chiefelie he vsed the counsell of Neotus, who then was counted for an holie man, and abbot of a certaine monasterie in Cornewall. By the aduisement of which Neotus, he sent for these learned men aboue Relatum est apostolatui nostro, quòd opus Dionysij Areopagitæ, quod de diuinis nominibus, & de coelestibus ordinibus, Græco descripsit eloquio, quidam vir Ioannes (genere Scotus) nuper transtulit in Latinum. Quod, iuxta morem ecclesiæ, nobis mitti, & nostro iudicio debuit approbari: præsertim quum idem Ioannes (licèt multæ scientiæ esse prædicetur) olim non fuisse sapere, in quibusdam frequenti rumore dicatur, &c. That is: Relation hath béene made vnto our apostleship that a certaine man called Johannes a Scotish man, hath translated the booke of Dionysius the Areopagit, of the names of God, and of the heauenlie orders, from Greeke into Latin. Which booke, according to the custome of the church, ought first to haue béen approued by our iudgement: namelie, seeing the said John (albeit he be said to be a man of great learning and science) in time past hath béene noted by common rumor to haue béene a man not of vpright or sound doctrine, in certaine points, &c. For this cause, the said Scotus being constrained to remoue from France, came into Engeland, allured (as some testifie) by the letters of Alured or Alfred, of whom he was with great fauour entertained, and conuersant a great space about the king, till at length (whether before or after the death of the king it is vncertaine) he went to Malmesburie, where he taught certaine schollers a few yeeres, by the which schollers at last most impiously he was murthered and slaine with their penknifes, and so died, as stories say, a martyr, buried at the said monasterie of Malmesburie with this epitaph.

Being Alfred hauing these helps of learned men about him & no lesse learned also himselfe, past ouer his time not onely to great vtilitie and profit of his subiects, but also to a rare & profitable example of other christian kings and princes for them to follow. This foresaid Alfred had by his wife called Ethelwitha two sonnes: Edward and Ethelward: and three daughters, Elfleda, Ethelgoza, and Ethelguida: Quas omnes liberalibus fecit artibus erudiri; that is, Whom he set all to their bookes and studie of liberall arts, as my storie testifieth. First, Edward his eldest sonne succeeded him in the kingdome: the second sonne Ethelward died before his father: Ethelgoza his middle daughter was made a nun, the other two were maried, the one in Mercelande, the other to the ere of Flanders. Thus king Alfred the valiant, vertuous and learned prince, after he had thus christianlie gouerned the realme the terme of nine and twentie yeeres and fiue monethes, departed this life, 5. kal. Nou. and lieth buried at Winchester, Anno Dom. 901. Of whom this I find moreouer great lie noted and commended in histozie, and not here to be forgotten, for the rare example therof touching this Alfred, that wheresoeuer he was, or whither soeuer he went, he bare alwaies about him in his bosome or pocket a little booke containing the psalmes of Dauid, and certaine other psalms of his owne collecting. Wherevpon he was continuallie reading or praying whatsoeuer he was otherwise vacant, hauing leisure thereunto. Finallie, that where the vertues of this famous king, this little table heere vnder written, which is left in ancient writing in the remembrance of his worthie and memorable life, doth sufficientlie in few lines containe.

In the storie of this Alfred, a little aboue, mention was made of Pleimundus scholemaster to the said Alfred, and also bishop of Canturburie, succeeding Etheredus there bishop before him. Which Pleimundus gouerned that see, the number of thirtie and foure yeeres. After Pleimundus succeeded Athelmus, and late twelue yeeres. After him came Alfelmus thirteene yeeres. Then followed Odo a Dane borne in the said see of Canturburie, and gouerned the same twentie yeeres, being in great fauour with king Athelstan, king Edmund, and Edwine, as in processe hereafter (Christ willing) as place and order doth require, shall more at large be expressed.

Etheredus, Pleimundus, Athelmus, Alfelmus, Odo Archbishop of Canturburie.

As touching the course & proceedings of the romish bishops there, where I last entred mention of them, I ended with pope Stephan the fift. After his time was much broile in the election of the bishops of Rome, one contending against another: in so much that within the space of nine yeeres, were nine bishops. Of the which, first was Formosus, who succeded next vnto the forenamed Stephan the fift, being made pope against the mind of certaine in Rome, that would rather Sergius then deacon of the church of Rome to haue bene pope. Notwithstanding, Wars and manie preuailed on Formosus part. This Formosus, of whom partlie also is mentioned in other places of this ecclesiasticall historie, being before bishop of Portinliake, had in times past (I know not on what causes) offended pope John Pope Iohn the tenth.

Stephan, reigned but twentie daies. Then sat pope Iohn the tenth, who did fight & reuenge against the Romans; and to confirme the cause of Formosus more surelie, did hold a synod at Rauenna of 74 bishops, with the French king Endo and his archbishops being present at the same. At the which councell were ratified all the decrees and doings of Formosus, and the contrarie acts of the synod of Stephan the first were burned. This pope lined not pope fullie two yeres, after whom succeded 13 Benedictes the fourth, which kept the chaire three yeres. After whom Leo the first was next pope, who within fortie daies of his papacie was with strong hand taken & cast in prison by one Christopher his owne houshold chaplen, whom he had long nourished before in his house. Which thing (saith Platina) could not be done without great conspiracie and much slaughter of men. Which Christopher being pope about the space of seuen monethes, was likewise himselfe headed from his papall throne by Sergius, like as he had done to his maister before. And thus within the space of nine yeres had beene nine popes one after an other. Then Sergius after he had thrust downe pope Christopher, and throne him monke into a monasterie, occupied the roome seuen yeres. This Sergius a rude man and unlearned, very proud and cruell, had before beet put backe from the popedome by Formosus aboue mentioned. By reason whereof to reuenge Formosus againe being now in his papacie, caused the bodie of Formosus where it was buried, to be taken vp, & afterward set in the papall se (as in his pontificalibus) first degraded him, then commanded his head to be smitten off, with the other three fingers that were left (as Sigebertus writeth) which done, he made his bodie to be throwen into Tiber, depoſing likewise all such as by the said Formosus before had beene consecrated & inuested. This bodie of Formosus thus throwen into Tiber, was afterward (as our writers say) found and taken vp by certaine fishers, and so brought into S. Peters temple. At the presence whereof (as they say) certaine images there standing vp, bowed downe themselues and reuerenced the same, with lie and all. But such detestable miracles of stocks and images, in monkish and friersie temples, be to vs no newes, especiallie here in England, where we haue been so inured with the like & so many, that such write peraduenture cannot be to vs inuisible, though this crowneshorne generation thinke themselues to dance in a net. But the truth is, while they thinke to deceiue the simple, these write beguile most of all deceiue themselues, as they will find except they repent. By this pope Sergius first came vp the vse to beare about candles on Candelmas day, for the purifying of the blessed virgine; as though the sacred conception of Jesus the sonne of God were to be purified as a thing vnpure, and that with candle light.

After Sergius entred pope Anastasius, in whose time the bodie of Formosus forenamed is thought to be found of fishermen in the riuer of Tiber, and so brought (as is said) into the temple to be saluted of the images; which thing may quicklie be tainted as a lie. For how is it to be thought that the bodie of Formosus so long dead before, & now lying seuen yeres in the riuer, could remaine whole all that while, that fishers might take it vp, & diserne it to be the same after Anastasius had fiue yeres, followed pope Landa, the father (as some stories thinke) of pope Iohn, which Iohn is said to be the paramour of Theodora a famous harlot of Rome, & set vp of the same harlot either against Landa, or after Landa his father to succed in his roome. There is a stozie writer called Luithprandus, who writing De imperatoribus lib. 2. cap. 3. maketh there mention of this Theodora & pope Iohn the eleuenth, and saith moreouer that this Theodora had a daughter named Marozia, which Marozia had by pope Sergius aboue mentioned a sonne which afterward was pope Iohn the twelfth. The same Marozia afterwards chanced to marrie with Guido marques of Tuscia, through the means of which Guido & his friends at Rome, she brought to passe that this pope Iohn the eleuenth was smothered with a pillow laid to his mouth, after he had reigned fiue teene yeres, & so the foresaid Iohn the twelfth her sonne to succed next after him. But because the clergie & people of Rome did not agree to his election, therefore was pope Leo the first in his place set vp. Thus pope Iohn the sonne of Sergius & Marozia being deiected, reigned pope Leo seuen monthes. After him pope Stephan two yeres, who being poisoned, then was pope Iohn the twelfth aboue rehersed, the sonne of Sergius & Marozia set vp againe in y papacie, where he reigned neere the space of fiue yeres. Of y wickednes of this strumpet Marozia, how she maried two brethren, one after the death of the other, & how she gouerned all Rome, & the whole church at that time, I let it passe. Although the Latin verses wherewith the said Luithprandus doth inuey against his women as marrie two brethren, incest neither with the first to be reckned, perhaps might be further applied then to that Marozia of Rome: but for shortnes I let them also passe. After Iohn the twelfth followed pope Stephan three yers, pope Leo three yers and foure moneths, pope Stephan the eight three yeres & foure months, pope Martin three yeres and six months; after him pope Agapetus eight yeres and six months. About whose time or a litle before began first y order of monks called Ordo Cluniacensis, &c. ## King Edward the elder.

King Edward the elder.

AFter the reigne of the famous king Alfred, his sonne Edward succeded, surnamed the elder: where first is to be noted, that before the conquest of the Normans, there were in England three Edwards: first, this Edward the elder, second, Edward the martyr; third, Edward the confessor, whereof hereafter (by the grace of Christ) shall follow in order as place shall giue to be declared. This Edward began his reigne the yere of our Lord 901, and gouerned the land right valiantlie and noblie foure & twentie yeers. In knowledge of good letters and learning he was not to be compared to his father, otherwise in princelie renowme, in ciuill gouernment, and such like martiall prowesse, he was nothing inferior, but rather excelled him: though whole valiant acts first the princedome of Wales and kingdome of Scotland, with Constantine king thereof were to him subdued. He adioined moreouer to his dominion the countrie of Sallangia, that is, of Northfolke, Suffolke, and Esser. All Sperceland also he recouered and Northumberland out of the hands of the Danes. In all his wars he neuer ligtlie went without victorie. The subiects of his prouinces & dominions were so inured and hardned in continuall practise and feats of war, that when they heard of any enimies comming (neuer tarying for any bidding from the king or from his dukes) straightwaies they incountred with them, both in number & in knowledge of the order of war excelling alwaies their aduersaries. Guliel. de regi. Ita hostes militibus contempti, regi risui erant; to meane. So was the comming & attainting of their enimies to the people and common souldiers but a trifle, to the king but a ridicle. Among other aduersaries which were hurte rather then wise in assailing this king, was one called Clito Ethelwolbus a yong man, king Edwards vncles sonne, who first occupying the towne of Wimborne (taking thence a nun with him, whom then he had maried) fled by night to Northumberland, to abioine himself vnto the Danes, who was made chief king & captain ouer them. Then chased frō thence, he fled ouer into France, but shortly returning againe into England, he landed in Estsengland, where the said Clito with a companie of Danes of that countrie gathered to him, destroied & pilled much of the countrie about Crekinford and Cruland. And so passing ouer Thames after he had spoiled the land there to Wadenestocke, returned againe to Northfolke and Suffolk: where he meeting with an ambushment of Kentishmen, which dragged and tared after the maine host of Edward, contrarie to his commandement, inclosed them in, and slue the most part of them. Some after the two hosts meeting together, betweene the two ditches of S. Edmunds land, after a long fight Clito with many of the Danes were slaine, & the remnant were constrained to seeke for peace, which vpon certaine conditions, and vnder a tribute was to them granted.

A comparison betweene Alfred and his sonne Edward.

Clito Ethelwald rebelleth against king Edward.

Anno 904.

In proceasse, about the twelfth yeere of his reigne, the Danes repenting them of their couenants, and minding to breake the same, assembled an host and met with the king in Staffordshire at a place called Totenhall, and soone after at Wodnesfield, at which two places the king slue two kings, two earles, and many thousands of Danes that occupied the countrie of Northumberland.

Anno 913.

Thus the inpoztunate rage of the Danes being asswaged, king Edward, hauing now some leisure giuen from wars to other studies, gaue his mind to the building & repairing of cities, townes, and castles, that by the Danes were raced, hatred and broken. As first of Chester, which citie he double inlarged to that it was before, compassing the castle within y walls of the same which before stod without. That done, the king builded a strong castle at Hereford in the edge of Wales. Also for the strengthening of the countrie, he made a castle at the mouth of the water of Auen, & an other castle at Buckingham, and the third sat thereby vpon the riuer of Ouse. Moreouer he repaired the cities & townes of Worcester & Tellgmore, and destroied the castle that the Danes had made at Bemesford. Likewise vpon the riuer of Trent against the old towne of Notingham, he builded a new towne on the southside, & made a bridge ouer the riuer betweene the said two townes. Also by the riuer of Merce he builded a citie & towne in the north end of Mercia, & named it Thelwall, and after repaired the citie of Manchester, that soze was defaced with wars of the Danes.

Chester repared and inlarged.

The castell of Hereford builded vpon the riuer of Auen and Wuse.

The townes of Worcester and Tellgmor builded.

The new towne of Notingham builded.

Thelwall.

Manchester repared.

In this renewing & building of townes & castles for the more fortifying of his realme, his sister Elfleda daughter of king Alfred, & maried to the duke of Mercia (as is afore mentioned) was no small helper. Of this Elfleda it is firmlie of writers affirmed, that the being (as is said) maried to Ethelred duke of Mercia, after the yere of our Lord 886 the paines of women in trauelling with her child, so much she abhorred euer after the imbracing of her husband, that it seemed to her (the said) not seemly for a noble woman to vse such fleshly liking, therof so great sorow & trauell should insue. And yet notwithstanding, the same Elfleda for all her delicat tendernes in eschewing the naturall passion which necessitie giueth to women; to hardie she was in warlike dangers which nature giueth not to women, that fighting against the Danes, so venturous she was of stomach, that soure of her next knights which were gardians of her bodie, were slaine fast by her. This Elfleda auoyde her other noble acts, acts whereby she deserued praise, was a great helper and furtherer vp of her brother Edward, who builded and newlie repared many castles and townes, as Tamworth besides Lichfield, Stafford, Warwike, Shrewesburie, Watrisburie, Oxenburie, besides Chester in the forrest now destroyed. Also in the north end of Mercia, vpon the riuer of Merce, a castell called Rimcorne, also a bridge ouer Seuerne named Wimmisburie bridge.

The lawes of king Alfred and king Edward.

As touching the lawes and statutes of this Edward, as also of his father Alfred made before him, I omit here to record them for length of matter and wast of time: yet notwithstanding, this admonition by the way I thinke good to note, that in those dayes of their ancient kings reigning in England, the authozitie then both of conferring bishoprikes and spirituall promotions, and also of prescribing lawes as well to the churchmen as to the laitie, and of ordering and intermedling in matters mere spirituall, was then in the hands of kings ruling in the land, and not only in the hand of the pope, as appereth by these lawes of Alfred.

Si quis fornicetur cum vxore aliena, &c.
Si quis in quadragesima sanctum velum in publico vel in lecto, &c.
Vt christiani Deum diligant & paganismo renuncient, &c.
Si quis christianitatem mutet, &c.
Si quis ordinatus sacris fuerutur, &c.
Si presbyter ad rectum venuum sanctum chrisma, &c.
Si duo fratres vel cognati cum vna aliqua fornicentur, &c.

Note how kings of England in times past had authozitie in spirituall causes.

By these and other such like constitutions of king Alfred, it may appeare, how the gouernance and direction of the church in those dayes depended not vpon mantleur le pope of Rome, but vpon the kings which here in their time (vnder the Lord) did gouerne the land. To this also the example of king Edwards time giueth testimonie: which Edward with Plegmundus (aboue mentioned) archbishop of Canturburie, and with other bishops in a synod assembled, assigned and elected seuen bishops in seuen metropolitan churches of the realme. Whereby it came, the first Frithestan, the second Adelstan, the third Werstan, the fourth Adelelme, the fift Eadulfus, the first Wernegus, the seuenth Kenulphus; in which election the kings authozitie seemed then alone to be sufficient, &c.

Anno 925

This Edward (as in the beginning was said) reigned 24. yeeres, who had three wiues, Egwin, Elfled and Ethelwild. Of Egwin he had his eldest sonne Adelstan, who next succeeded in the kingdome, and a daughter married after to the duke of Northumberland. Of Elfled he received two sonnes and sir daughters, to wit Ethelwald and Edwin. Ethelwald was excellentlie well seene in all knowledge of learning, much resembling both in countenance and conditions his grandother Alfred, and died soone after his father. Of his sir daughters, two of them, Elfled and Ethelhilda, were made nuns, the other foure were maried, Edgina to Charles the French king in his fathers time, Elfleda by king Ethelstan was maried to Hugo the sonne of duke Robert. Edgitha and Algina were both sent to Henricus prince of Almains. Of which two sisters the second the said Henricus maried to his sonne Otho, who was the first emperour of the Almains. The other sister, which was Edgitha, the foresaid Henricus maried vnto a certaine duke about the bozder of the Alps in Italy. Of his third wife Ethelwid he received two sonnes, Edmund and Edred, which both reigned after Adelstan, and two daughters, Egburga whom he made a nun, and Edguina who was maried vnto Ludouicus prince of Aquitania in France. These sonnes and daughters king Edward thus brought vp: his daughters he set to spinning and to the needle: Guliel. de reg: his sonnes he set to the studie of learning, Vt quasi philosophi ad gubernandam rempublicam non iam rudes procederent: that is, To the end that they being as first made philosophers, should be the more expert thereby to gouerne the commontwealth.

King Ethelstan, or Adelstan.

King Ethelstan or Adelstan.

ETheistan or Adelstan, after the death of Edward his father, began his reigne in England, and was crowned at Kingston. He was a prince of worthie memozie, valiant and wise in all his acts, nothing inferiour vnto his father Edward. In like wise the renowme of ciuill gouernment, ioind with much prosperous successe, in reducing this realme vnder the subiection of one monarchie. For he both expelled the Danes, subdued the Scots, and quieted the Welshmen, as well in Northwales, as also in Cornwall. The first enemie against this Ethelstan, was one Elfredus, who with a faction of seditious persons, complaining against the said Ethelstan at Winchester, inchrimenthy after the death of his father, went about to put out his eies. Notwithstanding, the king escaping that danger, thorough the help of God was at that time deliuered. Elfred vpon the same being accused, fled to Rome, there before the pope to purge himselfe by his oth. Who being brought to the church of S. Peter, & there sweating (or rather forsweating) himselfe to be cleare, which indeed was guiltie thereof, suddenlie vpon his oth fell downe, & so brought to the English house in Rome, within three daies after departed. The pope sending word into king Ethelstan, whether he would haue the said Elfred buried among christians or not: at length through the perswasions of his friends and kinsfolks, it was concluded that he should be buried in christian burriall. This storie although I find in no other writers mentioned, but onely in the chronicles of Guliel. lib. de regib. yet for so much as it beareth the witnesse and woorde of the king himselfe, as testified in an old deed of gift, giuen to the monasterie of Malmesburie, I thought the same the more to be of credit. The woorde of the king proceed in this tenor as followeth.

Anno 927

In the second yeare of the reigne of king Ethelstan, for amitie and a peace to be had betweene the king and the Danes of Northumberland, he maried to Sithericus their king, his sister, whereof mention is made before; but shortly after without any issue this Sithericus died. After whose death king Ethelstan seized that prouince into his owne hands, putting out the sonne of the foresaid Sithericus called Alanus, who with his brother Godfridus fled the one into Ireland, the other into Constantine king of the Scots. And when he had thus accoded with the Danes of Northumberland, he shortly made subiect vnto him Constantine king of Scots. Whereof Constantine misliked greatlie to submit to the king, that he refused him to his former dignitie, saying, that it was more honour to make a king then to be a king.

Northumberland subdued to king Ethelstan.

The Scots subdued to the K. of England.

It is more honour to make a king then to be a king.

Not long after, the said Constantine king of Scots did breake couenant with king Ethelstan, wherefore he assembled his knights, and made towards Scotland, where he subdued his enemies, and bringing them againe into due subiection, returned into England with victorie. Here by the way, in some storie-writers (who forgetting the office of historicians, seeme to play the poets) is written & recoded for a maruell, that the said Ethelstan returning out of Scotland into England, came to Pozke, and so into the church of saint John of Beuerlie, to redeeme his knife, which before he had left there for a pledge at his going forth. In the which place he praying to God and to saint John of Beuerlie, that he might leaue there some remembrance, whereby they that came after might know that the Scots by right should be subdued to the Englishmen, smot with a sword (they say) vpon a great hard stone standing nere about the castle of Dunbar, that with the stroke thereof the stone was cut a large ell deepe (with a lie no lesse deepe also then was the stroke in the stone.) What of this poeticall or fabulous storie, albeit Polychronicon, Fabian, Jornalensis, and others more constantlie accord in the same, yet in Guliel. and Henricus no mention is made at all. But peraduenture he that was the inuentor first of this tale of the stone, was disposed to lie for the whetstone: wherefore to my mind he is worthie to haue it.

A fabulous miracle falsefied reported of king Ethelstan.

Of like truth and credit seemeth also to be this that followeth, about the same yeare and time vnder the reigne of K. Ethelstan, being the eight yeare of his reigne, of one Williamus bishop of Winchester, who succeded Frithstanus in the same see, and gouerned that bishoprike foure yeres. This Williamus being a deuout bishop in prayer & contemplation, vsed much among his solitarie walks, to frequent late the churchyard, praying for the soules there, & all christian soules departed. Upon a time the said Williamus after his vsuall maner proceeding in his deuotions, when he had done, came to Requiescant in pace.

Williamus Bishop.

Anno 933

A ridiculous miracle longed vpon Williams bishop of Winchester.

Wherevnto suddenlie a great multitude of soules answering together with one voice said, Amen. Of this miracle albeit I haue not much to say (hasting to other matters) yet this question would I aske of some indifferent papist, which were not wilfull, but of ignorance deceiued; If this multitude which here answered Amen, were the soules of them buried in the churchyard or not? If yea, then how were they in purgatorie, what time they were heard in that place answering Amen? Except we should thinke purgatorie to be in the churchyard at Winchester, where the soules were heard then so manie answering and praying Amen. And yet this storie is testified by the accord of writers of that time, Guliel. Polychron. Houedenus, Iornalensis, and others more. Such like miracles and prophesies also we read of Elphegus which succeeded him; but because we shall to other things, let these fables passe.

A miracle of soules answering, Amen.

We heard a little before, how king Ethelstan after the death of Sithericus king of Northumberland, seized that land or prouince into his owne hand, and put out his sonne Alanus: who after flying into Scotland, married the daughter of Constantine king of Scots. By whose stirring and exhortation he gathered a compaine of Danes, Scots, and others, and entred the mouth of Humber with a strong nauie of six hundred and fiftéene ships.

A great battell fought at Brunford.

Whereof king Ethelstan with his brother Edmund having knowledge, prepared his armie, and at length ioining in fight with him and his people, at a place called Brunanburch or Brunford: where he fighting with them from morning till euening, after a terrible slaughter on both sides (as the like hath not béene séene lightlie in England) had the victorie. In the which battell were slaine fiue kinall and vnder kings, with Constantine king of Scots, and twelue dukes, with the more part of all the strangers which at that time they gathered to them. Here also our writers put in another miracle in this battell, how king Ethelstans sword miraculouslie fell into his sheath through the prayer of Odo, then Archbishop of Canturburie.

Another like miracle of king Ethelstans sword. The archbish of Canturburie.

Concerning this battell, I find in a certaine written chronicle these verses, which because they should not be lost, I thought not vnworthie here of rehersall.

Transierat quinos, & tres, & quatuor annos,
Iure regens ciues, subigens virtute tyrannos:
Cum redit illa lues Europæ noxia labes.
Iam cubat in terris fera barbaries aquilonis,
Et iacet in campis pelago pirata relicto,

Bacchanti furiæ, Scotorum rege volente,
Commodat assensum borealis terra ferenum,
Et iam grande tument, iam terrent aere verbis.
Cedunt indignæ, cedit plaga tota superbis.
Nam quia rex noster fidens alacrisque iuuenta,

Tanta fuit peditum, tam barbara vis equitantum,
Innumerabilium concussus quadrupedantum.
Excitat tandem fame quærimonia regem,
Ne se cauterio tali pateretur inuri,
Quod sua barbaricæ cessissent arma securi,
Nec mora, victrices ducentia signa cohortes.
Explicat inuentum vexilla ferocia centum,
Iuncta virûm virtus, decies bis millia quina,
Ad stadium belli comitantur præuia signa.
Hicque ciet strepitus armatorum legiones,

Vt postea proprias prædæ repetant regiones:
Ast vulgus reliquum miserandaque strage peremptum,
Infecit bibulas terris nidoribus auras,
Fugit Analasus de tot modo millibus vnus, &c.

Analanus.

This Egwina before being a pore mans daughter, had a vision by night, that of her bodie sprang such a bright light of the mone, that the brightnesse thereof gaue light to the realme of England, by reason whereof, the was taken into the foresaid house, and daintilie brought vp in stead of their owne daughter, for hope of some commoditie to ensue therby, as afterward it came to passe. For king Edward (as is declared) comming into the house, and ramished with the beautie of the maiden, begat of her the same night this Ethelstan. Wherefore the said Ethelstan being thus baselie borne of Egwina, the first wife to Edward (as is said) before he was married to her, & fearing his next brother Edwin, which was rightlie borne (especiallie being stirred thereunto through the smiffer suggestion of his butler) did cast such displeasure to the foresaid Edwin his brother, being yet but yong, that (notwithstanding his innocent submission and purgation made against his accusers) he caused him to be set in an old rotten bote in the bvode sea (onelie with one esquier with him) without anp tackling or other prouision to the same. Where the yong and tender prince being dismaid with the rage of winds & of the floods, and now wearie of his life, cast himselfe ouer bord into the sea, and so was drowned. Notwithstanding the esquier shifting for himselfe as he could, and recouering the bodie of his master, brought it to Sandwich, where it was buried. Which done, the king afterwards comming to the remembrance of himselfe, was stricken with great repentance the space of seuen yéeres together, and at length was reuenged of him that was the accuser of his brother. This accuser (as is said) was the kings cupbearer, who (as God the righteous iudge of all things would haue it) vpon a certaine solemne feast, bearing the cup vnto the king, chanced in the middle of the floore to stumble with one foot, helping and recouering himselfe with the other, saying in these words, Thus one brother (as you see) helpeth another. These words being thus spoken in the hearing of the king, so moued his mind, that forthwith he commanded the false accuser of his brother to be had out to execution. Whole tuft recompense I would wish to be a warning to all men, what it is to sow discord betweene brother and brother.

Ethelstan (besides his seuen yéeres lamentation for this act) builded the two monasteries of Pidelton and of Sidelines for his brothers sake, or (as the stories say) for his soule. Whereby it may appeare what was the cause most speciall in those daies of building monasteries, to wit, for releasing the sinnes both of them departed, and them alive: which cause hold it standeth with the grace and veritie of Christs gospell, and of his passion, let the christian reader trie and examin with himselfe. This cruell fact of the king towards Edwin, caused him afterward to be more tender and carefull towards his other brethren and sisters left in his hands vnmarried. Which sisters, as is partlie in the chapter before declared, he richlie bestowed in great mariages, as one to the king of Northumberland Sithericus, another he gaue vnto Lewis king of Aquitania, the third to Hean cus duke of Almaine for his sonne Otho, who was the first emperour of the Germans. Wherevnto it is to be vnderstood, that the empire at this time began first to be translated from France (where it remained about one hundred yeres and a halfe) vnto Germanie, where it hath euer since continued.

The fourth of his sisters being a virgin of singular beautie, Pope the French king required to be giuen vnto him, seruing to king Ethelstan perfous and sumptuous presents, such as were not before séene in England. Among the which presents and gifts, besides the rare odours of sundrie sauours and fine spices: and besides the pretious and costlie gems, namelie of smaragds of most redolent greene, besides also manie and great coursers and palfreys richlie trapped, especiallie of one iewell (as writers make mention) which was a certaine vessell finelie and subtillie made of the pretious stone onychius, so radiantlie wrought, that in it appeared the liuelie coulor growing, and mens images walking, &c. Ouer & besides was sent also the sword of Constantine the great, with the name of the possessor written in golden letters; where in the hast of the same all beaten in gold, was one of the iron nailes wherewith our Sauiour on the crosse was nailed. Of the verie whereof I am not disposed at this present much to say what I suspect; but that this in the ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius is euident, that two of the foresaid nails of Christ were sheat on the bridle of Constantine, the third he cast into the sea in a raging tempest. Wherefore, if Christ were nailed with foure nailes, perhaps this naile might be one. If he were nailed but with three, I feare not how this feate can stand with other stories, neither how this fourth naile can stand with the truth. Among the rest moreouer was the speare (as is reported) wherewith the side of our Sauiour was opened: which also the said Constantine was wont to carrie in the field against his enemies, with a portion likewise of the holie crosse inclosed in crystall: also a part of the croune of thorne in like manor inclosed, &c. Of the which reliques, part was giuen to Wincchester, part to the church of Malmesburie, where king Ethelstan was buried. As this king was induced and inlarged by the gift of God (the better by and disposer of all kings) with great liberalities of wholsome remembrance, hauing hauing vnder his subiection both the Scots and Britains, and the whole monarchie of the land: so he deuised diuers good and wholsome lawes for the gouernment of the same, as well concerning the state of the orders ecclesiasticall, as also of the secular or laie people. Whereby it is to be vnderstood, that the disturped power of the bishop of Rome did not then extend it selfe so largelie, nor so pzoudlie to drogat from the authozitie of kings & princes, but that euery one in his owne dominion, had (vnder God, & not vnder the pope) the doing of all matters within the same his dominion contained, whether they were causes temporall or spirituall, as by the decrees and constitutions of this king (and also of other as well before him, as after him) may euidentlie be testified; as where he amongst other lawes thus ordaineth touching the bishop, in words as follow.

Episcopo iure pertinet, omnem rectitudinem promouere, Dei videlicet, ac seculi. In primis, debet omnem ordinatum instruere, quid ei sit agendum iure, & quid hominibus secularibus iudicare debeant.

Debet etiam fedulò pacem & concordiam operari cum secu-culi iudicibus, qui rectum velle diligunt, & in compellationum allegationem edocere, ne quis alij perperam agat in iureiurando, vel ordalio.

Nec pati debet aliquam circumuentionem iniustæ mensuræ, vel iniusti ponderis. Sed conuenit vt per consilium & testimonium eius, omne legis rectum, & burgi mensura, & omne pondus sit secundum a ditionem eius, institutum valde rectum: ne quis proximum suum seducat, prao quo decidat in peccatum.

Et semper debet christianis prouidere contra omnia, quæ prædicta sunt, & ideo debet se de pluribus intromittere: vt sciat quomodo gregi agat, quem ad Dei manum custodire suscepit, ne diabolus eum dilaniet, nec malum aliquod superueniat. Nunquam enim erit populo bene consultum, nec dignè Deo conseruabitur, vbi lucrum impium & magis falsum diligitur. Ideo debent omnes amici Dei quod iniquum est euertere, & quod iustum est eleuare, nec pati vt propter falsum, & pecuniæ quæstum homines se forisfaciant erga verè sapientem Deum, cui displicet omnis iniustitia.

Christianis autem omnibus necessarium est, vt rectum diligant, & iniqua condemnent, & saltem sacris ordinibus euectis iustum semper erigant, & praua deponant.

Hinc debent episcopi cum iudicibus, iudicia dictitare & interesse, ne permittant (si possint) vt illinc aliqua prauitatum gramina pullulent. Et sacerdotibus pertinet in suo diœcesi, vt ad rectum sedulò quemcumque iuuent, nec patiantur (si possint) vt christianus aliquis alij noceat, non potens inpotenti, non iumnus infirmo, non præfectus b subditis, non dominus hominibus suis, senuis, aut liberis. Et secundum a ditionem, & per mensuram suam, equanimiter per rectum, vt necessaria c seruí operentur super omnem scyram cui præest.

Et rectum est vt non sit aliqua mensurabilis virga longior quàm alia, sed per episcopi mensuram omnes institutæ sint, & exequatæ per suam d diœcesin. Et omne pondus consiet secundum ditionem eius, & si aliquid controuersiarum interfit, discernat episcopus.

Vniuscuiusq; domini proprium est & necesse, vt seruis condescendat, & compatiatur, sicut indulgentiis poterit: quia Domino Deo viuenti sunt æque chari seruus, & liber. Et omnes vnò & eodem pretio redemit, & omnes sumus Deo necessariò seruí: & sic iudicabit nos, sicut antè iudicauimus eos, in quos potestatem iudicij in terris habebimus. Et ideo opus est vt eis parcamus qui nobis parere debent, & tunc manutenebimur in Dei omnipotentis proprio iudicio: Amen.

The said Ethelstan besides, prescribed other constitutions also, as touching tithes giuing, where he saith and proclaimeth: Ego Ethelstanus rex, consilio Vlfelmi archiepiscopi mei & alienium episcoporum, mando præpositis omnibus in regno meo, in nomine Domini & sanctorum omnium, vt inprimis reddant de meo proprio decimas Deo, tam in viuente capitali, quàm in mortuis frugibus terræ: & episcopi mei similiter faciant de suo proprio, & aldermanni mei & præpositi mei, &c. That is, I Ethelstan king, charge and command all my officers through my whole realme, to giue tithes vnto God of my proper goods, as well in liuing cattell, as in the corne & fruits of the ground, and that my bishops likewise of their proper goods, and mine aldermen, and my officers and headmen shall doe the same. Item this I will, that my bishops and other headmen doe declare the same to such as be vnder their subiection, and that it be accomplished at the terme of saint John the Baptist. Let vs remember that Jacob said vnto the Lord, Of all things that thou giuest to me I will offer tithes vnto the Lord, &c. Also what the Lord saith in the gospell of saint Matthew, To him that hath it shall be giuen, and he shall abound. We must also consider how terrible it is written in bookes, that if we will not offer our tenths, from his nine parts shall be taken away, and onely the tenth part shall be left vs, &c. And in the same place, after that he hath assigned the church rights to be paid in the place vnto the they belong, it followeth thus: Facite etiam vt mihi mea propria capiatis, quæ mihi poteritis rectè acquirere. Nolo vt aliquid mihi iniustè conquiratis. Sed omnia vestra concedo vobis eo tenore, quo mihi mea similiter exoptetis. Cauete simul & vobis, & eis quos admonere debetis, ab ira Dei, & transgressione mea.

The law of K. Ethelstan concerning tithing stealing about twelue pence. Epitaph. in Ethelst. Sol illustrans, lustrans sororum ortus, Cum regem cæsa decreuit ille sua.

Among his other lawes and ordinances, to the number of 25. diuers things be comprehended, pertaining as well to the spirituall, as also to the temporall iurisdiction.

Out of the lawes of this king first sprang vp the attachment of theeues, that such as stole aboue twelue pence, and were aboue twelue yeares old, should not be spared.

And thus much briefle concerning the historie of king Ethelstan, and things in his time done: who reigned about the space of sixteene yeares. And because he died without issue, therefore after him succeeded his brother Edmund, the yeare of our Lord 940, who reigned fiue yeares.

King Edmund.

EDmund the sonne of Edward the elder, by his third wife (as is declared) and brother of Ethelstan, being of the age of 18 yeares, entred his reigne, who had by his queene Elgina two sonnes, Edwin and Edgarus, surnamed Pacificus, which both reigned after him as followeth. This Edmund continued his reigne 6 yeares and a halfe. By him were expelled the Danes, Scots, Normans, and all forren enemies out of the land. Such cities & townes which before were in the possession of strangers, as Lincolne, Nottingham, Derbie, Stafford, and Leicester, he recouered out of their hands. Thus the realme being cleared of forren power for a time; then the king set his studie and mind in the redressing and maintaining the state of the church: which all stood then in building of monasteries, and furnishing of churches, either with new possessions, or with restoring the old which were taken away before. In the time of this Edmund, this I find in an old written storie borrowed of William Carie, a citizen of London, a worthie treasurer of most woorthie monuments of antiquitie. The name of the author I cannot alledge, because the booke beareth no title, lacking both the beginning and the latter end; but the words there of faithfully recited, be these: Huius regis tempore, facta est dispersio monachorum Eushmensis cœnobij, cum substitutione canonicorum per Athelmum, & Vlricum laicos, & Osulphum episcopum, &c: that is: In the time of this king, there was a scattering or dispersion made of the monks out of the monasterie of Eusham, & canons substituted in their place, through doing of Athelmus & Vlricus lay men, & of Osulfus bishop, &c.

Ex libro rei Cariana.

Monkes put out of Eusham, the yeare of our Lord 941.

Where, as concerning this matter betweene monks and others of the clergie, first it is to bee vnderstood, that in the realme of England heretofore, before the time of Dunstan, the bishops sées and cathedrall churches were replenished with no monks, but with priests and canons, called then clerks, or ment of the clergie. After this beginneth to rise a difference or a sect betweene these two parties in stromelie of life and in habit: so that they which liued after a stricter rule of holinesse, were called monks, and professed chastitie, that was, to line from liuing (for so was chastitie then defined in those blind daies) as though holy matrimonie were no chastitie, according as Pathmutius did well define it in the councell of Nice. The other sort which were no monks but priests or men of the clergie so called, liued more free from these monkish rules and obseruances, and were then commonly (or at least lawfullie) married, and in their life and habit came nearer to the secular sort of other christians. By reason whereof great disdaine and emulation was among them, in so much that in many cathedrall churches, where as priests were before, there monks were put in: and contrarie, sometime whereas monks were intruded, there priests and canons againe were placed, and monks thrust out; wherevpon more shall appeare hereafter (by the grace of Christ) when we come to the life of Dunstan. In the meane time, something to satisfie the cogitation of the reader, which peraduenture either is ignorant, or else would know of the first comming in of monks into this realme and church of England in the Saxons time: this is to be noted, according as I find in old chronicles, namelie in the Latine historie of Gulielm. de gestis pontificum Anglorum, recorded touching the same. About this time of king Edmund, or shortly after, when hardinesse and strictnesse of life ioyned with superstition was had in veneration, and counted for great holinesse; men therefore, either to win publike fame with men, or merits with God, gaue themselues to leade a strict life, thinking thereby the stranger their conuersation was, and further from the common trade of vulgar people, the more perfect to bee towards God and man. There was at that time (and before that) a monasterie in France named Floriake, after the order and rule of Benedict: from the which monasterie did spring a great part of our English monks, who being there professed, and afterward returning into England, did congregate men daily to their profession. And so, partly for strangenesse of their rule, partly for outward holinesse of their strict life, partly for the opinion of holinesse that many had of them, were in great admiration, not onely with the rude sort, but with kings and princes, who founded their houses, maintained their rules, and inlarged them with possessions. Among the which order of monks comming from Floriake, especiallie was one Oswaldus bishop of Worcester & great patron of monkerie. Guliel. lib. 3. de pontif.

Touching the which Oswaldus, William in his booke De pontifice, writing of his historie, hath these words: Familiaris per id temporis Anglis consuetudo fuit, vt si quiboni affati essent deuotionis, in beatissimi Benedicti monasterio cœnobialem susciperent habitum: a quo religionis huiusce manuit exordium, &c. That is, it was a common custome at that time among English men, that if any good men were well affected or inuited toward religion, they went to the monasterie of blessed S. Benedict in France, and there receiued the habit of a monke, whereupon the first origin of this religion began, &c. But of this Oswald bishop of Yorke, and Dunstan bishop of Canturburie, and Athelwald bishop of Winchester, how they replenished diuers monasteries and cathedrall churches with monks: and how they discharged married priests and canons out of their houses, to plant in monks in their cels, more shall bee spoken (by the grace of Christ) hereafter. Now let vs returne againe to the matter where we left, of king Edmund, who besides his noble victories against his enemies, and recouering the cities about expressed into his owne hands, did also subdue the prouince of Cumberland. And after he had put out the eyes of the two sonnes of Dunmall king of Cumberland, hee committed the gouernance thereof to Malcolmus king of the Scots, vpon promise of his truthe seruice and obedience, when the king should stand in any need of him. In the time of this king, Dunstan was not yet archbishop of Canturburie, but onely abbat of Glastenburie: of whom many fabulous narrations passe among the writers, imputing more vnto him then veritie, whereof this is one of the first. What time Edgarus called Pacificus was borne, Dunstan being the same time abbat of Glastenburie (as the monkish fables dreame) heard a voice in the aire of certaine angels singing after this tenor, and saying: Now peace commeth to the church of England in the time of this child and of our Dunstan, &c. This I thought to recite, that the christian reader might the better ponder with himselfe the impudent and abominable fictions of this Romish generation. Out of the same mint also haue they forged, how the said Dunstan should heare the angels sing the Byzeleson, bled to be sung at euen-song in the church: Guliel. de pontif. lib. 2. Which is as true as that the harpe hanging in a womans house, played by it selfe the tune of the antheme, called Gaudent in cœlis, &c. What would not these deceiuers faine in matters something likely, which in things so absurd and so inconuenient, shame not to lie and to forge so impudently and also so manifestly? Through the motion of this Dunstan, king Edmund builded and furnished the monasterie of Glastenburie, and made the said Dunstan abbat thereof.

Concerning the end and death of this king, sundrie opinions there be. Alfridus and Marianus say, that while this king Edmund indeuoured himselfe to saue his seruer from the danger of his enemies, which would haue slaine him at Pulcherchurch, the king in parting of the frase was wounded, and died shortly after. But Guliel. de regibus lib. 2. saith, that the king being at a feast at Pulcherchurch vpon the day of saint Augustine, spied a fellon sitting in the hall named Leof, whom he before for his fellonie had exiled, and leaping ouer the table did slie vpon him, and plucked the theefe by the haire of the head to the ground. In which doing, the fellon with a knife wounded the king to the death, and also with the same knife wounded many other of the kings seruants, and at length was all to hewed, and died for himselfe.

The death of king Edmund.

By the lawes of king Edmund (ordeined and set forth, as well for the redresse of church matters, as also of ciuill regiment) it may appeare, that the state both of causes temporall and likewise spirituall, apperteined then to the kings right (the false pretended vsurpation of the bishop of Rome notwithstanding) as by these lawes is to be seene: where he by the advice of his lords and bishops, did enact and determine concerning the chastitie and pure life of ecclesiasticall ministers, and such as were in the orders of the church, with the penalties alld to them which transgressed the same.

Ulfstanus archbishop of Yorke & Oda archbishop of Canturburie.

In the time of this Edmund was Ulfstanus archbishop of Yorke, and Oda archbishop of Canturburie which Oda being a Dane borne (as is before touched) was promoted to that see by king Athelstan, for that (as they saw) he being first bishop of Sitton, and present with king Athelstan in the field against Analafus before mentioned, what time the said Athelstan had lost his sword, he through his intercession vp to heauen did see a sword from heauen come downe into the heath of the king. Whereof relation being made vnto the king by the foresaid bishop, Athelstan vpon the same was so affeard towards Oda, that not onely he counted him for a patron of his life, but also made him primate of Canturburie after the decease of Ulfrinus. This Oda was the first from the comming of the Saxons, till his time, which was archbishop of Canturburie being no monke. For all the other before him were of the profession of monkes, of whom a great part had been Italians vnto Bruualdus. Notwithstanding, this Oda being also a stranger borne, after hee was elected into the bishoprike, to conforme to the old custome of others before him, sailed ouer into France, and there at Floriake (after the vsuall manner aboue mentioned of Englishmen) receiued the profession and habit of monkish religion, as saith my foresaid author. And like as the said Oda first being no monke, was made archbishop of Canturburie: so also Ulfanus the same time being bishop of Yorke and of Worcester, differed from diuers his predecessors before him in profession and habit: of whom the forenamed author thus writeth in his third booke, speaking of Ulfanus: Qui sanctitate discrepabat & habitu: that is, Hee differed in sanctimonie and in habit. Whereby is to be collected, that in those daies was a diuersitie in habit and garment, not onely betweene monkes and bishops, but also betweene one bishop and another; albeit what difference it was, yet I do not find. But I returne againe to Oda, who by the description of his manners, might seeme not to be the worst that occupied that place, were it not that our lying historics faining false miracles vpon him (as they do of others) make him indeed to seeme worse then he was. As where they imagine that hee should see from heauen a sword fall into the seabbard of king Athelstan, which there he should conceale, to defend the church of Canturburie with his prayers from raine. And also where hee should turne the bread of the altar (as the writer reporteth it) into lively flesh, and from flesh into bread againe, to conuince the people which before doubted in the same. Where note against (good reader) that albeit this miracle were true, as no doubt it is vntrue, yet is it to be noted that in those daies was a great doubt amongst Englishmen of the popish sacrament, and that transubstantiation was not receiued into the christian creed. The like iudgement is to be giuen also of that, where our English writers testifying of the same Oda, say that hee should prophesie long before of Dunstan to be his successor in the church of Canturbury. But to let these fantasies and idle stories passe, this which we find of Oda, his owne writing is certaine, that the said Oda in the reigne of king Edmund, had a synod conuened of the chiefe prelats and men of the clergie in his time, to whom he directed this letter here following; the copie whereof I thought to expresse, for the reader to see what zealous care reigned in archbishops then toward the church of the Lord. The words of his epistle proceed in this tenor.

The letter or epistle of Odo archbishop of Canturburie sent to the other bishops and men of the clergie.

The letter of Oda archbishop, to the prelats.

MIrabili cunĉti potentis polorum præsulis clementia opitulante, ego Odo ecclesiæ saluatoris domini nostri Iesu Christi archicpiscopus, Douernensis ciuitatis metropolitanus, coepiscopis fidei catholicæ compagatoribus, spiritualibi charitatis vigore meis confratribus, præsentium prosperitatem æthereig; decoris beatitudinem, &c.

The same in English.

By the diuine grace of God, I Odo of the church of our Lord and sauiour Iesus Christ, archbishop and metropolitan of the citie of Douer, to my fellow bishops and fellow planters of the catholike faith, & my fellow brethren in the spirituall bond of charity, with greeting, wish prosperity in this world present, and in the world to come felicitie. If it were so, or by any meanes could be, that all the riches of this world were laid before mine eyes, so that I being emperor had all things vniuersally vnder my subiection, all those things would I gladly giue, yea & my life also would offer willingly for the health of your soules, as which also doe desire and trust likewise my selfe to be strengthened with the feruencie of your holinesse, as appertaining to those things wherein the Lord our God hath set vs to be workemen, &c.

The king suspended by the archbishop. Edwin an enemie vnto monks.

And after a few other words of like effect, wherein he doth declare the heauie burthen of his office, it followeth after this manner.

Monks put out, and secular priests placed in their roomes.

Wherfore most humbly & one vnworthie, but yet a deuout fellow brother of yours, I beseech and exhort your holines, that you will not shew your selues cold & negligent in the cure and regiment of soules, so that in the time of the fearfull iudgement, the Lord do not complaine of you, saying: My shepheards did not feed my flocke, but they fed themselues. And againe: They were princes of my flocke, and I knew not of it. But rather let vs take heed and be diligent ouer the houshold of the Lord, ouer which he hath set vs to be the leaders, to giue them meate and true measure of corne in time conuenient: that is to say, whole-wholesome doctrine. And although vpon mine owne demerits or worthinesse I doe not presume to comfort or exhort any man: but as one being vnworthie and faultie in transgressions innumerable, am glad, and stand in need rather to bee strengthened by your brotherly admonitions: yet for the ancient authoritie of my predecessors, as of Augustine of happie memorie, and also of all other saints, by whose industrie the rule of christianitie did first flourish and spring from this metropolitan see vnto all quarters of England: therefore I haue thought good to direct vnto you these my letters to the profit of you all: especially, for that our renowned and princely king Edmund, with all his people, doth ioy to follow that which he heareth in you and of you: and also, for so much as all his subiects which be vnder his imperiall dominion, doe loue and delight to follow most ioyfully the fame and report of your sincere conuersation, &c.

This Odo continued bishop the space of twentie yeares. After whom Elfinus was elected and ordained by the king to succed through fauour and money: but in going to Rome for the popes pall, in his iourney through the Alps, he deceased and died so: cold. Whereupon succeeded Dunstan, as in time and place (by the leaue of Christ) followeth to be declared.

This Edmund gaue to S. Edmund the martyr before mentioned, the towne of Wedjchechworth, which is now called S. Edmundsbury, with great reuenues and lands appertaining to the same. But concerning the friuolous miracles which our monkish story-writers here faine of this good Edmund, by the way (or rather out of the way) I let them passe.

And thus much concerning the reigne of king Edmund, who after he had reigned six yeares and a halfe, was slaine, as is said, at Pulcherchurch, and buried at Glastenburie of Dunstan: leauing behind him two children, Edwin and Edgar, by his wife Elgina. But because the foresaid children were yet young and vnder age, therfore Edred brother to king Edmund, and vncle to the children, gouerned as protector about the space of nine yeares and a halfe, till Edwin the eldest sonne came to age. This Edred with great moderation and fidelity to the young children behaued himselfe, during the time of his gouernment. In his time Dunstan was promoted through the means of Oda the archbishop, from abbat of Glastenburie, to bee bishop of Worcester, and after of London. By the counsell of this Dunstan, Edred was much ruled, and to much thereto addicted: in so much that the foresaid Edred is reported in stories to submit himselfe vnto much fond penance and castigations, inflicted to him of the said Dunstan. Such religious deuotion was then in princes, and more blind superstition in bishops. And here againe is another miracle as fantasticall as the other before, forged of Dunstan, that when that Edred being sicke, sent for Dunstan to be his confessor, by whom Dunstan should heare a voice declaring to him before, that Edred was already departed, at the declaring whereof Dunstans horse fell immediatly dead vnder him, with tile and all.

King Edwin.

EDwin the eldest sonne of king Edmund afore mentioned, after his vncle Edred, began his reigne about the yeare of our Lord 955, being crowned at Kingston by Odo the archbishop of Canturburie. Of this Edwin it is reported of diuers writers, that the first day of his coronation, sitting with his lords, he shake suddenly from them, entred a secret chamber, to the companie of a certaine woman whom hee inordinately retained (being, as some say, another mans wife) whose husband he had before slaine, as others say being of his alliance, to the great mislliking of his lords, and especially of the clergie. Dunstan was not yet but abbat of Glastenburie, who following the king into the chamber, brought him out by the hand, and accused him to Oda the archbishop, causing him to be separat from the companie of the foresaid partie; by the which Oda, the king was for his fact suspended out of the church. By reason whereof, the king being with Dunstan displeased, banished him his land, and forced him for a season to flie into Flanders, where he was in the monasterie of saint Amandus. About the same season the monasticall order of Benedict monks, or blacke monks (as they were called) began to multiple and increase here in England. In so much that where before time other priests and canons had been placed, these monks were in their roomes set in, and the secular priests (as they then were called, or canons) put out. But king Edwin, for the displeasure he bare to Dunstan, did so ber all the order of the said monks, that in Malmsburie, Glastenburie, and other places more, he thrust out the monks, and set in secular priests in their stead.

The death of king Edwin.

Notwithstanding, it was not long but these priests and canons were againe removed, and the said monks in their stead restored, both in the foresaid houses, and in diuers other churches cathedrall besides, as in the next leafe of king Edgar (Christ willing) shall more at large appeare.

In fine, king Edwin being hated by reason of certaine his demeanors of all his subiects (especially the Northumbrians and Mercians) was by them removed from his kingly honor, and his brother Edgar in his stead receiued, so that the riuer of Thames diuided both their kingdoms. Which Edwin after he had reigned about the tearme of foure yeares departed, leauing no heire of his body. Wherefore the rule of the land fell vnto Edgar his younger brother.

King Edgar.

EDgar the second sonne of Edmund and brother to Edwin, being of the age of fiftene yeares, began his reigne ouer the realme of England, in the yeare of our Lord 959. but was not crowned till fourtene yeares after: the causes whereof here vnder follow, Christ willing) to be declared. In the beginning of his reigne hee called home Dunstan, whom king Edwin before had exiled. Then was Dunstan, which before was abbat of Glastenburie, made bishop of Worcester, and then of London. Not long after, this Odo archbishop of Canturburie deceased, after hee had gouerned that church 24 yeares. After whom Withilmus bishop of Winchester first was elected; but because he was thought not sufficient to furnish that roome, Dunstan was ordeined archbishop, the other sent home againe to his old church. Where note by the way, how in those daies the donation and assigning of ecclesiasticall dignities remained in the kings hand, only they set their pall from Rome as a token of the popes confirmation. So Dunstan being by the king made archbishop, take his iourney to Rome for his pall of pope Iohn the 13. which was about the beginning of the kings reigne. Thus Dunstan obtaining his pall, shortly after his returne againe from Rome, intreateth king Edgar, that Oswaldus (who, as is said, was made monke at Floriake, and was nephue to Odo late bishop of Canturburie) might bee promoted to the bishopris of Worcester; which thing to him was granted. And not long after, though the meanes of the said Dunstan, Athelwolde (vpon Iodocus decease) to be the great patron of monkerie) first monke at Glastenburie, then abbat of Abendon, was also made bishop of Winchester. Of this Ethelwaldus, Gulielmus libro de gestis pontificum recordeth, that what time he was a monke in the house of Glastenburie, the abbat had a vision of him, which was this: How that there appeared to him in his sleepe a certaine great tree, the branches whereof extended throughout all the foure quarters of the realme, which branches were all couered with many little monks coules, other in the top of y tree was one great mitre coule, which in spreading it selfe ouer the other coules, inclosed all the tree, which mitre coule in the tree top, mine author thinketh in the interpretation applieth to the life of this Ethelwold. Of such prodigious fantasies our monkish historics be full; and not only our historics of England, but also the heathen stories of the gentiles bee stuffed with such kind of dreames of much like effect.

Of such a like dreame we read of the mother of Athelstan, how the mone did spring out of his wombe, and gaue light to all England. Also of king Charles the emperor, how he was led by a thief to see the torments of hell. Likewise of Furceus the hermite mentioned in the third booke of Beda, who saw the tops of heauen & the foure fires that should destroy the world: the one of lying, for breaking our promise made at baptisme; the second fire was of the couetous; the third of dissention; the fourth was of the fire of iniquitie and wrongfull dealing. Item in like sort of the dreame of Dunstan, and of the same Ethelwold, to whom appeared the three bishops, Wilfanus, Wilrinus and Swithinus, &c. Of the dreame of the mother of this Ethelwold, who being great with him, did see a golden eagle flie out of his mouth, &c. Of the dreame likewise, or the vision of king Edgar concerning the falling of the two apples, and of the pots one being full of water, the other empte, &c. Also of king Edward the confessor, touching the ruine of the land by the conquerors of the Normans. We reade also in the historie of Assiages, how hee dreamed of Cyrus, and likewise of many other dreames in the bookes of the monks, and of the ethnike writers. For what cannot either the vile dalitie of mans head, or the deception of the lying spirit worke by man, in foresheming such earthly euents as happen commonly in this present world? But here is a difference to bee vnderstood betweene these earthly dreames, speaking of earthly things, and matters of humaine superstition; and betweene other spirituall relations sent by God touching spirituall matters of the church pertaining to mans saluation. But to our purpose, by this dreame, and by the euent which followed after, it may appeare how and by what meanes the multitude of monks, began first to swarme in the churches of England: that is, in the daies of this Edgar, by the meanes of these three bishops, Dunstan, Ethelwold, and Oswold. Albeit Dunstan was the chiefest ringleader of this race; yet Ethelwold being moto bishop of Winchester, and Oswold bishop of Worcester here next mentioned behind for their parts. By the infligation and counsell of these three aforesaid, king Edgar is recorded in histories to build either new out of the ground, or to redifie monasteries decayed by the Danes more then forte. As the house of Elie, Glastenburie, Abbington, Burga by Stamford, Thorney, Ramsey, Milton, Wenton, Winchcombe, Thamsforde in Deuonshire, with diuers more. In the setting vp and building of the which the foresaid Ethelwold was a great doer and a founder vnder the king. Moreouer, through the motion of this Dunstan and his fellowes, king Edgar in diuers great houses and cathedral churches, where prebendaries and priests were before, displaced the priests and set in monks. Whereof wee read in the chronicles of Roger Houeden, in words and forme as followeth:

Hic namque Ethelwoldus regem, cuius eximius erat consiliarius, ad hoc maximè prouocauit, vt clericos a monasterijs expelleret, & monachos sanctimonialesq; in eis collocaret, &c. that is, Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, who was then one of the kings counsell, did vrge the king chiefly to expell clerkes out of monasteries, and in their roomes to bestow monks and nunnes, &c. Whereunto accordeth likewise Historia Iornalensis, conteyning the like effect in these words: Hoc anno Ethelwoldus Wint. & Oswaldus Wigornienſis, epiſcopi, iuſſu regis Edgari (clericis de quibuſdam maioribus eccleſijs expulſis) monachos inſtituerunt, aut de eiſdem clericis & alijs monachos in eiſdem fecerunt. Gulielmus also writing of the time of Dunstan, maketh the matter some what more plaine, where he saith: Itaq; clerici multarum eccleſiarum data optione, vt aut amictum mutarent, aut locis valedicerent, melioribus habitaculis vacue facientes: ſurgebant itaque in tota inſula religioſorum monaſteria, cumulabantur mole pretioſi metalli ſanctorum altaria, &c. Thus the secular priests being put to their choice, whether to change their habit, or to leaue their roomes, departed out of their houses, giuing place for other better men to come in. Then the houses and monasteries of religious men through all the realme went vp apace, &c.

Oswold bishop of Worcester, and archbishop of Yorke.

The policie of Oswald in driuing out priests to place in monks.

> Anno 969 God. 1. 2. de geſt. pont. Chr. Iornalenſ. in vita Edgari.

After the kings mind was thus persuaded and incited by these bishops to aduance monkery, then Oswoldus bishop of Worcester, and also made archbishop of Yorke after the decease of Odilettus, Sui voti compos effectus (as Houeden writeth) hauing his see in the cathedrall church here of S. Peter, began first with faire persuasions to allay the minds of the canons and priests, whether they could be content to change their profession and to be made monks, or no. Which when hee saw it would not take effect, he practised this policie with them. There to the said church of S. Peter, within the churchyard he erected another church of our Ladie, which when hee had replenished with monks, there he continually frequented, there hee kept, there he sat, and was euer there conuersant. By reason whereof the other church was left naked and desolate, and all the people gathered there where the bishop was. The priests seeing themselues so to bee left and neglected both of the bishop and of the people, to whom nothing remained but shame and contempt, were driuen of shame either to relinquith the house (such as would not enter the monkish profession) or else to become monks, such as had nothing else to lay vpon. After the like superstition (although not after the same subtilitie) did Ethelwold also driue out the canons and priests from the new monasterie in Winchester, afterward called Hida, and placed his monks. So in Oxford and in Gildune, with diuers other places more, the secular priests with their wiues were expelled, to giue place to monks. The cause whereof is thus pretended in certains storie-writers, whom I see also Fabian to follow: for that the priest and clerkes were thought slacke and negligent in their church seruice, and set in vicars in their stead, while they liued in pleasure, & inſtipend the patrimony of the church after their owne lust. Then king Edgar gaue to the vicars the same land which before belonged to the prebendaries, who also not long after shewed themselues as negligent as the others. Wherfore king Edgar (as mine authors write) by the consent of pope Iohn the thirteenth voided clerely the priests, and ordained there monks. Although certaine of the nobles, and some of the prelats were therewith not well contented, as in the chapter following may partly appeare.

Prebendaries and priests slacke in their duite.

Priests voided of cathedrall churches, and monks set in.

The difference, order, and institution of monks examined.

But for so much as wee haue entred into the mention of monks and nuns, and of their profession, which I see so greatly in our moniſh stories commended: lest perhaps the simple reader may be deceiued therby, in hearing the name of monks in all histories of times to be such an ancient thing in christian life, euen from the primitiue church after the apostles time, both commonly recited & well received: therefore to helpe the iudgement of the ignorant, and to preuent all error herein, it shall not be vnprofitable, in following the present occasion here giuen (by way of a little digression) to intermeddle some what concerning the originall institution of monks, what they were in the old time which were called Monachi, wherein the monks of the primitiue time did differ from the monks of the middle time, and from these our monks now of this latter age: moreouer, wherein all these three do differ from priests (as we call them) and from men of the clergie. Wherfore to answere to the superstitious scruple of such, which allege the old antiquity of the name & title of monks: first I grant the name and order of monks to be of old continuance, bearing neere from the time of 300 yeres after Christ. Of whom diuers old authors do record, as Augustinus, Hieronymus, Basilius Magnus, who was also himselfe one of the first institutors and commenders of that superstition, Chryſoſtomus, Nazianzenus, Cuagrius, Sozomenus, Dionyſius, and diuers others. In the number of these monks (which there were diuided into heremits or anachorits, and into Coenobits) were Antonius, Paulus, Johannes, with diuers other recluses. Among the which was Hieronie, Basil, Macharius, Illarius, Pambus, Eſtammon, Simeon, with infinite others both in Palestina, Syria, Thebaide, Mesopotamia, in Egypt, in Africa and in Scythia. In so much that Cassianus lib. 2. cap. 4. De Canon. Nocturn. orat. maketh mention of a certaine monasterie in Thebaide, wherein were aboue 5000 monks, vnder the gouernment of one abbat. And here also in England mention is made before of Bangor, wherein were two thousand and two hundred monks vnder one maner ruling, in the yeare of our Lord 596. Whereby it appeareth that monks were then, and two hundred yeares before, in the primitiue time of the church. But what monks these were, is to be considered: such as either by tyrannie of persecution were driuen into solitarie and desert places, or else such as not constreined of any, but of their owne voluntarie deuotion (ioyned with some superstition among, for the loue they had vnto spirituall contemplation, and for hatred of the wicked world) swithdrew themselues from all companie, either hauing nothing to themselues proper, or else all things common with others. And all these were then nothing else but lay men: of which laymen, there were two sundrie sorts, one of the vulgar and common people, which onely were partakers of the sacraments; the other in following a monasticall kind of life, were called monks (being nothing but lay men) leading a more seuere and stricter trade of life then the others, as may sufficiently appeare by August. lib. de moribus eccleſiæ, cap. 13. Item, lib. de operibus monachorum. Item, epiſtola ad Aurelium. Also by Hierome ad Heliodorum, writting these words: Alia monachorum eſt cauſa, alia clericorum; clerici paſcunt oues, ego paſcor, &c: that is, One thing pertaineth to monks, an other thing to them of the clergie; they of the clergie feed their flock, I am fed, &c. Ex ex Dionyſio. Also the same appeareth likewise by the fourth canon of the councell of Chalcedon, where it is prouided, Nemo nachi se eccleſiaſtici negotijs immisceant: that is, That monks should not intermeddle with matters of the church, &c. Et Leo epiſtola 62. vetat monachos & laicos, etſi ſcientiæ nomine glorientur, admitti ad officium docendi & concionandi.

By these foresaid authors alleaged, it is euident, that monks in the former age of the church, albeit they liued a solitarie life, yet they were then no other but onely lay men, differing from priests, and differing from the other monks which succeeded them afterwards in the middle age of the church, and that in three points: First, they were tied and bound to no prescript forme either of diet or apparell, or any thing else, as we may see testified by the words of saint Augustine, which be these: Neque inter hæc nemo vrgetur in aſpera, quæ ferre non poteſt: milli quod recuſat imponitur. Nec ideo contemnitur à cæteris, in quod eis imitandis se fatetur inualidum. Meminerunt enim quantoperè commendata ſit in ſcripturis charitas. Meminerunt omnia munda mundis, &c. Non quod intrat in os coinquinat hominem, ſed quod exit. Itaque non reijciendis generibus ciborum, quaſi pollutis, ſed concupiſcentiæ perdomandæ, & dilectioni fratrum retinendæ imiginilat omnis industria. And Sozomen. lib. 3. cap. 16. Speaking of the monks of the same time, which in cities had seuerall mansions from others, saith: Alij in urbe ciuitatum conuerſabantur, ſic ſeipſos gerentes, vt nullius momenti viderentur, & à mulcis nihil differrent, &c. Some liue in cities so behauing themselues, as seeming nothing worth, and they differed nothing from the multitude, &c. The second point wherein they were discrepant from the latter monks was, in that they remained no other but in the order of lay men (onely being of a stricter life then the rest) and had nothing to doe in matters and charges eccleſiaſtical: which was afterward broken by pope Boniface the fourth, as followeth (the Lord willing) to be seene and said. Thirdly, the foresaid monks of that age (albeit the most part of them liued sole and single from wiues) yet some of them were married: certes none of them were forbidden or restrained from marriage. Of such as were married speaketh Athanasius in epiſtola ad Dracontium, qui ait ſe nouiſſe & monachos & epiſcopos coniuges & liberorum patres, &c: that is, Which saith, that he knew both monks and bishops married men, and fathers of children, &c.

And yet the said monks of the old time, though they were better then the other which followed them; yet all that notwithstanding, superstition with them and among them began then to creepe into the church through the craftie subtilitie of Satan, and all for the ignorance of our free iuſtification by faith in Jesus Christ. Examples do declare the paine and prodigious superstition of these monasticall sort of men: which examples doe not lacke, if leisure rather did not lacke to bring them in. But two or three shall suffice for many, which I purpose (the Lord willing) here to inſert, to the intent the mind of the godly reader may the better consider and vnderstand, how shortly after the time of Christ and his apostles, the doctrine of christian iuſtification began to be forgotten, true religion turned to superstition, and the price of Christs passion to bee obscured through the vaine opinion of mens merits, &c. A certaine abbat named Moses thus testifieth of himselfe in the collations of Cassianus, that he so afflicted himselfe with much fasting & watching, that sometimes for two or three daies together, not onely hee felt no

Superstition crept in with monkerie.

The ignorance of our free iuſtification by Christ is the cause of all superstition.

Ex Cassia. capit. 17. collat. 2.

no appetite to eat, but also had no remembrance of any meat at all, and by reason thereof was driuen also from sleep. In so much that hee was caused to pray to God but for a little refreshing of sleepe to be giuen him some peece of the night. In the same author mention is made of a certaine old man an heremit, who because he had conceiued in himselfe such a purpose neuer to eat meat, without he had some ghest or stranger with him, sometime was constrained to abstaine fiue daies together vntill sunday, while he came to the church, and there brought some stranger or other home with him.

Two other examples yet more vsuall I adde out of the said Cassianus, to declare how the subtilty of Satan through superstition and false colour of holinesse, blindeth the miserable cities of such, which rather attend mens traditions then the word of God. In the fortith chapter of the said author, in his book De agrimargia, is told of a certaine abbat named Joannes, in the desert wilderness of Scythia, who sent two of his nouices with figs vnto one that was sicke in the wilderneſſe eighteen miles off from the church. It chanced these two young nouices missing the way, wandered so long in the wilde forest or wilderness and could not find the cell, that for emptinesse and weariness they waxed faint and tired: and yet rather would they die then taste the figs committed to them to carry, and so did: for thorough after they were found dead, their figs lying whole by them.

Another story he also reciteth of two monasticall brethren, who making their progresse in the desert of Thebaide, purposed with themselues to take no sustenance but such as the Lord should minister himselfe vnto them. It happened as they were wandering desolat in the desert, and fainting almost for penury, certaine Mayles, a kind of people by nature fierce & cruell, notwithstanding being suddenly altered into a new nature of humanity, came forth, and of their owne accord offered bread vnto them: which bread the one thankfully receiued as sent of God, the other as counting it sent of man, and not of God, refused it, and so for lack perished.

Hereunto might I also annex the story of Mucius, who to declare his obedience, did not sticke at the commandement of his abbat, to call his sonne into the water, not knowing whether any were appointed there ready to rescue him from drowning; so far were the monks in those daies drowned in superstition. What is this, but for mans traditions and conuandements to transgresse the commandement of God, which saith: Thou shalt do no murther; Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God? What man is so blind that seeth not by these and infinit examples more, what pernicious superstition hath begun by reason of this monkery, almost from the beginning, to creep in to the church? Wherein I cannot marueil enough, seeing that age of the church had in it so many learned doctors, who could not only did approue and allow these monasticall sects of life, but also certaine themselues were the authors and institutors of the same, yea and of mens traditions made the seruice of God. In number of whom may be reckoned Basilius Magnus, and Nazianzenus, who with immoderate austerity did so pluck downe themselues, that when they were called to the office of bishops, they were not able to sustaine the labor thereof.

Monks of the middle and latter age of the church.

After these foresaid monks of that time aboue rehearsed, followed other monks of the middle age of the church; who as in multitude, so also in superstition increasing, began by little and little from their desolat dens in the dark wildernesse, to approch more neere to great townes; where they had solemn monasteries founded by kings & queenes, and kings daughters, and other rich consuls, as is partly before touched; and the causes also touched withall, for the which they were first founded, as these: Pro remedio animæ meæ, pro remiſſione peccatorum meorum, pro redemptione peccatorum meorum, & pro ſalute regnorum, quiquemeo ſubiacent regimini populorum, in honorem glorioſæ virginis, &c. For all these impious and erroneous titles and causes we find alleged in stories, as in Palmelius burienſis, Jornalenſis, Henricus, & others more. In which histories I also note, that the most part of these aforesaid monasteries were erected first vpon some great murther, either by war in the field, or priuatly committed at home, as shall well appeare to them which read their bookes whom I haue alleged. But to returne to our monks againe, who (as is said) first began to creep from the cold field into warme townes and cloſters, from townes then into cities, and at length from their cloſe cels and cities into cathedral churches (as here appeareth by this story of king Edgar) where, not only they did abound in wealth and riches (especially these monks of our latter time) but much more did swim in superstition and Phariſaicall hypocriſie, being puffed and tied in all their doings, to certaine prescript rules and formall obseruances: in watching, in sleeping, in eating, in rising, in praying, in walking, in talking, in looking, in tasting, in touching, in handling, in their gestures, in their vestures, carry man apparelled not as the proper condition of others would require, nor as the season of the yere did serue, but as the coated rules and order of euery sect did inforce them. The number of which sects was infinitly diuers: some after Basilius rule went in white: some after Benets rule in blacke: some Cluniacenses, first set vp by Otho in the time of this king Edgar, wearing after the rule of Benets order: some after Hieronimes rule, leather girded, and coped about their white cote: some Gregorians, copper colored: some Dealle vmbrosa, grap monks: some Grandmontenſes, wearing a cote of mailes vpon their bare bodies, with a black cloke thereupon: some Celterians, who had white rochets on a black cote: some Celtines all in blew, both cloke, coule and cap: some Charter monks, wearing haircloth next their bodies: some Flagellants going bare foot in long white linnen shirts, with an open place in the backe, where they beat themselues with scourges on the bare skin euery day before the peoples eies, till the blood ran downe, saying that it was reuealed to them by an angell, that in so scourging themselues, within thirty daies and twelue houres, they should be made so pure from sinne, as they were when they first receiued baptisme: some Shaued monks: some Jesuits with a white girdle and a ruffet coule. Briefly, who can reckon the innumerable sects & disguised orders of their fraternities? some holding of S. Benet, some of S. Hierome, some of S. Basil, some of S. Bernard, some of S. Bridget, some of S. Bruno, some of S. Lewis, as though it were not enough for christians to hold of Christ only. So subiect were they to seruile rules, that no part of christian liberty remained among them; so drowned and sunke in superstition, that not only they had lost Christs religion, but also almost the sense and nature of men. For where men naturally are and ought to be ruled by the discreet gouernment of reason in all outward doings, wherein no one rule can serue for all men: the circumstance of time, place, person, and businesse being so sundry and diuers: contrary among these, no reason but only the knacke of a bell ruled all their doings, their rising, their sleeping, their praying, their eating, their comming in, their going out, their talking, their silence, and altogether like insensible people, either not hauing reason to rule themselues, or else as persons vngratefull to God, neither inioying the benefit of reason created in them, nor yet vsing the grace of Christs liberty, whereunto he redeemed them.

Monks are subiect and ruled by the knocke of a bell.

Thus thou seest (gentle reader) sufficiently declared, what the monks were in the primitiue time of the church, and what were the monks of the middle age, and of these our latter daies of the church. Whereunto to ioyne this withall, that where the monks of elder time (as is said) were mere lay men and no spirituall ministers; afterward Bonifacius the fourth made a decree, An. 606, that monks might vse the office of preaching, of christening, of hearing confessions, and also of absoluing them of their sinnes, &c. So then monks, who in the beginning were but lay men, and no spirituall ministers, forbidden by the generall councell of Chalcedon (as is aboue related) to intermeddle with matters ecclesiasticall; afterward in processe of time, did so much intrude vpon the office of spirituall ministers, that at length the priests were discharged out of their cathedrall churches, and monks set in their places: because that monks in those daies leading a stricter life, and professing chastity, had a greater countenance of holinesse among the people then the priests, who then in the daies of king Edgar had wiues (at least so many as would) no law forbidding them to the contrare, till the time of Hildebrand, now called Gregory the seuenth, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in the booke next following.

Monks made spirituall ministers, contrary to the old decrees and custome of the church.

Priests in king Edgars time had wiues.

And thus much by the way, as touching the order and profession of monks. Now to turne in againe from whence we digressed, that is, to the matter of king Edgar, who following the counsell and leading of Dunstan, and the foresaid Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, was some what thereby inclined to superstition: but otherwise of his owne nature well giuen to all vertues and princely acts worthy of much commendation and famous memory. So excellent was he in iustice, and sharp in correction of vices (as well in his magistrates as of other subiects) that never before his daies was lesse seldomy by robbers, nor lesse extortion or bribery by false officers. Such prouinces and lordships as were not yet come vnder the kings subiection, he vnited and adioyned to his dominion: and so made one perfect monarchy of the whole realme of England, with all the Iands and borders about the same. Such as were wicked, he kept vnder, he repressed them that were rebels, the godly he maintained, he loued the modest, hee was deuout to God, and beloued of his subiects, whom he gouerned in much peace and quietnesse. And as he was a great seeker of peace, so God did blesse him with much abundance of peace and rest from all wars: so that as the story recordeth of him, Nullas infidias domeſticorum, nullum exterminium alienorum ſenſerit, for the which he was called Pacificus. He neither tasted of any privy treason among his subiects; nor of any invasion of forren enemies. So studious he was of the publike profit of his realme, and fruitfull in his gouernment, that as the said story testifieth of him, Nullus fere annus in chronicis præterijt, quo non magnum & neceſſarium patriæ aliquid fecerit: No yere passed in all the time of his raigne, wherein he did not some singular and necessary commodity for the commonwealth, &c. A great maintainer he was of religion and learning, not forgetting therein the forsteps of king Alfred his predecessor. Among his other princely vertues this chiefly is to bee regarded, that whereas other princes commonly in much peace and quietnes are wont to growe into a dissolute negligence of life, or oblivion of their charge committed vnto them: this king in continu-continuance of peace (that notwithstanding) kept euer with him such a watch, and a vigilant security ioined with a seemely elemencie, that I cannot here but recite the witnesse of our history-writers, testifying of his diligent care ouer the commonwealth, which was so great, Vt nullum cuiuscunque dignitatis hominem leges eludere impune permitteret: that is, That hee would suffer no man, of what degree of nobilitie so euer hee were, to bally out his lawes without condigne punishment, &c. And followeth more in the same author: Nemo eius tempore priuatus latro, nemo popularis praedo, nisi qui malles in fortunas alienas grassari propriae vitae dispendio, &c. In all his time there was neither any priuy picker, nor open theefe, but he that in stealing other mens goods, would venture and hazard his owne life (as he was sure) the losse of his owne life, &c. Guliel. de reg.

Moreouer, as the fruitious industry of this prince was forward in all other points, so his prudent prouision did not lacke in this also, in deuising out the deuouring and rauening wolues throughout all his land. Wherein he shed this policie, in causing Ludwallus prince or king of Wales, to yeeld to him yerely by way of tribute three hundred wolues. By meanes whereof, within the space of foure yeres after in England & Wales, might scarcely be found one wolfe aliue.

This Edgar among other of his politike deeds, had in readinesse 3600 ships of warre, to scoure the seas in the summer time, whereof 1200 kept the east seas, as many to defend the west side, against as many on the south seas, to repulse the inuasion of forren enemies. Moreouer, in winter season, the vse and manner of this vertuous king was this: During all the time of his life, to ride ouer the land in progresse, searching and inquiring diligently (to vse here the words of mine author) Quomodo legum iura, & suorum statuta decretorum obseruarentur: & ne pauperes à potentibus praeiudicium passi opprimerentur: that is, How his lawes and statutes by him ordained were kept, and that the poore should suffer no preiudice, or be oppressed by any manner of waies by the mightier, &c. Briefly, as I see many things in this worthy prince to be commended, so this one thing in him I cannot but lament, to see him like a phenix to flie alone, that of all his posterity so few there be that seeke to keepe him company. And although I haue hetherto more already of this king, then I thinke will well be followed, yet this more is to bee added to the worthinesse of his other acts, that whereas by the multitude of the Danes dwelling in diuers places of England, much excessiue drinking was vsed, whereupon insued drunkennesse and many other vices, to the euill example and hurt of his subiects: her therefore to preuent that euill, ordained certaine cups with pins or nailes set in them, adding thereunto a law, that what persons drank past that marke at one draught, should forfet a certaine penny, whereof one halfe should fall to the accuser, and the other halfe to the ruler of the borough or towne, where the offence was done.

It is reported of this Edgar by diuers authors, that about the thirteenth yere of his raigne, hee being at Chester, eight kings (called in histories Subreguli) to wit, petie kinges, or vnder kings, came and did homage to him. Of whom the first was the king of Scots, called Kinadius, Dacolinus of Cumberland, Mackus or Maxcolinus king of Monia, and of diuers other Iles: and all the kings of Wales, the names of whom were Dufnall, or Dunewaldus, Siferth, Huwall, Jacob, Michel, Juchel. All which kings after they had giuen their fidelity to Edgar, the next day following (for a pompe or ostite) he erected with these aforesaid kings into the riuer of Dee, there setting in a boat, take the role of the helme, and caused these eight kings, euery person taking an ore in his hand, to row him vp and downe the riuer to and from the church of S. Johns, vnto his palace againe, in token that he was master and lord of so many prouinces: whereupon hee is reported to haue said in this manner. Tunc demum poste successores suos gloriari, reges Angliae esse, cum tanta praerogatiua honoris & dignitatis vigere. In my mind this king had said much better, if he had rather said with S. Paul, Absit mihi gloriari, nisi in cruce Domini nostri Iesu Christi.

And thus we haue heard hitherto touching the commendation of king Edgar, such reports as the old monkish writers thought to be false vnto him. as that he great patron of their monkish religion, who had builded so many monasteries for them, as were sundaies in the yere, as some say: or as Edmer reporteth, but forty and eight.

Now on the other side, what vices in him were reigning, let vs likewise consider, according as we finde in the said authors described, which make vnto to his aduancement. Whereof the first vice is noted to be enuie, as well vpon others, as namely vpon a certaine earle being of his secret counsell, called Athelwold. The storie is this: Odgarus duke of Deuonshire, had a certaine daughter named Elfrida, whose beautie being highly commended to the king, he being inflamed therewith, sent this foresaid Athelwold (whom he especially trusted) to the parts, to see and to bring him word againe and if her beauty were such as was reported, willing him also to make the match betweene them. Athelwold well bidding the party, and seeing her beauty nothing inferior to her fame, and thinking first to serue his owne turne, told all things contrarie vnto the king. Whereupon the king withdrawing his mind otherwise, in the end it came to passe that Athelwold himselfe did marry her.

Not long after, the king vnderstanding further by the complaints and rumors of certaine how he was preuented and beguiled, set a faire face vpon the matter before Athelwold, and merily iesting with him, told him how he would come and see his wife, and indeed appointed the day when he would be there. Athelwold the husband perceiuing this matter to goe hardly with him, made hast to his wife, declaring to her the comming of the king, and also opening the whole order of the matter how he had done, desired her of all loue, as she would saue his life, to disgrace and beforme her selfe with garments and such attire, as the king might take no delighting in her. Elfrida hearing this, what did she, but contrary to the request of her husband, and promise of a wife, against the kings comming, trimmed her selfe at the glasse, and decked her in her best array. Whom when the king beheld, he was not so much enamoured with her, as in hatred with her husband, who had so deceiued him. Whereupon the king vpon after, making as though he would go to hunt in the forest of Hartwood, sent for Athelwold to come to him vnder the pretence of hunting, and there ran him through and slew him. After this, the villain son of Athelwold comming to him, the king likewise him slew for his hard hunting: Who answered againe, that which pleaseth the king, ought not to displease him: for the death of which Athelwold, Elfrida afterward builded a monastery of nuns in remission of sinnes.

Another fault which Malmsbury noteth in him, was the comming in of strangers into this land, as Saxons, Flemmings and Danes, whom he with great familiarity retained to the great detriment of this land, as the foresaid story of Salmesbury recordeth, whose words be these: Vndè factū est, vt fama eius per ora omniū volitante, alienigenæ, Saxones, Flandrici, ipsi etiam Dani huc frequenter annauigarent, Edgaro familiares effecti. Quorū aduentus magnum prouinciālibus detrimentū peperit. Inde meritò iureq; reprehendit eum historiæ, &c. That is: Whereby it happened that diuers strangers out of forren countries allured by his fame came into the land, as Saxons, Flemmings, and Danes also, all which he retained with great familiarity. The comming of which strangers bred great damage to the realme, and therefore is Edgar iustly blamed in stories, &c. With the which reprehension, all the Saxon stories also do agree.

The third vice to him obiected, was his incontinent and lasciuious luste in beflowing maids, as first of a dukes daughter being a nun, and a virgin named Wilfrida, or Wilfrude: of which Wilfride was borne Editha a bastard daughter of Edgar. Also of another certaine virgin in the towne of Andwar, who by his priuie conueied into his bed by this meanes: The lasciuious king comming to Andwar not far from Winchester, and thinking to haue his pleasure of a certaine dukes daughter, of whose beauty he heard much speaking, commanded the maid to be brought into him. The mother of the virgin greeting to haue her daughter made a concubine, secretly by night conueied to the kinges bed in stead of her daughter, another maiden of beauty and fauour not vncomely: vpon the morning rising to her worke, and so being knowne of the king what she was, had granted vnto her of the king such liberty and fauour, that of a seruant she was made an Alderman both to her master, and also to her mistresse. Ex Matthæo Paris. lib. de regib.

Another concubine he had also besides these aforesaid, which was Egelfleda or Elfleda called Candida, the white daughter of duke Ormere (as Guliel. Malmsbur. recordeth) the being also a professed nun, of whom he begot Edward in bastardy: for the which fact he was inioined by Dunstan seuen yeres penance. After which penance being compleat, then he toke to him a lawfull wife (as Malmsbur. writeth) Elfride, the mother of Edmund and Ethelred, as otherwise called Egelred, whereof more shall be said the Lord willing hereafter.

Ouer and beside all these vices noted and obiected to king Edgar in our monkish story-writers, I also obserue another no lesse, or rather greater vice then the other afore recited, which was, blind superstition and idolatrous monkery brought into the church of Christ, with the vnwarrantable expelling of lawfull married priests out of their houses. Whereupon what inconueniences insued after in this realme, especially in the house of the Lord, I leaue it to the consideration of them which haue heard of the detestable enormities of those religious votaries: the occasion whereof, first and chiefly began in this Edgar, through the instigation of Dunstan and his fellowes, who after they had inueigled the king, and halfed him both to their purpose, they caused him to call a councell of the clergy: where it was enacted, that the canons of diuers cathedrall churches collegiars, persons, vicars, priests and deacons, with their wiues and children, either should giue ouer that kind of life, or else giue vp their roomes vnto monks, &c. For execution of which decree, two principall bishops were appointed, Athelwold or Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, and Dunstall bishop of Worcester, as is partly before touched. The seuing miracles of Elfled, Dunstan, and Editha, expounded.

And thus much concerning the history of king Edgar, and of such things as in his time hapned in the church; which Edgar after he had entred into the parts of Britannie to subdue the rebellion of the Welshmen, and there had spoiled the country of Glamorgan, and wasted the country of Rhos, within ten dates after, when he had reigned the space of sixteen yeres, died, and was buried at Glastenbury, leauing after him two bastards, to wit, Editha and Edward, and one some lawfully begotten named Ethelred, or otherwise by corruption called Egelred, for Edmund the Elder some died before his father.

Now heard before how king Edgar is noted in all stories to be an incontinent liuer in deflouring maids and virgins. Of which virgins, three notoriously are expressed in authors, to wit, Wilfride or Wilfride, the second was the dukes maid at Andwar, neere to Winchester, the third was Elfled mother of Edward, for the which Elfled he was staied & kept backe from his Coronation by Dunstan archbishop of Canturbury, the space of seuen yeres; and so the said king beginning his raigne in the sixteenth yer of his age, being the yere of the Lord 959, was crowned at his age one and thirty, An. Dom. 974. as is in the Saxon chronicle of Worcester church to be proued. For the more ratified declaration of which matter, concerning the coronation of the king restrained, and the presumptuous behauior of Dunstan against the king, and his penance by the said Dunstan inioined, ye shall heare both Osberne, Malmesb. and other authors speake in their owne words, as followeth. Perpetrato itaque in virginem velatam peccato, &c. After that burnt in aeternum. Item where a certaine great beame or masterpost was loosed out of the place, he with making the signe of a crosse, set it in right frame againe. Moreouer, how the said Dunstan being tempted vpon a time of the diuell with the cogitation of women, caught the diuell by the nose with a payre of tongs, and held him fast. Item, how oft heauenly spirits appeared to him, and vsed to talke with him familiarly. Item how he prophecied of the birth of king Edgar, of the death of king Egelred, of the death of Editha, and of Athelwald bishop of Winchester. Also how our lady with her fellowes appeared visibly to him singing this song: Cantemus domino socie, cantemus honorem: Dulcis amor Christi personet ore pio. Againe, how the angels appeared to him, singing the hymne called Kyrierex splendens, &c. And yet these prodigious fantasies with other more are written of him in chronicles, and haue been beleeued in churches.

Among manie other false and lying miracles, forged in this corrupt time of monkerie, the fabulous 97 rather fifth in legend of Editha were not to be ouerpassed, if so thanne and honestly it might well be recited. But to call the dirt of these popeholy monkes in their owne face, which so impudently haue abused the church of Christ, and simplicitie of the people, with their vngracious vanities; let vs see what this miracle is, and how honestlie it is told. Certaine yeares after the death of Editha, saith William of Malmesburie, which yeares Capgraue in his new legend reckoneth to be thirteene, the said Editha and also S. Denis holding her by the hand, appeared to Dunstan in a vision, willing and requiring him that the bodie of Editha in the church of Wilton, should be taken vp and shrined, to the intent it might be honored here in earth of her seruants, according as it is worshipped of her spouse in heauen. Dunstan vpon this comming frō Salisbury to Wilton, where Editha was interred, commanded her body to be taken vp with much honor and solemnitie. Who there in opening her tombe (as both Malmesburie and Capgraue with thame enough record) found all the whole body of this Editha consumed to earth, saue onely her thumbe, her belly, and the part vnder the belly. Whereof the said Editha expounding the meaning, declared that her thumbe remained sound, for the much crossing she vsed with the same. The other parts were incorrupted for a testimonie of her abstinence, and integritie, &c. Ex Malmes. & Capgrauo. What fatan hath so enuied the true sincerite of christian faith, and deuotion, as to contamminat the same with such impudent tales, such filthy vanities, and idolatrous fantasies as this? Such monkes with their detestable houses, where Christs people were so abominably abused and seduced to worship bead carcases of men and women, whether they deserued not to be raced and pluckt downe to the ground, let all shall readers iudge. But of these matters enough and to much.

King Edward called the Martyr.

Anno 975. Byshops of King Edward. Ex Simone Dunham.

AFter the death of Edgar no small trouble arose amongst the lords and bishops for succession of the crowne: the principall cause whereof rose vpon this occasion, as by the story of Simon of Durham and Roger Houeden is declared. Immediatly after the decease of the king, Alfericus duke of Mercia, and many other nobles which held with Egelred or Ethelred the only right heire and lawfull sonne of Edgar, mistaking the placing and intruding of monks into churches, and the thrusting out of the secular priests, with their wiues & children out of their ancient possessions, expelled the abbats and monks, and brought in again the forsaid priests with their wiues. Against whom, certaine other there were on the contrary part, that made resistance, as Ethelwine duke of Saffangles, Elfwoldus his brother, and the earle Withnothus, hauing in a counsell together assembled, that they would neuer suffer the religious monks to be expelled and driuen out of the realme, which held vp all religion in the land, and thereupon risen & seuied an armie, whereby to defend by force the monasterics, such as were within the precinct of Saffangila.

Contention amongst the lords for chasing the king.

In this hurly burly amongst the lords about the placing of monks and putting out of priests, rose also the contention about the crowne, who should be their king: the bishops and such lords as fauoured the monks, seeking to aduance such a king as they knew would incline to their side: so that the lords thus diuided, some of them would haue Edward, and some consented vpon Egelred the lawfull sonne. Then Dunstan archbishop of Canturbury, and Oswold archbishop of Yorke, with other their fellow bishops, abbats, and diuers other lords and nobles assembled in a counsell together, the whitch Dunstan at the last came comming in with his crosse in his hand, and bringing Edward before the lords, so perswaded them, that in the end Edward by Dunstans meanes was elected, consecrated, and anointed for their king.

Edward the bastard made king and the right heire put backe.

And thus hast thou (good reader) the very truth of this storie, according to the writing of authors of most antiquity which liued nereest to that age, as Osberne & others; which Osberne liuing in the daies of William Conqueror, wrote this story of Dunstan through the motion of Lanfrancus, and allegeth or rather translateth the same out of such Saxon stories as were written before his time. Writes which Osberne we haue also for witnesse hereof, Nicolas Triuet in his English story written in French, and also Joannes Paris in his French story written in the Latin tongue, where he plainly calleth Edward, Non legitimum filium, that is, No lawfull sonne. Whereunto adde moreouer the testimony of Vincentius and Antoninus, who in plaine termes like wise repeat the same.

Ex Osberno, Nic. Triuet, Ioan. Paris. Vincentio, Antonino.

Now hauing laid the foundation for the truth and ground of this matter, let vs come to examine how truly our latter writers do say, which write that Editha and not Edward, was the child for who Dunstan intoined to the king seuen yeres penance, and also how truly they report Edward to be a lawfull heire, and Elfled to be a lawfull wife to king Edgar.

Editha proued not to be the child for whom king Edgar was inioined penance.

For first touching Editha, this is confessed by the said writers themselues, that she was of good yeres at what time Edgar her father was inioined his penance. After the which seuen yeres of his penance expired, hee lined at the most but three yeres and a halfe, which seuen yeres and three yeres and a halfe, do make in all but ten yeres and a halfe. But now the said authors themselues do grant, that she was made abbesse by her father, he being then alme. And how can this then stand with her legend, which saith that she was not lesse than seuen yeres of age? By which account it must needs fall out, that she could not be so little as fiue yeres old, before the birth of that child for whom the king did penance.

The yeres of Editha and Swanild, call be the reputation of Ingen and Houeden.

And thus much touching Editha. Now in like manner to consider of the time of Edward: First, this by all writers is granted, that hee was slaine in the fifteenth yeere of his age. Which yeeres do well agree to that child which king Edgar begat in baſtardy, and for the which he did his penance: for the more euidence whereof, let vs come to the supputation of yeers in this sort.

The yeeres of Edward the bastard.

First, the penance of the king after the birth of this child, lasted seuen yeeres. Then the king after the same lined three yeeres and a halfe. After whose death Edward reigned other three yeeres and a halfe, which in all make the full summe of fourteen yeeres. About the count of which age, the said Edward going on his fifteenth yeere, by their owne reckoning was slaine.

King Edward called martyr, proued to be a bastard.

And thus haue ye by manifeſt demonstration proued by the right casting of the yeeres, after their owne grant and reckening, that Editha daughter of Ulfride was not the child for the child which was borne after Edward, and for whom the king was inioined penance: but that Edward rather was borne after Editha, and was the child for whom the penance was intoined: contrary to the opinion commonly received in the church, which for ignorance of the story hath hitherto holden Edward to be an holie martyr, and right heire vnto the crowne. Which error and opinion how it first sprung and by whom, albeit it pertaine not to my story to discusse, yet were it no hard matter to coniecture.

First after that Dunstan and Oswold with other bishops, abbats, and certaine lords and dukes of that faction, for the maintenance of monkery had aduanced Edward to be king, against queene Alfrith mother of Ethelred, and Alfericus duke of Mercia, and certaine other nobles which held the contrary side of the priests against the monks; in processe of time the monks that came after to write stories, perceiuing Dunstan to be reputed in the church of Rome for an holy saint, and the said king Edward for an holy martyr, and partly also to bolster vp their olone religion of monkery so much as they could, to the intent therefore they might saue both the credit of Dunstan and of the king, and especially bearing fauour to their olune religion, and partly that the reputation of the church of Rome should not be disteined by opening the truth of this matter, either did not see, or would not confesse herein what they knew: but rather thought best to blanch the story, and colourably to hide the simple truth thereof, making the people false lie beleeue that Elfleda the mother of Edward, was wife to king Edgar, and Edward to be lawfully borne, and also that Editha was borne after Edward, and to be the child for which the king was inioined penance. All which is false and contrarie both to the order of time aboue declared, and also to the plaine words of Malmesbury, which speaking of king Edgars last contrition, saith in plaine words: Dilexit vnicè integram lecto vni deferens fidem, quoad legitimam vxorem accepit Elfthridem, filiam Ordgari: that is, He had a concubine whom he loued intirely, keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time hee maried for his lawfull wife Elfride the daughter of duke Ordgar, &c. Whereby we haue to vnderstand, that whatsoeuer concubine this was which Malmesbury speaketh of, certaine it is that Edgar lued in whoredome till time hee maried his lawfull wife. Furthermore, and finally to conclude, beside these arguments and allegations aboue recited, let this also be perpended, how the said Dunstan with his complices, after the killing of king Edward, leauing the right heire of the crowne (which was Ethelred) inuent about (as Capgraue and their olune legend confesseth) to set vp Editha the other bastard to possesse the crowne, but that the more twise then her brother Edward, refused the same. Whereby what is to be thought of the doings of Dunstan, and what should be the cause why he preferred both Edward and Editha to the crowne, rather then the lawfull heire, I leaue to all indifferent readers thereof to iudge.

Malmsb. in lib. de regibus.

Anno 977.

After that Dunstan and his fellowes had thus set vp Edward for their king, they were now where they would be, supposing all to be sure on their side, that they had established the kingdome of monkery for euer, through the helpe of the young king, and the duke of Saffangles, and certaine other nobles whom they had drawen to their part. Holwbeit this matter pailed not so well with them as they hoped. For vpon after the coronation of this young king, Alfericus duke of Mercia, who followed much the deeds of the queene with other great men, stoutly standing on the contrary side, drone out the monkes from the cathedrall churches, which king Edgar before had set in, and restored against the priests (as Ranulphus saith) with their concubines: but in the history of the library of Joznall, I find it plainly expressed, with their wiues. The words of the writer author be these: Alfericus princeps Merciorum, cæteriquè plures, ciectis monachis de magnis monasterijs, quos rex Edgarus nuper instituerat, clericos cum vxoribus reduxerunt: that is, Alfericus duke of Mercia with other great men moze, drone out the monks from the great monasteries, whom king Edgar had there set in before, and restored against the priests with their wiues.

Duke Alfericus.

Historia Iornalensis in vita Edgari.

Whereby it doth euidently appeare, that priests in those daies were maried & had their lawfull wiues. The like before that in king Inas time is plaine, that bishops then had wiues & children, as appeareth by the words of the law then set forth, extant in the history of the said Iornalensis, which bee these: Si quis filiam alterius sine dolo vel parentum, si simile cognationi, & crescat euendatio secundum Weram eius regi, sicut cognationi. Si de parentela sit qui occidit eum, tunc exsedat emendatio patrini, sicut mandata Domini. Si episcopi filiolus sit, sit dimidium hoc, &c. And thus much by the way for priests wiues and their children.

Note to the purpose against our matter, which is to declare how the duke & nobles of England expelled the monks out of the monasteries after the death of king Edgar, therefore let vs heare what the monkish story of the abby of Croyland recordeth: Monachis de quibusdam monasterijs ciectis, clerici sunt introducti, qui statim monasteriorum maneria ducibus terræ distribuebant, vt sic in suas partes obligati, eos contra monachos defensarent. Hunc in modum clerici Euesshamenſi, monachis ejectis, clericis tantum introductis, Terreque tremui decretis ecclesiæ præmiati sunt, quibus regina nouercali nequitia, stans cum clericis in regis opprobrium, faucbat. Cum monachis autem rex, & sancti episcopi perstebant. Sed tyranni fulti reginæ fauore & potentia, super monachos triumphabant. Multus inde tumultus in omni angulo Angliæ factus est. Ex chronico Ingulphi abbatis de Croyland, &c. that is: The monks being expelled out of certaine monasteries, the clerks againe were brought in, who distributed the manors & farmes of the said monamonasteries, to the dukes and lords of the land, that they being obliged to them should defend them against the monks. And to were the monks of Euesham thrust out, and the secular clerks placed, and the lands of the church giuen to the lords, with whom the queene, the kings stepmother holding the same time, tooke part also with the said clerks against the king. On the contrarie part stood the king and the pole bishops taking part with the monks. Holwbeit, the lords and peeres of the realme staying vpon the fauour and power of the queene, triumphed ouer the monks, &c.

Thus as much adoe there was through all quarters of the realme about the matter among the lords, to arose no lesse contention betweene the priests and monks of England. The priests complaining to the king and Dunstan, laid to their charges that it was vncomelie, vnchariteable, pea and vnnaturall, to put out an old knowen dweller for a new vnknowen; and that God was not pleased, that to be taken from the ancient possesso; which by God was giuen him; neither that it could be of any good man accepted, to suffer any such iniurie to be done, lest peraduenture the same thing whereof he taught vpon diligall to an other, might after reuert and rebound vpon himselfe at length. The monks on the other side laid for their part, that Christ allowed neither the old dweller, nor the new commer, nor yet looked vpon the person, but who so would take the crosse of penance vpon him, and followe Christ in vertuous living, should be his disciple.

These and such other were the allegations of the monks. But whether a monks coule or a liuiuelesse life make a sufficient title to enter into other mens possessions or no, I refer it to the iudgement of the godlie. The troublous cares in mariage, the necessarie prouision for housekeeping, the vertuous bringing vp of children, the daille helping of pouertie and bearing of publike charges, with other manifeſt perturbations & combrances daille incident vnto matrimonie, might iustlie suppose to godlie wise men to come nerer to the right crosse of penance, then the easie and loittering idlenesse of monkerie. In the end, vpon this controuerſie was holden a councell of bishops and other of the clergie. First, at Reading or at Winchester (as Guliel. saith) where the greater part both of the nobles and commons iudged the priests to haue great wrong, & fought by all meanes possible, to bring them againe to their old possessions and dignities. Ionalensis here maketh report all of an image of the crucifix, or a rood standing vpon the Greater wall, where the councell was holden. To this rood Dunstan requireth them all to pray, being beside not ignorant of some spirituall promisse before hand. In the midſt of their prayer the rood (or else some blind monke behind it in atrunke) through the wall, is reported to speake these words: Absit hoc vt fiat, absit hoc vt fiat: iudicastis bene, mutastis non bene. In remembrance whereof these verses were written vnder the rood feet.

Humano more crux præsens zedicitur ore,
Cæsitis affata, quæ perfidis hic fabricata,
Absit vt hoc fiat, & cætera tunc memorata.

Of this Dunstanicall 03 rather Satanicall oracle, Henricus maketh no mention, nor Ranulphus, nor yet Ioncdenus, nor Fabian in their histories. Gulielmus in his booke De regibus reporteth it but by hearesay, in these words, saying: Aliæ literæ docent, &c. Wherefore the lesse it seemeth to be of credit. Albeit if it were of credible truth, yet it proueth in this matter nothing else but Dunstan to be a sorcerer, as Polydor Virgil also himselfe seemeth to smell something in this matter.

Notwithstanding for all this, yet the strife ceased not: it is so much that a new assemblie of the clergie and other was appointed after at a place called the street of Calue, where the councell was holden in a roome ouer the hall. In this assemblie grieuous complaints were obiected (as Polydor. saith) against Dunstan: but yet he kept his opinion, and would not there remoue from that which he began to maintaine. And while they were in great contention and argument which way should be admitted and allowed (if it be true that in the stories is written) suddenlie the soles of the loft failed, and the people with the nobles fell downe, so that certaine were slaine, and many hurt. But Dunstan (they say, only) standing vpon a post of the sollar which remained vnbroken) escaped without danger. Which thing whether it so hapned to portend before the ruine of the realme and of the nobles (as Henry Huntington doth expound it) which after insued by the Danes, or whether it was so brought by Dunstans sorcerie (as were not impossible) no whether it were a thing but feigned of the monkish writers, and not true; all this I leaue to the readers, to thinke therein what them liketh. The stories say further, that vpon this the matter ceased, and Dunstan had all his will.

These things thus done at Calue, it hapned not long after the same, that king Edward, whom the writers describe to be a vertuous and a vnchaste prince, much pitifull and beneficiall to the poore, about the fourth yeere of his reigne came vpon a season from hunting in the forrest alone, without the companie of his seruants to the place in the west countrie, where Alfrith his mother with her sonne Egelred did lie. When the queene the mother was warned of his comming by her men, anon she called a seruant of hers which was of her speciall trust, opening to him all her conceiued counsell, and shewing him all points how and what to do for the accomplishing of her wicked purpose. Which thing so done, she made towards the king, and receiued him with all courtesie, desiring him to tarie that night; but he in like courtesie excused himselfe, and for speed desired to see his brother, and to ouride vpon his horse sitting, the which was thereby brought.

Now while the cup was at his mouth, the seruant of the queene (being informed) strake him in the bodie with a long two edged dagger. After the which stroke the king take the horse with the spurs, and ran toward the way where he supposed to meet with his companie, but he died to soze, that with faintnesse he fell from his horse, his one foot being in the stirrup. By reason whereof he was drawen of his horse ouer fields and lands till he came to a place named Coudgate, where he was found dead: and for that neither the maner of his death, (nor yet he himselfe for the king) was known, was buried vnhonorablie at the towne of Warham, where the body remained the space of three yeeres, and then after was taken vp by duke Alfer above mentioned, and with pompe and honor accordingly was conueied to the minster of Shaftesburie, and there bestowed in the place called Edwardstow. Many tales run (more perchance then be true) concerning the finding and taking vp of his bodie, which our most common histories ascribe to miracles and great wonders wrought about the place where the king was buried. At first, how a pore woman borne blind, receiued sight by the meanes of S. Edward, there where he did lie. Also how a pillar of fire from heauen descended ouer the place of his burial. Then how the forsaid queene Alfrith taking her horse to go to the place, was stopped by the way, that neither her horse could be driuen by any meanes, nor she her selfe on fot was able to approch neere to the place where the corps of S. Edward was. Furthermore, how the said queene repentance of her fact, afterward builded two nunries, one at Amesburie by Salisburie; the other at Werewell, where she kept her selfe in continuall repentance all the daies of her life. And thus, as ye haue heard, was this vertuous yong king Edward murthered, when he had reigned almost foure yeeres, leauing no issue behind him, whereby the rule of the land fell to Egelredus his brother.

Now in the order and course of the Romish bishops, mention was made laſt of Agapetus the second, after whom next succeded pope John the thirteenth, of whom Dunstan archbishop of Canturburie receiued his pall, as in the storie of king Edgar is before minded. This pope is noted to be very wicked and infamous, repleat from his first bringing vp with abominable vices: a whoremaster, an adulterer, incestuous, sacrilegious, a gamester, an extortioner, periured, a fighter, a murtherer, cruell and tyrannous. Of his cardinals, some he put out their eies, from some he cut off their tongs, some their fingers, some their noses, &c. In a generall councell before the emperor Otho the first of that name (who was the first emperor of the Germans) after the empire was translated out of France to Germanie by pope Agapetus (as is aboue hinted) these accusations were articulat against him. First, that he neuer said his seruice, that in saying his masse he did not communicat, that he ordained deacons in a stable, that he committed incest with two of his sisters, that playing at dice he called for the diuell to helpe, that for money he made boyes bishops, that he deflowred young women and widowes, that of the palace of Lateran he made a stewes, that he lay with Stephana his fathers concubine, likewise with Rainera and with Anna and her neese, that he put out the eies of the bishop Benedict, that he caused houses to be set on fire, that he drake open houses, that he dranke to the diuell, that he neuer crossed himselfe, &c. For the which causes (and worthilie) he was deposed by the consent of the emperor, with the prelats, and pope Leo was substituted in his place. But after his departing (through the harlots of Rome and their great promises) the said pope John was restored again to his place, and Leo (set vp by the emperor) was deposed. At length about the tenth yeere of the popedome of this John; he being found without the citie with another mans wife, was so wounded of her husband, that within eight daies after he died.

tions and possession, which either Constantinus (as they falslie pretend) or which Carolus Magnus toke from the Lombards, and gaue to them.

After pope Leo had reigned a yere and three moneths, succeeded pope John the fourteenth, against whom (for holding with the emperor) Berrus the head captaine of the citie, with two consuls, twelue aldermen, and diuers other nobles, gathering their power together, laid handes vpon him in the church of Lateran, and clapt the pope in prison eleuen months. The emperor hearing this, with all speed returned with his armie againe to Rome, who after execution done vpon the authors and chiefe doers of that fact, among other committed the foresaid Petrus to the popes arbitrement, whom he caused first to be stript naked, then his beard being shauen, to be hanged by the haire a whole day together, after that to be set vpon an asse (his face turned backward, and his hands bound vnder the asses taile) and so to be led through the citie, that all men might see him that done, to be scourged with rods, and so banished the citie. Thus ye se how the polite father followeth the inimitation of the gospell: Diligite inimicos vestros, Loue your enemies, Luke the first, &c. From this pope proceeded first the chiefenes of bels, An. 971.

After him followed pope Benedictus the first, who in like manner was apprehended by Cinthius a captaine of Rome, and cast in prison, where he was strangled, or as some say, famished to death.

Then came pope Donus the second, after whom Boniface the seuenth was pope, who likewise seeing the citizens of Rome to conspire against him, was constrained to hide himselfe, and seeing no place there for him to tarie, toke the treasure of S. Peters church, and so priuilie stole to Constantinople. In whose stead the Romans set vp pope John the fifteenth. Not long after, Boniface returning againe from Constantinople, by his monie and treasure procured a garrison or companie to take his part: by whose meanes the foresaid pope John was taken, his eies put out, and so throwen in prison, where he was, as some say, famished; some say he was slaine by Ferrucius. Neither did Boniface reigne manie dayes after, but suddenlie died, whose carcase after his death was drawen by the feet through the streets of Rome after a most despitefull maner, the people hissing and exclaming against him, Anno 976.

Next pope after him was Benedictus the fourth, by the consent of the emperor Otho the second, and reigned nine yeres. In the time of this pope, Hugh Capet the French king toke Charles (the right heire to the crowne) by the treason of the bishop of Laon, and when he had imprisoned him, he also committed to prison Arnoldus archbishop of Raines, and placed in his rome Gilbertus a monke of Flosiake (a necromancer) who was schoolemaster to Robert the kings sonne. But this pope Benedictus called a councell at Remis, restored the said Arnoldus againe, and displaced Gilbertus, which after by the help of Otho was made archbishop of Ravenna, and at length was pope, as in processe hereafter (Gods granting) shall be declared.

After Benedictus succeded in the see of Rome pope John the fifteenth, and died the eight month of his papacie; next to whom came John the fourteenth, and after him Gregorie the fifte in the yere of our Lord, 995. This Gregorie (called before Bruno) was a German borne, and therefore the more maliced of the clergie and people of Rome. Whereupon, Crescentius with the people and clergie consenting against the said Gregorie, set vp John the eighteenth. Gregorie vpon the same fled himselfe in all conuenient hast to the emperor Otho the third in Germanie: who hearing the complaint of Gregorie, and vnderstanding his wrongs, set forward with his armie well appointed to Italie, gat the citie, and there toke both Crescentius the consull, and John the pope. Which John the first hauing his eies put out, was depriued after of his life. Crescentius the consull was set vpon a vile horse, hauing his nose and eares cut off, and so was led through the citie, his face being turned to the horse taile, and afterward hauing his members cut off, was hanged vpon a gibbet.

Pope Gregorie thus being restored to his former state, reigned foure yeres in his papacie (although Marianus Scotus and Martinus say that he sat but two yeres) &c. During the which time he assembled a councell in Rome: where he, to stablish the empire in his owne countrie (by the consent and counsell of Otho) ordeined seuen princes of Germanie to be electors of the emperor, which order yet to this day remaineth. What be the names of these seuen electors, and what is their office, thus I find in these verses expressed.

Moguntinensis, Treuerensis, Coloniensis,
Quilibet imperij sit cancellarius horum,
Et Palatinus dapifer, dux portitor ensis,
Marchio præpositus camere, pincerna Bohemus.

These seuen he ordeined to be electors, three bishops, three princes (to wit) the Palatine, the duke of Saxonie, the marques Brandenburgh: to whom was added also the king of Bohemie to giue the od voice, if the euen voice could not agree. This constitution being first begun, An. 997. was after established in Germanie by Otho the emperor, the yere of our Lord, 1002. And thus much by the way, or rather digression, concerning the rages and tumults of the Romish church. Now to our matter againe.

King Egelred, or Elred.

King Egelred.

KIng Edward thus being murthered, as is aforesaid, the crowne fell next to Egelred his yonger brother, and sonne to king Edgar by the foresaid quéne Alfrith, as we haue declared. This Egelred had a long reigne giuen him of God, which dured the terme of eight and thirtie yeres, but very vnfortunat and full of great miseries: and he himselfe (by the iudgers) seemeth to be a prince, not of the greatest courage to gouerne a common wealth. Our English stories writing of him thus repeat of his reigne: that in the beginning it was vngratious, wretched in the middle, & hatefull in the latter end. Of this Egelred it is read, that when Dunstan the archbishop should christen him, as he did hold him ouer the font, something there happened that pleased not Dunstan, whereupon he smote Per iaciam Mariam, iste ignauus homo erit, Vp the mother of Christ he will be a prince vnbridled and couardlie: Chron. de Crowland. I find in William of Malmesburie, Lib. 2. de regib. that this Egelred being of the age of ten yeres, when he heard his brother Edward to be slaine, made such sorow and weeping for him, that his mother falling thereuith in a rage, toke two candles (hauing nothing else at hand) wherewith she smoured him so sore (well neere till he swounded) that after the same he could neuer abide any waxe candels to burne before him. After this, about the yere of our Lord, 981 (the day of his coronation being appointed by the quéne, the mother, and the nobles) Dunstan archbishop of Canturburie (who first refused to do) with Oswald archbishop of Yorke, were inforced to accustome the king, and so they did at Kingston. In doing whereof, the report of thosies go, that the said Dunstan should say, thus prophesying vnto the king: that for so much as he came to the kingdome by the death of his brother, and through the conspiracie of the wicked conspirators and other Englishmen, they should not be without bloudshedding and sword, till there came a people of an vnknowen tongue, and should bring them into thraldome, neither should that prophesie be cleared without long vengeance, &c.

The coronation of Egelred.

The prophesie of Dunstan as manifestlie found.

In the chronicles of Croyland I find these words: Quoniam ascendisti ad thronum tuum per mortem fratris tui, quem occidit mater tua, propterea audi verbū Domini: Hoc dicit Dominus, non deficiet gladius de domo tua, seuiens in te omnibus diebus vitæ tuæ, & inerficiens de semine tuo, & de gente tua, vsque dum regnum tuum transferatur in regnum alienum: cuius ritum & linguam gens tua non nouit, nec expiabitur nisi longa vindicta, & multa sanguinis effusione peccatum matris tuæ, & peccatum virorum pessimorum, qui consenserunt consilio eius nequam, vt mitterent manum in Christum Domini ad effundendum sanguinem innocentem: Chron. de Croyland.

Not long after the coronation of this king, a cloud was séene throughout the land, which appéred the one halfe like blond, and the other halfe like fire, and changed after into sundrie colours, and vanished at the last in the morning. Shortlie after the appearance of this cloud, in the third yere of his reigne the Danes arriuing in sundrie places of the land, first spoiled Southhampton, either slaying the inhabitants, or leading them captiue away. From thence they went to the ile of Thanet, then they inuaded Chester, from thence they proceeded to Cornwall and Deuonshire, and so to Sussex, where in those coasts they did much harme, & so retired to their ships againe. Roger Houeden writing hereof, saith; that London the same time, or (as Fabian saith) a great part of London was consumed with fire. About this time fell a variance betweene the foresaid Egelred and the bishop of Rochester: in so much that he made war against him, and besieged the citie. And notwithstanding that Dunstan required the king sending him admonishment to giue ouer for the sake of S. Andzeiu: yet continued he his siege, till the bishop offered him an hundred pounds of gold; which he receiued, and so departed. The Danes seeing the discord that then was in the realme, and especiallie the hatred of the subiects against the king, rose againe, and did great harme in diuers places of England: in so much that the king was glad to grant them great summes of monie for peace to be had. For the assurance of which peace, Anlaffe captaine of the Danes became a christian man, and so returned home to his countrie and did no more harme. Betweene these enimies before recited, a fore schiselle of the bloudie sir, and hot feuers fell among the people, whereof many died; with a like murren also among the beasts. Moreouer, for lacke of iustice, many théeues, riotors, and bybers were in the land, with much miserie and mischiefe.

(which first was in a northerne land, then at Rochester) to Durelme or Dunelme. Whereupon the bishops see of Durelme first began.

Not long after the death of Dunstan, the Danes againe entred England, in many and sundrie places of the land: in such sort, that the king was to seeke to which coast he should go first to withstand his enemies. And in conclusion, for the auoiding of more harme, he was compelled to appease them with great summs of money. But when that money was spent, they fell to new robbing of the people, and assaulting the land in diuers places, not onely about the countrie of Northumberland, but also besieged the citie of London at the last. But being from thence repelled by the manhod of the Londoners, they traied to other countries adioyning, as to Esser, Kent, Sussex, and Hamshire, burning and killing whersoeuer they went: so that for lack of a good head or gouernor, many things in the land perished. For the king gaue himselfe to the vse of leacherie, and polling of his subiects, and disinherited men of their possessions, and caused them to redeeme the same againe with great summes of money, for heepaped great tributs to the Danes yearelie, which was called Danegilt. Which tributes so increased, that from the first tribute of 10000 pounds, it was brought at last in processe of time or fiue yeres to 40000 pounds. The which yearelie (during the time of Sir Edward, and after) was leuied of the subiects of this land.

To this sorowful misseuer was ioyned hunger and penury among the commons, in so much that euery one of them was constrained to plucke and scale from others. So that, what for the pillage of the Danes, and what by inward theeues and bibers, this land was brought into great affliction. Albeit, the greatest cause of this affliction (as to mine aspech) is not so much to be imputed to the king, as to the dissension among the lords themselues, who then did not agrée one with another.

But when they assembled in consultation together, either they did draw diuers waies; or if any thing were agréed vpon any matter of peace betweene the parties, sone it was broken againe; or else if any good thing were deuised for the preiudice of the enemie, anon the Danes were learned therof by some of the same counsell. Of whom, the chiefe doers were Edrike duke of Mercia, and Alfrike the admirall or captaine of the ships, who betrayed the kings naule to the Danes. Wherfore the king apprehending Alfagarus sonne of the said Alfrike, put out his eyes, and so did he after to the two sonnes of duke Edrike in like manner.

The Danes thus preuailing more and more ouer the Englishmen, grew in such pride and presumption, that when they by strength caused the husbandmen to care and sow the land, and to doe all other vile labour belonging to the house, they would sit at home, holding the wife at their pleasure, with daughter and seruant. And when the husbandman came home, he should scantly haue of his owne, as his seruants hands that the Danes had all at his will, and fill, faring of the best; when the owner scantly had his fill of the worst. Thus the common people being of them oppressed, were in such feare and dread, that not onely they were constrained to suffer them in their doings, but also glad to please them, and called euery one of them in the house where they had rule, lord Dane. Which word after (in processe of time, when the Danes were bandied) was so despite of the Danes turned of the Englishmen to a name of opprobrie, that when one Englishman would rebuke another, hee would say the more part call him Lurdane.

And thus hitherto (through the affliance of Christ) we haue brought this historie to the yeare of our Lord 1000. During now and continuing these great miseries vpon this English nation, the land being brought into great thraldome by the grieuous tributes of the Danes, and also by sustaining the manifold villanies and iniuries, as well by them as by other oppressions within the realme: this yeare which was the yeare of our saiour 1000, this Egelred through the counsell of certaine his familiars about him, in the one and twentith yeare of his reigne, began a matter, which was occasion either giuen by the one, or taken by the other, of a new plague to insue vpon the Saxons, who had driuen out the Britains before; that was in ioyning with the Normans in mariage. For the king this yeare aboue said, for the more strength (as hee thought) both of him and the realme, married Emma the daughter of Richard duke of Normandie. Which Richard was the third duke of the Normans, and the first of that name. By reason of which mariage, king Egelred was not a little enhanced in his owne minde: and by reason of the same mariage, the Danes should bee suddenly flaine. And so it was performed, which turned after to more trouble.

After that tidings came into Denmarke of the murther of those Danes, anon after, Swanus king of Denmarke with a great host and naule landed in Cornuall: where, by treason of a Normane named Hugh, (which by fauour of quéene Emma was made earle of Deuonshire, the said Swanus toke Excester, and after beat downe the wals. From thence proceeding further into the land, they came to Wilton and Shirebourne, where they cruelly spoiled the countrie, & slue the people. But anon Swanus, hearing that the king was comming to him

When king Egelred heard of the death of Swanus, hee made preuision, and returned into England. Of whose sudden comming Canutus being vnprouided fled to Sandwich, and there cutting off the noses and hands of the pledges, which his father left with him, sailed into Denmarke; who the next yeare returned againe with a great nauie, and landed in the south countrie. Wherefore the eldest son of king Egelred called Edmund Ironside, made preuision with the aid of Edrike duke of Mercia to meet him. But Edrike fayning himselfe sicke came not, but deceiued him. For as it was after proued, Edrike had promised his allegiance to Canutus. By reason whereof, Canutus entred the countrie of Westsaxon, and forced the people to be sworne vnto him, and to giue him pledges. In this season king Egelred being at London, was taken with great sicknesse, and there died, and was buried in the northside of Paules church behind the quire, after he had reigned vnprosperously thirtie and sir yeares; leauing after him his sald eldest son Edmund Ironside, and Alfred, and Edward which were in Normandie, sent thither before as is aboue rehearsed. This Egelred although hee was miserablie vnprospered and scorned of his enemies, yet hee with his counsell gaue forth wholesome lawes, whereof this is one parcell, containing good rules and lessons for all iudges and iustices to learne and follow.

A lesson for all iudges and iustices.

OMnis iudex iustus misericordiam & iudicium liberet in omnibus, & inprimis per rectam scientiam dicat emendationem secundum culpam, & eam tamen aduersitate properet indulgentiam. Quædam culpæ reputantur à bonis iudicibus secundum rectum emendandæ. Quædam per Dei misericordiam condonandæ. Iudicia debent esse sine omni haderunga, quod non parcatur diuiti alicui; vel egeno amico, vel inimico ius publicum recitari. Nihil autem iniustius est, quàm susceptio muneris per iudicio subuertendo: quia munera excæcant corda sapientum, & subuertunt verba iustorum. Dominus Iesus dixit. In quo iudicio iudicaueritis, iudicabimini. Timeat omnis iudex ac diligat Deum iudicem suum, ne in die iudicij mutus fiat, & humiliatus ante oculos iudicis cuncta videntis. Qui innocentem opprimit, & dimittit noxium pro pecunia, vel amicitia, vel odio, vel quacunque factione, opprimetur ab omnipotente iudice. Et nullus dominus, nulla potestas, stultos aut improbos iudices constituant, quia stultus per ignauiam, improbus per cupiditatem vitæ, quam didicit veritatem. Grauiùs enim lacerantur pauperes à prauis iudicibus, quàm à cruentis hostibus. Nullus hostis acerbior, nulla pestis efficacior quàm familiaris inimicus. Potest aliquoties homo fugere, vel defensione vitare prauos inimicos. Non ita possum iudices, quoties aduersus subditos malis desideriis inflammantur. Sæpe etiam boni iudices habent malos vicarios & ministros nephandos, quorum reatibus ipsi domini constringuntur, si nõ eos coerceant, & à rapacitate cohibeant. Quia Dominus & minister sæculorum ait: Non solùm malè agentes, sed omnes consentientes digni sunt æterna morte. Sæpe etiam prauj iudicis iudicium peruertunt, vel respectant, & non finiunt causam, donec volumas eorum impleatur. Et quando iudicant, non opera, sed munera considerant. Impij iudices, iuxta verbum sapientum, fuist rapaces lupi vespere nil reliquant vsque mane, id est, de præsenti solum vita cogitant, de futura nihil considerant. Malorum præpositorum mos est, vt quicquid possunt, aufferant, & vix necessitatem parum quid relinquant sustentationi. Iracundus iudex non potest attendere rectam iudicij faciem. Nam per furoris excæcationem, non perspicit rectitudinis claritatem. Iustum iudicium, vbi non persona consideratur. Scriptum est: Non attendas personam hominis in iudicio, nec pro aliquo facies, vt à vero declines, & iniustè iudices. Susceptio muneris est dimissio veritatis. Ex historia bibliotheca Iornal.

Edmund Ironside a Saxon, and Canutus a Dane, kings together in England.

ANno 1016

EDmund Ironside sonne of Egelred, king.

Canutus sonne of Swanus, king.

The battels betweene Edmundus and Canutus.

AFter the death of Egelred, variance fell betweene the Englishmen for the election of their king. For the citizens of London, with certaine other lords, named Edwin the eldest sonne of Egelred (a young man of lustie and baliant courage) in martiall aduentures both hardie and wise, and could very well indure all paines; wherefore he was surnamed Ironside. But the more of the lords fauoured Canutus the sonne of Swanus, especially the abbats, bishops, and men of the spiritualtie which before had sworne to his father. By meanes whereof, betweene these two martiall princes were fought many great battels first in Dorsetshire, where Canutus was compelled to flie the field. And after that they fought an other battell in Worcestershire, so sore, that none could tell who had the better; but either for weariuesse or for lacke of day they departed one from the other, and on the next morow fought againe: but then Canutus was compelled to forsake the field. After this they met in Mercia, and there fought againe, where Edmund (as stories say) by the treason of that false Edrike duke of Mercia, whom he before had receiued to fauour) had the worse. Thus many great conflicts there were betweene these two princes. But vpon a season, when the hosts were readie to ioyne, and a certaine time of truce taken before battell, a knight of the partie of Edmund stood vp vpon a high place, and said these words.

A wittie oration to stay blood betweene two armies.

Daily we die, and none hath the victorie: and when the knights be dead on either part, then the dukes compelled by need shall accord, or else they must fight alone. And this kingdome is not sufficient for two men, which sometime sufficed seuen. But if the couetousnesse of lordship in these twaine be so great, that neither can bee content to take part and liue by the other, nor the one vnder the other; then let them fight alone that will be lords alone. If all men fight still, at the last all men shall be liaine, and none left to be vnder their lordship, nor able to defend the king that shall be, against strange enemies and nations.

Two kings fight hand to hand.

These words were so well allowed of both the hosts and princes, that both were content to trie the quarrell betweene them two onely. Then the place and time was appointed where they both met in sight of both hosts. And then either had alaied other with sharpe woods and stroks, first by the motion of Canutus (as some write) hastily they were both agreed, and killed each other to the comfort of both hosts. And shortly after they agreed vpon partition of the land, and after that, during their liues they loued as brethren. Some after, a sonne of wicked Egelred, by the mind (as appeared afterward) of his father, espied, how that Edmund was at the draught, and with a speare (some say with a long knife) thrust him into the fundament, wherof the said Edmund shortly after died, after that he had reigned two yeares. He left behind him two sonnes, Edmund and Edward, whom Edrike the wicked duke, after the death of their father, take from their mother (not knowing of the death of Edmund his husband) and presented them to king Canutus, faluting him in these words. Aue rex solus. Thus Canutus after the death of Edmund Ironside, was king alone of the whole realme of England; and after (as they say) by the aduice of his counsell, hee sent the foresaid sonnes of Edmund Ironside to his brother Swanus king of Sweueland to be slaine, who abhorring that deed, sent them to Salomon king of Hungarie, where Edmund being married to the kings daughter died, Edward was married to Agatha daughter of his brother Henrie the fourth emperor.

The wicked murther of king Edmund.

Two sonnes of Edmund Ironsde.

When Canutus was stablished in the kingdome, he called a parlament at London, where (among other things there debated) it was propounded to the bishops, barons, and lords of the parliament there present, whether that in the composition made betweene Edmund and Canutus, any speciall remembrance was made for the children or brethren of Edmund, for any partition of any part of the land. Whereunto the English lords fallie flattering the foren king, and speaking against their owne minds, as alo against their native countrie, answered and said; Nay: affirming moreouer with an oth (so the kings pleasure) that they to the vttermost of their powers, would put off the blood of Edmund in all that they might. By reason of which answere and promise, they thought many of them to haue purchased with the king great fauour. But by the iust retribution of God it chanced farre otherwise. For many of them, of the most part (such especially as Canutus did perceiue to be sworne before time to Edmund, and his heires, and also confidering that they were true Englishmen) hee mistrusted and disdained euer after. In so much that some hee exiled, a great sort he beheaded, and some by Gods punishment died suddenly. Among whom wicked Edrike also the traitor (although with his fugred words hee continued a while in the kings fauour) at length escaped not condigne reward for his execrable dealing. For (as the historie of Ioannensis recordeth) as the king was in displace beyond Thames, this Edrike, being beside accused, or else suspected of the king by coming vnto him, began to reckon vp his benefits and labours bestowed for his sake. First, in forsaking and betraying Egelred, then in slaying king Edmund his sonne, with many such other deeds more, which al for his sake he hath done. Well, saith the king, thou hast right worthily deserued thy fee, and worthy thou shalt die for slaying thy naturall prince, and my louyng brother. And so commanded him to bee bound immediately hand and fot, and to be throwne into the Thames. Some stories say, that when he had saluted the king with Aue rex solus, and therwith him the slaying of Edmund, Canutus (praising that he would make him therefore higher then all the lords of the realme) commanded his head to be stricken off, and to be set vpon London bridge, and his body to be cast into the towne ditch, and thus with shame ended he his wretched life, as al they commonly doe, which with like dissimulation seeke the destruction of their prince and of their countrie.

Flatterie, falsedeliuer, and vntruth in English lords.

False vnfaithfulnesse and inconstant mutabilitie in English lords well rewarded.

The end of pernicious traitors.

This Canutus (shortly after the death of king Edmund, by the counsell of Edrike) exiled Edmund, being brother vnto king Edmund, called Rex rusticorum, the king of churles. But afterward he was reconciled againe to the kings fauour, and lastly Harold (called Harefoot for his deliuernes and swiftnesse) sonne to Canutus by Elgina his first wife, began his reigne ouer England, in the yeare 1039. He held little lesse in memorie, for he reigned but foure yeares, saue that hee banished his stepmother Emma, and tooke her goods & iewels from her.

Hardeknoutus, being king of Denmarke, and second sonne to Canutus by his last wife Emma, was next king of England. In the time of these Danish kings, there was one Godwin an earle in England, which had been before in great fauour with Canutus, for his acts done in Northumberlande against the Norwegians: and afterward married the sister (some say the daughter) of Canutus. This Godwin was of a cruell and subtill wit, as hee declared no lesse by the two sons of king Egelred. For when these two aforesaid (whose names were Alfred and Edward) came from Normandy into England, to visit their mother Emma, and brought with them a great companie of Normans: this Godwin (hauing a daughter called Godith, whom he thought to marie to Edward, and set him vp to be king, to bring his purpose about) vsed this practise, that is, to perswade king Hardeknout and the lords, not to suffer those Normans to bee within the realme for leopardie, but rather to punish them for example: by which meanes he gat either mastered the most number of the Normans, and that innocently. For as Swanus before had tithed the monks of Canterburie: so he with the cruell companie of English souldiers, slue nine of the said Normans, and saued the tenth. And yet pilling the furie of Swanus (as not contented with that tyranny) he tithed againe the said tith, & slue euery tenth knight, and that by cruell torment, as twirling their guts out of their bodies, as twiteth Ranulphus. And among others, put out the eyes of the elder brother Alfredus, and sent him to an abbey of Elie: where he being fed with bread and water, indured not long after. Of some writers it was recoded, that he was there slaine with the forenamed torment, and Edward was conueied by some other into his mother, who fearing the treason of Godwin, sent him (some ouer the sea into Normandie againe. This cruell fact of Godwin and his men against the innocent Normans, whether it came of himselfe, or of the kings setting on, sithemth to me to be the cause, why the iustice of God did shortly after reuenge the quarrell of these Normans, in conquering and subduing the English nation by William Conquerors, and the Normans which came with him. For so iust and right it was, that as the Normans comming with e naturall English prince, were murthered of Englishmen: so afterward the Englishmen should bee slaine and conquered by the Normans, comming with a foren king, being none of their naturall countrie.

Then it followeth in the storie, that this king Canute or Hardeknoutus (when he had reigned two yeres (being merrie at Lambeth) suddenly was stricken dumbe, and fell downe to the ground, and within eight dates after died without issue of his body, who was the last that reigned in England of the blood of the Danes.

This foresaid Godwin had by the daughter of Canutus his wife, but one sonne, which was drowned. Of his second wife he receiued six sonnes, to wit, Swanus, Harold, Tostius, Willmotus, Sirth or Sueth, and Leofricus, with one daughter called Goditha, which after was married to king Edward the Confessor.

Concerning the storie of this Alfred, I find it something otherwise reported in English chronicles, that it should bee after the death of Hardeknout; for so much as the earles and barons after his death, assembled and made a councell, that neuer after any of the Danes blood should bee king of England for the despite that they had done to Englishmen. For euermore before, if the Englishmen and the Danes had happened to meet vpon a bridge, the Englishmen should not be so hardie to moue a fot, but stand still, till the Danes were passed forth. And moreouer, if the Englishmen had not bowed downe their heads to do reuerence vnto the Danes, they should haue been beaten and defiled. For the which despites and villanies they were driuen out of the land after the death of Hardeknout, for they had no lord that might maintaine them. And after this manner auoided the Danes out of England, that they neuer came againe.

Taken out of the English storie or chronicle compiled of certaine English clerkes.

The earles and barons, by their common assent and counsell, sent vnto Normandie for these two brethren, Alfred and Edward; intending to crowne Alfred the elder brother, and to make him king of England. And to this the earles and barons made their oath: but the earle Godwin of Westsax (fallie and traiterouslie) thought to slay these two brethren, assone as they came into England, to that intent to make Harold his sonne king: which sonne hee had by his wife Hardeknouts daughter that was a Dane. And to this Godwin went priuilie to Southhampton, to meet there with the two brethren at their landing. And thus it fell, that the messengers that went (saith mine author) into Normandie, found but onely Alfred the elder brother. For Edward his ponger brother was gone to Hungarie, to speake with his cosin the outlaw, which was Edward Ironsides sonne.

When Alfred had heard these messengers, and perceiued their tidings, he thanked God, and in all hast sped him to England, arriuing at Southhampton. There Godwin the false traitor (hauing knowledge of his comming) welcommed and receiued him with much ioy, pretending to leade him into London, where the barons waited for to make him king. And so they together passed forth toward London. But when they came to Guilford, the traitor commanded all his men to stay all that were in Alfreds companie, which came with him from Normandie; and after that to take Alfred, and so leade him into the ile of Elie, where they should put out both his eyes: and so they did. For they slue all the companie that were there, to the number of twelue gentlemen, which came with Alfred from Normandie; and after that they tooke Alfred, and in the ile of Elie they executed their commission. That done, they opened his body, tooke out his bowels, set a stake into y ground, and fastened an end of his bowels thereunto, and with nedels of iron they pricked his tender bodie, thereby causing him to goe about the stake, till that all his bowels were drawne out. And so died this innocent Alfred or Alured, being the right heire of the crowne, through treason of wicked Godwin. When the lords of England heard thereof, and how Alfred, that should haue been their king, was put to death through the false traitor Godwin, they were wondrous wroth; and sware betweene God and them, that he should die a worse death then did Edith which betraied his lord Edmund Ironside, and should vtterdatly haue put him to death, but that the traitor fled there into Denmarke, and there held him foure yeares and more, and lost all his lands in England.

Ex hiſto. Ioannis Wigorn. auctoris.

An other Latin storie I haue (bearing no name) which saith that this comming in of Alfred and the Normans, was in the time of Harold Canutus sonne. And how Godwin (after hee pretended great amitie to them) suddenly in the night came vpon them at Guilford, and after he had tithed the Normans, sent Alfred to Harold at London, who sent him to the ile of Elie, and caused his eies to be put out.

Emma wife to Denelcus the emperor.

And thus much of Canutus and of his sons, Harold and Hardecanutus. Besides these two sonnes, Canutus had also a daughter named Gunilda, married to Henricus the emperour. Of whom some write, that she being accused to the emperour of adulterie, and hauing no champion or knight that would fight for her (after the maner of that countrie) for triall of her cause, a certaine little dwarfe or boy, whom shee brought with her out of England (stirred vp of God) fought in her cause against a mightie big Germane of a monstrous greatnesse, which little dwarfe, cutting by chance the sinewes of his leg, after broke him to the ground, and so cut off his head, and deliuered the life of the queene, if it be true that Gulielmus and Fabianus reporteth.

Canutus went to Rome. The beautifull church built at Rome for English pilgrims. Rome since confirmed by Canutus. The earthly wealthie church of Elie in Cambridgeshire builded by Canutus. S. Benets in Holme builded. Monks abbeis conuerted to monks.

Of this Canutus it is storied, that he following much the superstition of Achelnotus archbishop of Canterburie, went on pilgrimage to Rome, and there founded an hospitall for English pilgrims. He gaue the pope precious gifts, y burdened the land with a yearely tribute called the Rome-hat. He bestowed the body of Kerinus, and gaue great lands & ornaments to the church of Winchester; he builded S. Benets of Holme in Northfolke, which was before an heremitage. Also S. Edmundsbury, which king Athelstan before ordeined for a colledge of priests, he turned to an abbey of monks of S. Benets order.

Flatterers and slaues like about princes.

Henricus archbeacon of Huntington, lib. 6. maketh mention of this Canutus, as both also Polydor. lib. 7. That he after his comming from Rome, walking vp on a time by the post of Southhampton, but as Polydor saith, and Fabian affirmeth the same, that it was by the Thames side of London, when his flatterers comming about him, began to exalt him by with high words, calling him a king of all kings (most mightie) who had vnder his subiection both the people, the land, and also the seas: Canutus reuoking this matter in his mind (whether for pride of his heart exalted, or whether to trie and refell their flattering words) commanded his chaire of estate to bee brought to the sea side, at what time it should begin to flow.

Canutus chargeth the ſea to hold backe, but it would not be.

A leſſon notable for kings and princes.

God onely the king of all kings and Lord of lords.

The kings crowne put on a rood.

Kings of England haue as much right in cauſes ſpirituall as temporall.

Certaine lawes of king Canutus for the ordering of matters eccleſiaſticall.

Adulteroſſe women to loſe their eares and noſes.

Polydor faith that no ſeat was brought: but ſitting vpon his garments being folded together vnder him, there charged and commanded the floods ariſing and comming towards his feet, that they ſhould not touch neither him, nor his clothes. But the water keeping his ordinarie courſe, came neere and neere: firſt to his feet, and ſo growing higher began to waſh him well fauoredly. Wherewith the king abaſhed, and partly alſo afeard ſtart backe, and looking to his lords; Lo (ſaith hee) ye call me ſuch a mighty king, and yet can I not command backe this little water to ſtay at my word, but it is readie to deuoure me. Wherefore all earthly kings may knowe, that all their powers be but vaine, and that none is worthy to haue the name of a king, but he alone which hath all things ſubiect to the power and authority of his word, which is the Lord of heauen and earth, the creator aboue of all things, the father of our Chriſt and Lord, who with him for euer is to be glorified: him let vs worſhip and extoll for our king for euer. After this as hiſtories witneſſe, he neuer ſuffered the crowne to come vpon his head, but went to Wincheſter, or (as ſome ſay) to Canterburie: but both thoſe may be true: for his going to Canterburie, was to acknowledge that there was a Lord much higher, and of more power then he himſelfe was, and therewithall to render his crowne for euer. With that, Egelnothus archbiſhop of Canturburie inferred him of the image of the crucifix before mentioned, which diſſolued the matter betweene married prieſts and life of monks, and did many other miracles more, being then at Wincheſter. Whereuppon the king pronoked to goe to Wincheſter to the rood, there reſigned vp his regall crowne, and made the rood king ouer all the land.

There is alſo to be noted in this Canutus, that although as is ſaid hee condeſcended in the beginning of his reigne, vpon king Edgars lawes: yet after in proceſſe of time, he ſet forth peculiar lawes of his owne. Among which, diuers there bee that concerne as well cauſes eccleſiaſticall, as alſo temporall. Whereby it may appeare, that the gouernment of ſpirituall matters not to depend vpon the biſhop of Rome: but to appertaine to the lawfull authoritie of the temporall gouernour, no leſſe then of matters and cauſes temporall. As for example, by theſe ordinances of the foreſaid Canutus may be well conſidered as here followeth: Pecunia ſepulturæ iuſtum eſt vt aperta terra reddantur. Si aliquod corpus a ſua parœchia deferatur in aliam, pecunia ſepulturæ, &c. In Engliſh.

It is meet and right that in funerals, money be giuen for opening the earth.

If any body, or corſe, bee carried from his owne pariſh into an other, the money of the buriall ſhall pertaine by the law to his owne pariſh church.

All ordinances and ceremonies of God, let them be obſerued as noted in all things requiſite.

Vpon the ſunday we forbid all publike faires or markets, all ſynods or conuenticles, huntings, or any ſuch ſecular actions, to be exerciſed, vnleſſe vrgent neceſſitie compell thereunto.

Let euery chriſtian man prepare himſelfe thrice a yeare to approach to the receiuing of the Lords body: ſo to eate the ſame as not to his iudgement, but to his wholeſome remedie.

If a miniſter of the altar doe kill any man, or haue intangled himſelfe in any notorious crime, let him be deprined both from his order and dignitie.

If any married woman (her huſband being aliue) haue committed adultery, and be proued with the ſame: to his open ſhame in the world, let her haue her noſe and eares cut off.

Let euery bodie, after the death of her huſband, remaine foule twelue moneths, or if ſhe marrie, let her loſe her iointure.

And here an end of the Daniſh kings. Now to the Engliſh kings againe, whoſe right line commeth in againe in Edward here following.

¶ King Edward called the Confeſſor.

Anno 1043 King Edward the Confeſſor.

England afflicted by the Danes the ſpace of 25 yeares.

FOr ſo much as God of his mercie and prouidence, who is onely the maker of heires, thought it ſo good, after the wofull captiuitie of this Engliſh nation, to grant now ſome reſpit of deliuerance, in taking away the Daniſh kings without any ſtirre left behind them: who reigning here in England, kept the Engliſh people in miſerable ſubiection, about the ſpace of eight and twentie yeares, and that from their firſt landing in the time of king Wightericus, waſting and hering this land the terme of 255 yeares. Now their tyrannie here comming to an end, the next election and right of the crowne fell (as apperteined) to Edward the yonger ſonne of king Egelred and Emma, a meere Engliſhman: who had been now long baniſhed in Normandie, as is aboue declared; a man of gentle and ſoft ſpirit, more appliable to other mens counſels, then able to truſt to his owne: of nature and condition ſo giuen from all warr and bloodſhed, that being in his baniſhment, hee wiſhed rather ſo to continue all his life long in that priuat eſtate, then by warr or bloodſhed to aſpire to any kingdome. This Edward after the death of Canutus the ſecond, or Hardicanute, being ſent for of the lords into Normandie to take poſſeſſion of the realme, although he ſomething miſtruſted the inconſtant and fickle heads of Engliſhmen (yet hauing ſufficient pledges laid for him in Normandie) came ouer, with a few Normans accompanied, and not long after was crowned at Wincheſter, in the yeare 1043, by Eliſus then archbiſhop of Canterburie. And not long after that, he maried Goditha, or Editha, daughter of earle Godwin, whom he intreated after ſuch ſort, that he neither put her from his bed, nor yet beait her with her fiebly. Whether it were for hate of her kin (as moſt like it was) or for loue of chaſtitie, it remaineth vncertaine. But moſt writers agree that he continued his life without offence with women, for the which he is highly exalted among our ſtorie writers, and called holy king Edward. After he had thus taken vpon him the gouernment of the realme, he guided the ſame with much wiſedome and iuſtice, the ſpace of foure and twentie yeares, lacking two moneths, from whom iſſued (as out of a fountaine) much godlineſſe, mercie, pitie, and liberalitie toward the poore: gentleneſſe and iuſtice toward all men, and in all honeſt life he gaue a vertuous example to his people. Hee diſcharged the Engliſhmen of the great tribute called Dane-gilt, which before time was yearely leuied to the great impouriſhing of the people. He ſubdued the Scots and the Welſhmen, which in their borders began to rebell againſt him. In much peace hee continued his reigne, hauing no forreneemie to aſſault him: albeit, as ſome chronicles doe ſhew, certaine Danes and Norwaies there bare, which intended to ſet vpon England. But as they were taking ſhipping there was brought to them firſt one ball, then an other, of mault or methe, to drinke vpon a boun voyage. Thus one cup counting after an other, after drinke came drunkenneſſe, after drunkenneſſe followed tangling, of tangling came ſtrife, and ſtrife turned into ſtripes; whereby many were ſlaine, and the other returned to their home againe. And thus the mercifull prouidence of the Lord diſpatched that iourney.

In the time of this Edward, Emma his mother was accuſed to be familiar with Alwin the biſhop of Wincheſter: vpon which accuſation (by counſell of earle Godwin) hee tooke from her many of her iewels, and cauſed her to bee kept ſome-what more ſtrictly in the abbey of Warwell, and the biſhop committed to the examination of the clergie. Polydor ſaith, they were both in priſon at Wincheſter, where the ſorrowing the deſame both of her ſelfe and of the biſhop, and truſting vpon her conſcience, deſireth them of iuſtice, offering her ſelfe ready to abide any lawfull triall, yea although it were with the tharpet.

Then diuers of the biſhops made labour to the king for them both, and had obtained, had not Robert then archbiſhop of Canterbury ſtopped the ſute. Who not well contented with their labour, ſaid vnto them; Why brethren, how dare ye defend her which is no woman but a beaſt? She hath defamed her ſonne for the king, and taken her lecherous leman the biſhop. And if it be ſo, that the woman will purge the prieſt, who ſhall then purge the woman, that is accuſed to be conſenting to the death of her ſonne Alphred, and procured hemm to the poyſoning of her ſonne Edward? But whether ſhe be guiltie or guiltleſſe; if ſhe will goe barefoted for her ſelfe foure ſteps, and for the biſhop fiue, continually vpon nine ploughſhares fire hot; then if ſhe eſcape harmeleſſe, he ſhall bee aſſoiled of this challenge and the alſo.

To this the graunted the day was appointed; at which day the king and a great part of his nobles were preſent, except onely Robert the archbiſhop. This Robert had been a monke of a houſe in Normandie, and an helper of the king in his exile, and ſo by the lending ſo of the king, came ouer and was made firſt biſhop of London, after archbiſhop of Canterburie. Then was the leſ blindfaid vnto the place betweene the nine mers, where the irons lay burning hot, and paſſed the nine ſhares vnhurt. At laſt, ſaith the; God Lord when ſhall I come to the place of my purgation? When they then opened her eyes, and ſhe ſaw that ſhe was paſt the paine, ſhe kneeled downe giuing God thanks.

Then the king repented (ſaith the ſtorie) and reſtored vnto her ſhat he had done to her from time to time, and called her forgiuenelle. But the archbiſhop fled into Normandie.

Here about this time, about the tenth yeare of his reigne, fell paſſing great ſnow from the beginning of Januarie to the fourteenth day of March. After which inſued a great mortalitie of men, murren of cattell, and by lightning the corne was wonderfully blaſted and withered.

Not long after this a certaine earle of Bologne, who had maried king Edwards ſiſter, came into England; through the occaſion of whom, when execution ſhould bee done vpon the citizens of Douer, for a fray betweene them and the earles men, variance happened betweene king Edward and earle Godwin, who perceiuing that he could not withſtand the kings malice, although he gathered a great company to withſtand what he could, fled into Flanders, ſ was outlawed with his fiue ſons. King Edward repudiated his wife, the daughter of the ſaid Godwin: but the ſecond peace after by mediation ſhe was reconciled to the king againe and called from baniſhment, and ſo his god abearing hee gaue ſo pledges his two ſonnes, Sweon and Toſtius, which were ſent to the duke of Normandie there to be kept.

During the time of the outlawrie of Godwin, William baſtard duke of Normandie came with a goodly company into England to ſee king Edward, and was honorablie receiued. To whom the king made great chere, and at his returne inriched him with great gifts and pleaſures; and there (as ſome write) made promiſe to him, that if he died without iſſue, the ſaid William ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdom of England.

In this kings reigne lined Marianus Scotus the ſtorie writer. As concerning the end of earle Godwin, the cruell murtherer of Alfred and of the Normans, although diuers hiſtories diuerſly do varie, yet in this the moſt part do agree, that as he ſat at the table with king Edward at Windſor, it happened one of the cup-bearers, one of earle Godwins ſonnes, to ſtumble and recouer againe, ſo that he ſpeed none of the diniſe, whereat Godwin laughed; and ſaid, how the one brother had ſuſtained the other. With which words the king calling to mind his brothers death that was ſlaine by Godwin, beheld the earle, ſaying, So ſhould my brother Alfred haue holpen me, had not Godwin been. Godwin then fearing the kings diſpleaſure, to be newly kindled, after many words in excuſing himſelfe, ſaid; So might I ſafely ſwallow this moſſell of bread, as I am guiltleſſe of the deed. But as ſome as hee had receiued the head, forthwith he was choked. Then the king commanded him to be drawen from the table, and ſo was conueied by Harold his ſon to Wincheſter, and there buried.

About the ſixteenth yere of this kings reigne, the ſaid king Edward ſent Aldred biſhop of Worceſter to the emperor Henricus the fourth, praying him that he would ſend to the king of Hungarie, that his coſin Edward ſonne of Edmund Ironſide might come into England, for ſo much as he intended to make him king after him, which was called Edward outlaw. The which requeſt was fulfilled, ſo that he came into England with his wife Agatha, and with his children, to wit, Edgar Adelling, Margaret, and Chriſtina. But the yeare after his returne into this realme, this Edward deceaſed at London, and was buried at Wincheſter, or as Iornalenſis ſaith, at Pauls church in London. After whoſe deceaſe the king then receiued Edgar Adelling his ſonne, as his owne child, thinking to make him his heire. But fearing partly the vnſtaiedneſſe and inſtabilitie of the Engliſhmen, partly the pride and malice of Harold the ſon of Godwin, and of others perceiuing thereby that he could not bring that his purpoſe ſo well to paſſe) directed ſolemne ambaſſadors vnto William duke of Normandie his kinſman, admitting and aſſigning him to bee his lawfull heire, next to ſucceede after him to the crowne.

Then the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſtopped the ſute. And not long after that, he maried Goditha, or Editha, daughter of earle Godwin, whom he intreated after ſuch ſort, that he neither put her from his bed, nor yet beait her with her fiebly. ## De iure & appendys regni Britanniæ, &c quod ſit officium regis.

REx autem, quia vicarius ſummi regis eſt, ad hoc eſt conſtitutus, vt regnum terrenum & populum domini, & ſuper omnia ſanctam eius venereatur eccleſiam & regat, & ab iniurioſis defendat, & malefactos ab eo auellat & deſtruat, & penitus diſperet. Quod niſi fecerit, nomen regis non in eo conſtabit, vetum papa Iohanne teſtante, nomen regis perdit: cui Pipinus & Carolus filius eius nec dum reges, ſed principes ſub rege Francorũ ſtulto ſcripſerunt querentes: ſi ita permanere deberent Francorum reges, ſolo regio nomine contenti. A quo reſponſum eſt, illos decet vocare reges, qui vigilanter defendunt & regunt eccleſiam Dei & populum eius, &c. In Engliſh thus.

The king, becauſe he is the vicar of the higheſt king, is appointed for this purpoſe, to rule the earthly kingdome, and the Lords people, and aboue all things to reuerence his holy church, to gouerne it, and to defend it from iniuries: to plucke away wicked doers, ſ vtterly to deſtroy them. Which vnleſſe he do, the name of a king agreeth not vnto him: but he loſeth the name of a king, as witneſſeth pope Iohn: to the which pope, Pipinus and Carolus his ſonne (being not yet kings but princes vnder the French king being not very wiſe) did write, demanding this queſtion, whether the kings of France ought ſo to continue, hauing but onely the name of a king. Vnto whom pope Iohn anſwereth againe, that it was conuenient to call them kings, which vigilantly do defend and gouerne the church of God and his people, following the ſaying of king Dauid the plalmograph: he ſhall not dwell in my houſe which worketh pride, &c.

Ex Libro reg. antiquorum in prætorio London. The office of a king preſcribed in the lawes of king Edward.

Moreouer, a king by right & by his office, ought to defend and conferue fully and wholly in all ampleneſſe without diminution, all the lands, honors, dignities, rights, and liberties of the crowne of his kingdome. And further to reduce into their priſtine ſtate, all ſuch things as haue been diſperſed, waſted, and loſt, which appertaine to his kingdome. Alſo the whole and vnturfaill land with all ſtands about the ſame vnto Norvvay and Denmarke, be appertaining to the crowne of his kingdome, and be of the appurtenances and dignities of the king: making one monarchie and one kingdome, which ſometime was called the kingdome of Britains, and now the kingdome of England: ſuch bounds and limits as is aboueſaid be appointed and limited to the name of this kingdome.

The limits of the kingdome of England how farre they do extend.

The office of a king further declared.

Moreouer, in the foreſaid lawes of this king Edward, it followeth in the ſame booke where the foreſaid Edward, deſcribing the office of a king, addeth in theſe words: A king, ſaith he, ought aboue all things to feare God, to loue and to obſerue his commandements, and cauſe them to be obſerued through his whole kingdome. Hee ought alſo to keepe, cheriſh, maintaine, and guerrie the holy church within his kingdome, with all integritie and libertie, according to the conſtitutions of his anceſtors and predeceſſors: and to defend the ſame againſt all enemies, ſo that God aboue all things bee honoured, and euer be before his eyes. He ought alſo to ſet vp good lawes and cuſtoms, ſuch as be wholeſome and approued: ſuch as bee otherwiſe, to reuocate them, and thruſt them out of his kingdome. Item, he ought to be iudgement and iuſtice in his kingdome, by the counſell of the nobles of his realme. All theſe things ought a king in his owne perſon to doe, taking his oath vpon the euangeliſt, and the bleſſed reliks of ſaints, ſweuring in the preſence of the whole ſtate of his realme (as well of the temporalte as of the ſpiritualtie) before hee bee crowned of the archbiſhops and biſhops. Theſe ſeruants the king ought to haue vnder him as vaſſals: deſchly luſt, auarice, and greedie deſire, whom if the kaepe vnder as his ſeruants and ſlaues, hee ſhall reigne well and honorablie in his kingdome. All things are to be done with good aduiſement and premeditation: and that properly belongeth to a king. For haſtie raſhneſſe bringeth all things to ruine, according to the ſaying of the gaſpell: Euery kingdome diuided in it ſelfe ſhall be deſolate, &c.

Three ſlaues and ſeruants a king ought to haue vnder his ſubiection.

After the dutie and office of princes thus deſcribed, conſequently followeth the inſtitution of ſubiects, declared in many good and neceſſarie ordinances, very requiſite and conuenient for publike gouernment. Of the which lawes William Conquero? was compelled, through the clamo? of the people, to take ſome, but the moſt part he omitted, contrarie to his olme oath at his coronation, inſerting and placing the moſt of his olme lawes in his language, to ſeruc his purpoſe: and which as yet to this preſent day in the ſame Normane language doe remaine. Now (the Lo?d willing) let vs proceed in the ſtorie as in o?der followeth.

¶ King Harold.

Anno 1066. Olcroy? laſt king of Sax?ons.

HAro?d the ſecond ſonne of earle Godwin, and laſt king of the Saxons, notwithſtanding that diuers of the nobles went with Edgar Adeling, the nert heire after Edmund Ironſide: yet he though force and might contemning the yong age of Edgar, and forgetting alſo his promiſe made to duke William, toke vpon him to be king of England, Anno 1066. When Harold Hareſtager, ſonne of Canutus king of Norway and Denmarke, heard of the death of king Edward, hee came into England with three hundred ſhips o? mo?e: who ſhea toyning with Toſtius, bro?her to the ſaid Harold king of England, entred into the north parts, and claimed the land after the death of Edward. But the lords of the countrie aroſe and gaue them battell, notwithſtanding the Danes had the victorie. And therfore Harold king of England prepared toward them in all haſt, and gaue them another ſtrong battell, and there had the victorie, where alſo Harold the Dane was ſlaine by the hand of Harold king of England; and Toſtius was alſo ſlaine in the battell. After this victorie, Harold hoard proud and cauetous, and would not biude the preyes to his knights that had deſerued it, but kept it to himſelfe; whereby he loſt the fauour of many of his knights and people.

Harold king of Denmarke and Toſtius ſlaine.

In this mean time William duke of Normandie ſent ambaſſage to Harold king of England, admoniſhing him of the couenants that were agreed betweene them: which was, to haue kept the land to his vſe after the death of Edward. Yet beſide that the daughter of duke William (that was promiſed to Harold) was dead, Harold thought him therefby diſcharged, and ſaid, that ſuch a rude fo?ith promiſe ought not to be holden concerning an others land, without the conſent of the lords of the ſame: and eſpecially fo? that he was thereunto fo? need o? fo? dread compelled.

The pope ſendeth a banner to duke William to bim bring warre into England.

Vpon theſe anſwers receiued, duke William in the meane while that the meſſengers went & came, gathered his knights, and prepared his naule, and had the aſſent of the lords of his land to aid and aſſiſt him in his iourney. And ouer that ſending vnto Rome to pope Alexander, concerning his title and vopageinto England, the pope confirmeth him in the ſame, and ſent vnto him a banner, willing him to beare it in the ſhip, wherein himſelfe ſhould ſaile. Thus duke William, being prouided of all things concerning his iourney, ſped him to the ſea ſide, and toke ſhipping at the hauen of S. Valerie, where he taried a long time ere he might haue a conuenient wind, for the which his ſouldiers murmured, ſaying it was a lwodneſſe, and a thing diſpleaſing God, to deſire to haue an other mans kingdome by ſtrength, and namely when God was againſt it in ſending contrarie wind, &c. At the laſt the wind ſhortly after came about, and they toke ſhipping with a great company, and landed at Haſtings in Suſſex.

Duke William landeth at Hastings.

For three cauſes duke William entred this land, to ſabdue Harold. One was, for that it was to him giuen by king Edward his nephue. The ſecond was to take wreke fo? the cruell murther of his nephue Alfred, king Edwards bro?her, and of the Normans, which deed he aſcribed chiefly to Harold. The third was, to reuenge the wrong done to Robert archbiſhop of Canterburie, which was exiled by the meanes and labour of Harold, in the time of king Edward.

Three cauſes why duke William entred England.

Thus while Harold was in the north, duke William made ſo great ſpeed, that he came to London before the king; out of which he was holden, till he had made good ſuretie, that he and his people ſhould paſſe through the citie without tarping: which promiſe he well obſerued, paſſed the bridge, and went ouer to Suſſex, from whence he ſent a meſſage vnto Harold, and proffered him three maner of waies. Firſt, either forcer to him the poſſeſſion of the land, and ſo to take it againe of him, vnder tribute reigning vnder him; ſecondly, o? elſe to abide and ſtand to the popes arbitrement betwixt them both; o? thirdly, to defend his quarrell in his olme perſon againſt the duke, and they two onely to trie the matter by dint of ſwo?d, without any o?ther buſineſſe.

Three conditions offered by Harold to D. William.

Johannes Stella, Matthæus Pariſius, Antoninus Archiepiſcopus Florentinus, Robertus Barnus, Johannes Bapt?ſta.

But Harold refuſed all theſe offers, ſaying it ſhould be tried by dint of wo?des, and not by one ſwo?d: and ſo gathered his people and ioyned battell with the Normans, in the place where afterward was builded the abbey of Battell in Suſſex. In the beginning of which fight the Engliſhmen kept them in good aray like to banquith the Normans: wherefore duke William cauſed his men to giue backe as though they fled, whereby the Engliſhmen followed faſt and brake their aray. Then the Normans fiercely giuing a charge vpon them, in concluſion obtained the victorie through the iuſt prouidence of God. Where king Harold who before had murthered Alfred the true heire of the crowne, with his companie of Normans ſo cruelly, was now wounded of the Normans in the left eye with an arrow, and thereof incontinent died: although Geraldus ſaith hee fled away to Cheſter, and liued after that a monke in the monaſterie of S. James. Which is not like, but rather that hee was there ſlaine after that he had reigned nine moneths, and was buried at Waltham (which prouieth that hee died not at Cheſter) and ſo was he the laſt that reigned in England of the blod of Saxons, the which continued (to reckon from Hengiſtus his firſt reigne in Kent) by the ſpace of 591 yeares: and if it be reckoned from the yeares of the Weſtſaxons, then it indured the ſpace of 565 yeares.

Ex Iohan. Stella.

The fight betwixt Harold and duke William.

King Harold ſlaine.

This duke William and king Edward were by the fathers ſide coſin germans remoued. For Richard the firſt of that name which was the third duke of Normandie after Rolo, was father to duke Richard the ſecond of that name, and brother to Emma mother to king Edward. Which duke Richard the ſecond was father to duke Robert, this duke Williams father.

The conſanguinitie betweene king Edward and William the Conqueror.

Albeit in this matter other ſome may gather otherwiſe and better, perchance; yet if I may ſay what I thinke, verily I ſuppoſe, that there is no conſanguinitie ſo much here the cauſe why God of his vnknowen iudgements ſuffered the Normans here to preuaile, as was rather the cruell murther of Alfred and of the innocent Normans, wrought by the cruell deſpite of Harold and the Engliſhmen, as is before declared. The which mercileſſe murther, God here iuſtly in this conqueſt recompenſed.

Further ſuite to recompenſed.

Now remaineth alſo to theſe foreſtaffaires of kings and princes, to adde ſome thing likewiſe concerning the continuation of the archbiſhops of Canterburie, beginning there where we laſt left: that is, with Siphegus, whom we declared a little before to be ſtoned by the Danes at Greenewich. After which Siphegus nert ſucceeded Lifingus, after him Egelnothus alſo aboue mentioned. Then Robertus a Normane a great doer (as is declared) about king Edward, and a faithfull counſellor vnto him, but who abode not long. After whom Stigandus inuaded the ſee, as they report by ſimonie, being both archbiſhop of Canterburie, biſhop of Wincheſter, and alſo abbat in an other place, wherein he continued a great ſpace, gathering and heaping goods togither, till at length duke William clapt him in priſon, and there kept him, placing in his rome Lanfrancus a Lombard borne, of whom more ſhall follow (Chriſt willing) hereafter to be declared.

¶ Although the church of Chriſt and ſtate of religion firſt founded and grounded by Chriſt and his apoſtles, did not continually altogether remaine in his primitiue perfection, wherein it was firſt inſtituted; but in proceſſe of time began from better to worſe to decreaſe and decline into much ſuperſtition and inconuenience: partly through the comming in of Mahumet, partly through the increaſe of wealth & riches, partly through the decreaſe of knowledge and diligence in ſuch as ſhould be the guides of Chriſts flocke: yet the infection and corruption of that time (though it were great) did not ſo abound in ſuch exceſſiue meaſure, as afterward in the other latter times now following, about the thouland yeers expired after Chriſt, wherof we haue to intreat, Chriſt ſo permitting. About which time and yere came Sylueſter, the ſecond of that name, who next ſucceeded after Gregory the fift, before mentioned: and occupied the ſea of Rome about the yere of our Lo?d 1000. lacking one o? two.

Pope Sylueſter the ſecond.

Sylueſter the ſecond a ſonle ſorcerer.

This Sylueſter was a ſorcerer, which after the ſort of them that work by familiars (as they call them) and by coniuration, compaced with the diuell to be made pope. And ſo hee was (though the operation of Satan) according to his requeſt. Which things ſome hiſtories ſay, hee did greatly repent before his death. But fo? a more ample declaration hereof, I will bring in the words of Johannes Stella, a Venetian, tranſlated from Latine into Engliſh, concerning the ſaid Sylueſter: to the intent that our inchunters & ſorcerers now adaies (where of there be too many in England) may the better though his example be admoniſhed. The words of Stella be theſe, agreeing alſo with the narration of Benno, Platina, and many o?thers. Sylueſter, the ſecond of that name, being pope, and a Frenchman, called Gibertus, late in his papacy foure yeers, one month, & eight daies. He entred to his papacie through one month, & laſtly all meanes: who from his youth being a wicked and ſalaſtfull meanes: who from his youth being a monke, and leauing his monaſterey, gaue himſelfe wholly to the diuell, to obtaine that which he required. And firſt comming to Hiſpalis a citie in Spaine, there applied his booke and praiſed alſo, in ſo much that he was made bocto?, hauing amongſt his auditors, (Otho the emperors ſonne, and Robert the French king, Lothar ius archbiſhop of Rauenna, and at laſt, though the Rhene, archbiſhop of Rauenna, and at laſt, though the operation of Satan, was exalted to the papacie of Rome, by on this condition, that after his death he ſhould giue himſelfe to the diuell, by whoſe procurement he came to that promotion. Upon a certaine time hee demanded an anſwer of the diuell, how long he ſhould inioy his popedom. To whom he anſwered again, Until thou ſay maſſe in Jeruſalem thou ſhalt line. At length the fourth yere of his popedome, ſaying maſſe at Lent time, in the temple of the holy croſſe, being called then Jeruſalem, there hee knew the time was come when hee ſhould die. Whereupon being ſtruck with repentance, confeſſed his faults openly before the people: deſiring all men to cut his body all in peeces (being ſo ſeduced by deceits of the diuell) and ſo being beuen in peeces, they would lay it vpon a cart, and burp it there wherſoeuer the horſes would carie it of their accord. And ſo the ſaying is to be, th at by the prouidence of God (wherby the wicked may learne yet hope of remiſſion with God, ſo that they will repent them in their life) the horſes of their olme accord ſtaied at the church of Laterane, and there he was buried: where as commonly by the rating of his bones within the tombe, is portended the death of popes, as the common report goeth. Thus much out of Johannes Stella concerning Sylueſter. By whom our ſorcerers & inchanters, o? magicians may learne to beware of the deceitfull operation of Satan, who at the end deceiueth and fruſtrateth all them that haue to do with him: as the end of all ſuch doth declare commonly, which vſe theſlike art o? trade. The Lo?d and God of all mercy, through the ſpirit of Jeſus our redeemer, diſſolue the works of Satan, and preſerue the harts of our nobles, and of all other Engliſhmen from ſuch infection, Amen.

Ex Iohan. Stella.

An admonition for ſorcerers and wicked conuerers.

After Sylueſter, ſucceeded John the nineteenth, by whom was brought in (as Volaterran ſaith) the feaſt of All ſoules brought into the church. Platina ſaith, the feaſt of All ſaints. This monke Dilo, thinking that purgatory (as he heard) ſhould be in the mount Aetna, dreamed vpon a time in the country of Sicill, that hee by his maſſes had deliuered diuers ſoules taken from them by the maſſes & dirges funerall. Ex Balcuthopo. in prolo. 4. lib. ſentent. And not long after him came John the twentith, and Sergius the fourth. After whom ſucceeded Benedictus the eighth: then John the one and twentith, who being promoted by art magicke of Theophylact his nephew, Gratianus, Bazulus, & other ſorcerers bought in and preſerue the harts of our nobles, and of all other Engliſhmen from ſuch infection, Amen.

Benedictus the ninth.

Gregorius the ſixth.

Which cauſe Henricus, ſurnamed Niger, the emperor, coming to Rome, diſplaced theſe three monſters at one time, placing for them Clement the ſecond, who then pon inacting that there ſhould no biſhop of Rome hereafter be choſen, but by the conſent and confirmation of the emperour. Which conſtitution, though it was both agreeable, and alſo neceſſary for publike tranquillitie of that citie, yet the cardinals would not ſuffer it long to ſtand, but did impugne it afterward by ſubtill practiſe and open violence, as in proceſſe (the Lo?d permitting) ſhall appeare, in the time of Henricus the fourth and the fifth. In the time of this Clement, the Romans made an oth to the emperor, concerning the election of the biſhops, themſelues to intermedle no further therein, but as the aſſent of the emperour ſhould go with all. Hoſwbeit the emperor departing thence into Germany againe, by and by they forgot their oth, and within nine months after poiſoned the biſhop. Which fact, ſome impute to Stephen his ſucceſſor, called Damaſus the ſecond. Some impute it to Bzanius, who (as hiſtories record) within thirteen yeeres poiſoned ſix popes, that is, Clement the ſecond, Damaſus the ſecond, Leo the ninth, Victo? the ſecond, Stephanus the ninth, Nicholaus the ſecond.

A conſtitution, how a pope ſo be choſen, but by the conſent and confirmation of the emperour.

Pope Clement the ſecond.

Pope Damaſus the ſecond.

Thus Clement being poiſoned, after him ſucceeded Damaſus the ſecond, neither by conſent of the people, no? of the emperor elected, but by force and tumult, who alſo within three and twenty daies being poiſoned, in the yere 1049, much contention and ſtriuing began in Rome about the papall ſeat. Whereupon the Romans through the counſel of the cardinals ſent to the foreſaid emperor, deſiring to giue them a biſhop, and ſo he did, whoſe name was Bruno an Almain, biſhop of Culen, afterward called Leo the ninth. This Bruno being a ſimple man, and eaſie to be led with euill counſell, coming from the emperor towards Rome in his pontificall apparell like a popethere meeteth him by the way the abbat of Cluniake, and Hildebrand a monke, who ſeeing him ſo in his pontificalibus, began to rate him, laying to his charge, that he would ſo take his authoritie of the emperor, and not rather of the clergy of Rome, and the people thereof, as other his predeceſſors were wont to do: and ſo counſelled him to lay bowne that apparell, and to enter in with his olme habit, till he had his election by them. Bruno following their counſell, and confeſſing his fault before the clergy of Rome, obteined their fauour, and ſo was nominat Leo the ninth, whereby Hildebrand was made a cardinall, and put in high preme. Under this pope Leo were two councels, one kept at Vercelle, where the doctrine of Berengarius againſt the reall preſence in the ſacrament was firſt condemned, although Berengarius yet recanted not, which neuertheleſſe was done after in the councell of Lateran, vnder Nicholaus the ſecond, in the yere 1060. The other was kept at Moguntia, where amongſt many other decrees, was enacted, priеſts to be excluded and debarred vtterly from marriage. Item, that no lay man might giue benefice o? biſhoprick, o? any ſpirituall promotion, &c.

Pope Leo the ninth.

Concilium Moguntinum.

This Leo being at Thomes with the emperor vpo Chriſtmas day, did excommunicat the ſubdeacon, becauſe in reading the epiſtle, he did it not in the Roman tune, he being there preſent. The archbiſhop moued therewith, departed from the altar, (being then at maſſe) ſaying, he would not proceed any further in his ſeruice, vnleſſe his ſubdeacon were reſtored, where vpon the pope commanded him to be releaſed, and ſo they went forward in their ſeruice.

Ann. Crantz. Saxo. lib. 4. cap. 45.

After the death of Leo, whom Bazutus poiſoned the firſt yere of his popedom, Theophylactus did ſtriue to be pope: but Hildebrand to defeat him, went to the emperor: (partly alſo being ſent by the Romans for feare of the emperors diſpleaſure who aſſigned another biſhop a Germane, called Victo? the ſecond. This Victo? hauing a councel at Florence, depoſed diuers biſhops and prieſts for ſimonie and fornication: for ſimonie, in that they toke of ſecular men their dignities for money: for fornication, in that contrary to their canon, they were married, &c. The ſecond yere of his papacie, and little more, this pope alſo followed his predeceſſors, being poiſoned by the foreſaid Bazutus, through the procurement of Hildebrand and his matter.

Pope Victor the ſecond.

Here now began the church and clergy of Rome to vſurp out of the emperors hand the election of the pope: electing Stephen the ninth for pope, contrary to their oth and to the emperors aſſignment. Here was the church of Rome firſt brought to obedience of the Romiſh church, by this Stephanus the ninth biſhop of Rome, who alſo ſhamed not to accuſe the emperor Henry of whom mention is made before) of hereſie, for minithing the authoritie of the Roman ſea. So this was their hereſie at that time, not to maintaine the ambitious preſumptions of the Romiſh prelat. And ſimonie there called this, to take and inioy any ſpirituall liuing at a ſecular mans hand. Wherefore Stephen hearing this ſimony to raigne in diuers places, namely in the churches of Burgundy and Italy, ſent forth the cardinall Hildebrand to reſorme the matter: who was no leſſe earneſt in that kind of commiſſion to helpe the matter forward.

Pope Stephen the ninth. The church of Rome firſt brought vnder the church of Rome. The emperor accuſed of hereſie.

Hildebrand ſent in commiſſion for ſimony.

In the meane time Stephanus the pope, taſting of Bazutus cup fell ſicke. Hildebrand hearing that, appointeth home with all poſt ſpeed. So being returned to Rome, aſſembleth all the companies companies and orders of the clergie together, making them to sweare that they should admit none to bee bishop, but which should be appointed by the publike consent of them al together. This being done, Hildebrand taketh his iourny into Florence, beeing to fetch the bishop of Florence, to call him bishop: the clergy swearing vnto him, that no bishop should be obtained before his returne againe. But the people of Rome not suffering the election to stand so long, all ye death of Stephen, elected one of their own city, called Benedictus the tenth. Hildebrand hearing of this, was not a little offended: wherefore returning to Rome with one Garhardus bishop of Florence, caused the clergy to proceed to a new election, saying, that Benedictus was not lawfully called, but came in by force and bribing. Vpon the clergy not daring to attempt any new election at Rome, went to Siene, and there elected this Garhardus bishop of Florence, who n Hildebrand brought with him. So were two popes in Rome together: But Garhardus, named Nicolas the second, to ding a councel at Sutrium, through the help of duke Godfride and Guibert, and other bishops about Italy, caused the other pope to be deposed. Benedictus vnderstanding them to be set against him through the meanes of Hildebrand, deposed himselfe, and went to Telleras, liuing there more quietly than he should haue done at Rome.

Hildebrand by ſtately to ate.

Pope Benedictus thrusteth.

Pope Nicolas the second. Two popes in Rome together. Nicolas excommunicateth Benedict. Benedict excommunicateth him.

Here is to be touched by the way, the error of the glosse vpon the three and twentith distinction, which falsly alleageth out of the chronicles: that Benedictus the tenth, which succeeded Stephen, was deposed: after whom came Johannes bishop of Sabine for nine, and he againe deposed. Benedictus was then restored, and after displaced againe, and then Johannes archdeacon Ad portam latinan, was made pope, and he againe deposed by the emperor, and all in one yere. Which storie neither is found in any chronicle, nor agreeth vpon any Benedictus, saue only that Benedictus the ninth, which was deposed, & three raigned three popes together, Benedictus the ninth, Syluester the third, and Gregorius the sixth, which before was called Iohannes ad portam latinam, whom the emperor deposed: all three togither. But that Benedict neither was the tenth, neither did he succeed pope Stephen, as the glosse recordeth. Nicolas thus being set vp without the ninth both of the emperor and of the people of Rome, after his fellow pope was driuen away, bake vp the synod of Sutrium, and came to Rome, where he assembled another councell, called Concilium Lateranum. In which councell first was promulgat the terrible sentence of excommunication mentioned in the decrees, and beginneth: In nomine Domini nostri &c. The effect whereof is this. First, that he after a fearfull practise as far as plainly as he durst speake) vndermineth the empreros iurisdiction, and transferreth to a few cardinals, and certaine catholike persons, the full authoritie of chusing the pope. Secondly, against all such as doe creep into the seat of Peter by money or fauor, without the full cõsent of the cardinals: he banneth with terrible blasts of excommunication, accursing them and their children with diuels, as wicked persons, to the anger of almighty God, giuing also authoritie and power to cardinals with the clergy and laity, to depose all such persons, and call a councell generall, wheresoeuer they will against them.

Concilium Lateranum. Anno 1059 Dist. 23. In no. A terrible curse of pope Nicolas.

Item, in the said councell of Laterane, vnder pope Nicolas the second, Berengarius Andegauensis, an archdeacon, was driuen to the recantation of his doctrine, denying the reall substance of Christs holy body and blood to be in the sacrament, otherwise then sacramentally and in mystery.

Berengarius recanteth his transubstantiation.

In the same councell also was hatched and inuented the new found deuice and terme of transubstantiation.

Transubstantiation brought into the church.

It were too long here to declare the confederation betwixt this Nicolas and Robertus Guiscardus, whom this pope (contrary to all right and god law, displacing the right heire) made duke of Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and captaine generall of S. Peters landes: at though his force of armes and violence, he might the better indue all such as should rebell to his obedience, and so did. Now let all men iudge and vnderstand (which be godly wise) how this flatterly with the doctrine of Christ, the example of Peter, or the spirit of a christian bishop, by outward armes and violence to conquer christian men and countries, vnder the obedience of a bishops sea. Thus pope Nicolas the second well answering to his Greeke name, by might & force continued three yeres and a halfe. But at length he met with Damasus 2. and so turned vp his heeles.

Desyring peace reacheth thereafter with the gospell. Anno 1062

At the beginning of this Nicolas, or somewhat before, about the yere of our Lord 1057. Henricus the fourth, after the decease of Henry the third, was made emperour, being but a child, and raigned fifty yeres: but not without great molestation and much disquietnesse, and all through the ingratious wickednesse of Hildebrand, as hereafter (the Lord so permitting) shall be declared.

Henricus the fourth emperor.

Here by the way commeth to bee noted an example, whereby all princes may learne and vnderstand, how the pope is to be handled, whosoeuer loketh to haue any godlinesse at his hand. If a man stand in feare of his curse, he shall be made his slaue: but if he be despised of you, you shall haue him as your lust. For the popes curse may well be allemiled to Domitians thunder: If a man giue eare to the noise and cracke, it seemeth a terrible thing: but if you consider the causes and effect thereof, it is a meer vainenesse.

The popes curse compared to Domitians thunder.

In the raigne of this Nicolas, in the yeare 1060. Aldredus bishop of Worcester, after the decease of Kinsius his predecessor should be made archbishop of Yorke, who comming to Rome with Tostius earle of Northumberland for his pall (as the manner was) could not obtaine it, but was despised of all his dignitie, for some default (I cannot tell what) in his answer: and furthermore, after his reuersion home, was spoiled also of all that he brought with him. Wherevpon he returning againe to Rome with Tostius the foresaid earle, there made his complaint, but could not be heard: till Tostius, a man of stout courage, taking the matter in hand, told the pope to his face, that his curse was not to be feared in far countries, which his owne neighbors, yea and most vile vagabonds derided and despised at home. Wherefore he required the pope, either to restore Aldredus againe to his goods lost, or else it should be knowne that they were lost through his meanes and subtilties. And furthermore, it would come to passe, that the king of England hearing this, would order him of S. Peters tribute, taking it for a great shame to him and his realme, if Aldredus should come from Rome both despised of dignitie, and spoiled also of his goods, &c. In fine, the pope thus persuaded by the argument of his purse, was content to send home Aldredus with his pall, according to his request.

Psal. 43.

After the death of Nicolas, the Lombards being oppressed before by pope Nicolas, and brought vnder feare, were the more desirous, and thought it good to haue a bishop of their companie, and so elected the bishop of Parmen called Cadolaus, to be pope: leading to the emperor, and desiring his fauor and supportation therein, for the election of the pope (said they) most properly appertained vnto him.

Cadolaus a Lombard made pope by the emperor.

The emperor well pleased and content, giueth his good leaue and voice withall. Hildebrand, no lesse a wicked necromancer, then a stout maintainer of popish liberties against god emperors, hearing this, setteth vp by a contrary faction, another bishop, Anselmus, after called Alexander the second. Cadolus thus elected by the emperor and the cardinals, setteth forward to Rome with a sufficient army and strength of men. Alexander also hauing his friends there receiued him with another armie, where they had a great conflict, and many slaine on both sides. But Cadolus as he had the better cause, so had he the worse fortune: who being repelled, yet repaired himselfe and came againe with a greater power: albeit hee preuailed not. The emperor hearing this hurly burly: to take vp the matter, sent thither his ambassadour. Who archbishop of Tullen, who comming to Rome, beginneth sharply to chide the pope for taking so vpon him without the leaue or knowledge of the emperor, declaring how the election of that see ought chiefely to appertaine to the right of the emperor, as it hath done for the most part in the time of his predecessors before. But Hildebrand all set vpon mischeeuous ambition, and also put vp not a little with his late victories; not suffering the ambassadour to tell to the end, interrupted him in the middle of his tale, affirming, that if they should stand to law & custome, the liberty of that election should rather belong to the clergie then to the emperor. To make short, Who the ambassador bearing (belike) more with the clergie then with the emperor, was content to be perswaded only required this in the emperors name, a councell to be had, to decide the matter: where at the emperor should be present himselfe: and so he was. In the which councell being kept at Mantua, Alexander was declared pope, the other had his pardon granted. In this councell amongst many other deliberations, was concluded concerning priests to haue no wiues: such as haue concubines to say no masse: priests chosen not to be secluded from holy orders: no benefices to be bought for money: alleuiats to be suspended til the time of Lent out of the church, &c. This also was decreed (which made most for Hildebrands purpose) that no spirituall man, whatsoeuer he be, should enter in any church by a secular person, and that the pope should be elected only by the cardinals, &c. Vnto Cardinalles inuented thus of Alexander, that after hee perceiued the fraudes of Hildebrand, and of other emperors enemies; and vnderstanding that he was set vp and inthronised but only for a purpose; being at his masse, as he was preaching to the people, told them he would not sit in the place, vnlesse he had the licence of the emperor. Which then Hildebrand heard, he was stricken in such a feare, that scarcely he could keepe his hands off him, while masse was done. After the masse being finished, by force of soldiors and strength of men he had him into a chamber, and there all to be pommild pope Alexander with his fists, rating and rebuking him for that he would seeke for fauor of the emperor. Thus Alexander being kept vp in custodie, and being limited to a certaine allowance, as about five grotes a day, Hildebrand incroched all the whole reuenues of the church to himselfe, procuring thereby much treason. At length Alexander vnder the miserable endurance of Hildebrand, died at euentide after eleuen yeares and a halfe of his popedome. And thus much of Romish matters.

These things thus discoursed concerning the matters of Rome, now returning againe to our olume countrie storie, the order thereof would require to enter againe into the raigne of William Conqueror, the next king following in England. But

But as a certaine oration of king Edgars, which should haue been placed before, chanced in the meane time to come to my hands, not vnworthy to be read: I thought by the way in the end of this booke to insert the same (although out of order) yet better I iudge it out of order, then out of the booke.

The oration of king Edgar to the clergy.

BEcause God hath shewed his great mercy to worke with vs it is meet (most reuerend fathers) that we with wordy works we should answer his innumerable benefits. For we possesse not the land by our owne sword, and our owne arme hath not sained vs: but his right hand and his holy arme, because he hath bin delighted in vs. Therefore it is meet that we should submit both our selues and our soules to him, that hath subiected all these things vnder our gouernment: and that we ought stoutly to labor, that they whom he hath made subiect to vs, might be maners belongeth vnto vs: whether they liue chastlie, if they behaue themselues honestly toward them that be without, whether they be diligent at Gods seruice, if they be earnest to teach the people, if they be sober in eating and drinking, if they keep measure in apparell, and if they be discreet in iudgement. If yee had regarded these things with a triall of them (O reuerend fathers, by your leaues I speake) such horrible and abominable things of the clerks, should not haue come vnto our ears. I omit to speake how their crowne is not brode, nor their rounding conuenient: the wantonnes in your life, your pride in your gesture, the filthinesse in your words, doe declare the euill of the sture, the filthinesse in your words, doe declare the euill of the inward man.

Furthermore, what negligence is in Gods seruice, when scarse they will be present at the holy vigils? And when they come to masse, they seeme rather to bee gathered to play and laugh then to sing. I wil tell that, that good men for sorrow, and the euill laugh at. I will speake with sorrow (if to be I may expresse it) how they be riotous in bankettings, in chambering, drunkennes, and vnshamefastnes: that now clerks houses may be thought to be a stewes of harlots, and a couent of plaiers. There be dice, there is dancing and singing, there is watching to midnight, with crying & shouting. Thus the goods of kings, the almes of princes, yea (and that is more) the price of that precious blood is not esteemed. Haue our fathers then spent their treasures for this purpose? Hath the kings coffers decaied by taking away many reuenewes, for this cause? Hath the kings liberalitie giuen lands and possessions to Christs Churches for this intent, that clerks harlots should be decked with the same? that riotous feasts might be decked? that hounds & hawks and such other toies might be gotten? The souldiers cry out of these things, the people grudge, minstrels sing & dance, and yet ye regard it not, ye spare it, ye dissemble it. Where is the sword of Leule, and the zeale of Simeon, which killed the Sichemits, and the circumcised, which bare the figure of the that defile Christs church with filthy deeds, because they abused Iacobs daughter as an harlot? Where is Moses spirit, which spared not his owne kinsfolke that worshipped the head of the calfe?

Where is Phinees the priests dagger, which pacified Gods anger by his holy zeale, when he killed him that plaied the harlot with the Madianit? Where is Peters spirit, by whose power couetousnesse is detroied, and simoniacall hereste is condemned? Be earnest ye priests, be earnest to follow the waies of the Lord, and the righteousnes of our God. It is time to do against then that haue broken the law of God. I haue Constantines sword, and ye haue Peters sword in your hands; let vs ioyne right hands, let vs couple sword to sword, that the lepers may be cast out of the temples, that the holy place of the Lord may be purged, and the sonnes of Leui may minister in the temple, who said to his father and mother, I know you not, and to his brothers, I know not you. Go to diligently I pray you, lest we repent to haue done that we haue done, and to haue giuen that we giue. If we shall see that to be spent not in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnes of wicked men, through vile & corrupt liberty of life, for lacke of chastisement: let the relikes of holy Saints which they despise, & the holy altars, before which they play the mad men, moue you. Let the great deuotion of our ancestors moue you, whose almes the madnes of the clerks doth abuse. My great grandfather (as ye know) gaue the tenth part of all his lands to churches and abbies. My great great grandfather, Alfredus of holy memory, thought it not meet to spare his treasures, his goods, no costs, nor rents, that he might inrich the Church. My grandfather the elder, Edward, your fatherhood is not ignorant how great things he gaue to the churches. It becommeth you to remember with what gifts my father and his brothers did inrich Christs altars. O father of fathers, Dunstan, behold (I pray thee) the eies of my father looking on thee, from that bright place of heauen: hearken to his complaining words sounding in thine eares, thus pitifully lamenting: O father Dunstan, thou, thou (I say) gauest me counsell to build abbies and Churches, thou wait my helper & fellow worker in all things: I chose thee as a shepheard & bishop of my soule, and a keeper of my maners. When did I not obey thee? What treasures did I prefer in respect of thy counsels? What possessions did I not despise, if thou badst me? If thou thoughtst meete to giue any thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou thoughtst meet to giue any thing to churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedst that monkes or clerks wanted any thing, I supplied. Thou saidst that almes lasted for euer, and that there was none more fruitfull then that which was giuen to abbies or churches. For with that, both Gods seruants are sustained, and that which remaineth is giuen to the poore. O worthy almes! O worthie price of the soule! O wholesome remedie for our sinnes, which now doth stinke in the sweet furs of priests leumans, wherewith they adorne their cares and decke their fingers, apparelling their delicat bodies with silke and purple! O father, is this the fruite of mine almes, is this the effect of my desire, and of thy promise? What wilt thou answere to this complaint of my fathers? I know, I know: When thou didst see a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast exhorted, thou hast blamed them: but words haue been despised; now we must come to stripes of correction. Thou hast here with thee the worshipfull father Edward bishop of Winchester. Thou hast the reuerend prelat Oswold bishop of Worcester. I commit this businesse to you, that both by bishoplie correction, and the kings authoritie, the filthie liuers may bee cast out of the churches, and they that liue orderly may be brought in, &c.

In this oration of king Edgar aboue prefred, three things are chiefly to be noted and considered of them that haue inducement to marke and vnderstand, to wit: The religious zeale and deuotion of kings, both in giuing to the church, and also in correcting the maners of churchmen. Secondly, the dissolute behauior and wantonnes of the clergy, then abusing the great reuenues and patrimonies of princes bestowed vpon them. Thirdly, the blinde ignorance and superstition of that time in both states, as well ecclesiasticall as temporall, in esteeming Christs religion chiefly to consist in giuing to churches, and in maintaining of monkery, sadly being perswaded that remission of the sinnes, and remedy of their soules therein, no lesse then building monasteries, erecting churches and cloisters, and in placing monkes in the same, such other almsdeeds, and works of deuotion. Wherein appeareth how ignorant that time was of the true doctrine of Christs faith, and of free grace of the gospell, which promiseth life, remedy, and iustification, not by any deuout merits of cures, nor by any works either of the law of God, or of the inuentions of man, but onely and freely by our faith in Christ Iesus the sonne of God, in whom only consisteth all the promises of God. Amen.

The signifience and superstition of the time of king Edgar noted.

The doctrine of iustification vnknowne.

Iustification by faith in Christ.

Now remaineth as in the former booke before, so in this likewise, to prosecute the order and race of archbishops of Canterburie, as wee haue done the race of kings, beginning with Etheldredus, who succeeded next after Celnothe, the seuententh archbishop of that sea, mentioned where we left before.

William Conqueror.

WIlliam Duke of Normandie, surnamed Conqueror, base sonne of Duke Robert, the first Duke of Normandie, and nephew vnto king Edward, after the foresaid victory against Harold and the Englishmen obtained, was receiued king ouer the realme of England, not so much by assent, as for feare and necessitie of time. For else the Londoners had promised their assistance to Edgar Atheling to the vttermost of their power. But being weakened and wasted in sundrie battels before, and the Duke comming to assault them, fearing not to make their party good, submitted themselues. Whereupon the said William (of a duke made a king) was crowned vpon Christmas day in the yeere of our Lord 1067. by the hands of Aldredus archbishop of Yorke; for as much as at that time Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury was absent, or else durst not, or would not come in the presence of the king. A little before the comming in of this duke, a terrible blazing starre was seene the space of seuen daies, which was the yeere before. In record whereof, as well of the conquest of the duke, as of the blazing starre, these verses yet remaine:

Sexagenus erat sextus millesimus annus,
Cum pereunt Anglis, stellæ monstrante cometa.

Which king thus being crowned, did reigne ouer the realme of England the space of one and twenty yeeres and one moneth, with great seueritie and cruelnesse toward the Englishmen, hurthening them with great tributes and exactions; which was to pay of euery hide of ground containing twenty acres, fiue shillings. By meanes whereof certaine parts of the land rebelled, and specially the citie of Exceter. But at last William ouercame them, and won the citie, & punished them grieuously. But for that and for other sterne deeds of William, diuers of the lords departed into Scotland: wherefore hee kept the other lords that tarried the straiter, and exalted the Normans, giuing to them the chiefe possessions of the land. And forsomuch as he obtained the kingdome by force & dint of sword, hee changed the whole state of the gouernance of this commonweale; and ordeined new lawes at his own pleasure, profitable to himselfe, but grieuous and hurtfull to the people: abolishing the lawes of king Edward, whereunto notwithstanding he was sworne before, to obserue and maintaine. For the which, great commotions and rebellions remained long after among the people (as histories record) to haue the said lawes of king Edward reuiued againe.

King William following king Edwards lawes.

Where by the way speaking of lawes, this is memorable, that euen in this kings time the authoritie of the temporall magistrat was distinct from that of the church; but yet in such sort, that if need required, he should deale in causes ecclesiasticall, and be assistant to the bishop; whose iurisdiction what it was, and how qualified by king William now holding the sterne of gouernment in his hand, the words following doe declare.

Turrit. Lond.

✠ Willelmus gratia Dei rex Anglorum, comitibus, vicecomitibus, & omnibus Francigenis & Anglis, qui in episcopatu Remigij episcopi terras habent, salutem. Sciatis, &c. In English thus.

William by the grace of God king of England, to all shiriffes, vndershiriffes, and to all Frenchborne & English, which in the bishoprick of Remigius the bishop haue lands, greeting. Know you all, and the rest my faithfull subiects which abide in England, that the bishops lawes which haue bin not well, nor according to the precepts of holy canons, euen to my time in the kingdom of England, by the common counsel and the counsell of mine archbishops, and the rest of bishops and abbats, with all the princes of my kingdome I haue iudged to bee amended. Wherefore I command, and by my royall authority giue in charge, that no bishop or archdeacon do hold any more pleas of law in the hundred by the bishops lawes, nor bring any cause which pertaineth to the cure of soules vnto the iudgment of secular men: but whosoeuer according to the bishops lawes, about any sute or default be troubled, shall come to the place, which to this end the bishop shall chuse and name, and there answer his cause, and not according as in the hundred, but according to the canons and lawes of the bishop they shall do right vnto God and to their bishop. And if any puffed vp with pride, being called once, twice and thrice to the court of pleas, refuseth to come, and will not so be drawne to amendment, let him be excommunicat. And if need be to correct and reuenge this, this, let the power and iustice of the kings vndershiriffe be vsed. And he which being called or summoned to the bishops court, will not come, for euery calling shall be put to his answer before the bishop, and make amends. And this I defend, and by mine authoritie forbid, that no vndershiriffe, or prouost, or officer of the king, nor any layman, meddle or make with the laws belonging to the bishop; nor that any layman bring or sue another out of the bishops court of iustice vnto iudgement. And as for iudgement, let it be giuen in no place but in the bishops see, or in that place which in this behalfe the bishop shall appoint.)

By this euidence of record it is manifest (as you see) that duke William (now king) hauing assumed vnto himselfe the absolute authoritie roiall, indeuored to establish a forme of gouernement both in the church and commonwealth answerable to his owne mind: howbeit this is to be noted, that he allowed vnto the clergie a kind of iurisdiction of consenting persons before them, and likewise of exercising such ecclesiasticall discipline as the qualitie of that age and time did vse. Wherein we will not stand to debate any thing at large, but proceed in the course of our storie, as the spirit of God shall vouchsafe to direct vs.

Poore with the minster of S. Peter burnt.

Diuers and besides this, the foresaid William, as he was a warrior, so he delighting in forts and bulworks, builded foure strong castles: two at Yorke, one at Notingham, and another at Lincolne, which garrisons he furnished with Normans.

About the third yeere of his reigne, Harold and Canutus sonnes of Swanus, king of Denmarke, entred into the north countrie. The Normans within Yorke, fearing that the Englishmen would aid the Danes, fired the suburbs of the towne. Whereof the flame was so big, and the wind so strong, that it tooke into the citie, and burnt a great part thereof, with the minster of S. Peter, where no doubt many worthie works and monuments of books were consumed. In the time whereof the Danes by the fauor of some of the citizens entred the citie, and slue more then three thousand of the Normans. But not long after king William chased them out, and drawe them to their ships, and tooke such displeasure with the inhabitants of that countrie, that he destroyed the land from Yorke to Durham, so that nine yeeres after the prouince lay waste and vnmanured, onely except S. Johns land of Beuerlie, and the people thereof so stirtifie being kept in perurie by the war of the king, that (as our English storie saith) they eat rats, cats, and dogs, with other vermin.

The north countrie wasted. Horrible famin in the north parts of Northumberland.

Scots subdued to king Williams.

Also in the fourth yeere of this king, Malcome king of Scots entred into Northumberland, and destroied the countrie, and slue there many of the people both of men, women and children after a lamentable sort, and tooke some prisoners. But within two yeeres after, king William made such war vpon the Scots, that he forced Malcolme their king to do him homage.

And thus much concerning the outward calamities of this realme vnder this foren Conquerour, which is now the fift time that the said land, with the inhabitants thereof hath beene scourged by the hand of God. First by the Romans in the time of Julius Cesar. Then by the Scots and Picts (as hath beene shewed) afterward by the Saxons. Againe, the Saxons & Englishmen did not enioy the possession of Britaine with long quiet, but were brought in as much subiection themselues vnder the Danes, as they had brought the Britains before (and that much more) in so much that through all England, if an Englishman had met a Dane vpon a bridge, he might not stir one foot, before the lord Dane (otherwise Lurdane) were past. And then if the Englishman had not giuen low reuerence to the Dane at his comming by, he was sure to be sharplie punished (swith more) as aboue hath beene declared. And this subiection almost continued from the reigne of king Ethelwolfus 220 yeeres, till the reigne of king Edward. And yet the indignation of God thus ceased not, but stirred by the Normans against them, who conquered & altered the whole realme after their owne purpole, in so much that besides the innouation of the lawes, coines, and possessions, there was in no church of England almost any English bishop, but only Normans and forreners placed through all their diocese. To such miserie was this land then brought, that not onely of all the English nobilitie not one house was standing; but also it was thought reproofull to be called an Englishman. This punishment of God against the English nation, writers do assigne diuerslie to diuers causes (as partlie before is touched) of whom, some allgne this to be the cause, as followeth in the words of the storie: In primitiua Anglie ecclesia religio clarissime splenduit, ita vt reges & regine, duces & episcopi, vel monachatum, vel exilium pro Dei amore appeterent: processu vero temporis adeo omnis virtus in eis emarcuit, vt genus nullum proditione & nequitia sibi parem esse permitterent, &c. The meaning whereof is this: That whereas kings and queenes, dukes and prelats, in the primitiue time of the English church, were readie for religion to forsake either libertie or countrie, and giue themselues to a solitarie life: in processe of time they grew to such dissolutenesse, that they left no other realme like vnto them in iniquitie, &c. Againe, some writing of the vilan of king Edward a little before the inuasion of the Normans, testifie, how the king repoting of his owne vision should heare, that for the great enormitie and misbehauior of the head dukes, bishops, and abbats of the realme, the kingdome should be giuen to the hand of their enemies after the decease of him, for the space of one hundred yeeres & one day. Which space was also seene by William Conqueror, to be one hundred and fiftie yeeres: and that his progenie so long should continue. Againe, some writers intreating of this to great wrath of God vpon the English people, declare the cause thereof as followeth: Nam sicut Anglo subiectos quos Deus determinare proposuerat (peccatis suis exigentibus) humiliauerat, & terra Anglie minus iuste fugauerant: sic isti duplici persecutione, &c. Like as the Englishmen did subdue the Britans (whom God purposed for their offendings to exterminate) and them vniustly did dispossesse of their land: so they should likewise be subdued and scourged with a double persecution; first by the Danes, and after by the Normans. &c. Moreouer, to these iniuries and iniquities done and wrought by the Englishmen, hitherto recited, let vs adde the cruell villany of this nation, in murthering and tithing of the innocent Normans before: who comming as strangers with Alfred the lawful heire of the crowne were despightfully put to death. Which seemeth to me no little cause why the Lord (whose doings be alway iust and right) did suffer the Normans so to preuaile. By the comming in of the which Normans, and by their quarrel vnto the realm, three things we may note and learne. First, to consider and learne the righteous retribution and wrath of God from heauen, vpon all iniquitie and vnrighteous dealing of men. Secondly, we may thereby note, what it is for princes to leaue no iust or sure succession behind them. Thirdly, what dangers often doe chance to realmes publikely by foren marriage with other princes, &c.

Englishmen iustly scourged for their cruell cruelty against the Normans.

Three things in this conquest to be noted.

Gods iust iudgement.

Lacke of successeon.

Foren marriages.

In the same fourth yeere of this king, betweene Easter and Whitsontide, was holden a solemne Councell at Winchester of the Clergy of England. At the which councell were present two cardinals sent frō Pope Alexander the second, Peter and John. In this councell, the king being there himselfe present, were deposed diuers bishops, abbats, and priors, (by the means of the king) without any euident cause to the intent his Normans might be preferred to the rule of the Church, as he had preferred his knights before to the rule of the temporalitie, thereby to stand in more surety of the land. Amongst whom also Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury was put downe for three causes against him pretended.

Anno 1070 A Councell holden at Winchester.

Single ouercommeth right.

Diuers bishops abbats and priors deposed in England.

The first was, for that he had holden wrongfully that bishoprickе, while Robert the archbishop (aboue mentioned) was liuing.

Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury deposed, and the causes why.

The second was, for that he had receiued the pall of Benedict bishop of Rome, the sift of that name. Which Benedict, for buying his popedome, had been deposed, as is shewed before.

The third cause, for that he occupied the said pall without licence and lawfull authority of the court of Rome.

Then Stigandus well prouoked the benenolence of king William. For where before the king semed in friendly countenance to make much of him, and did vnto him great reuerence: then he changed all his mildnesse into stermesse, and accused himselfe by the bishop of Romes authoritie. So that in the end, Stigandus was deprined of his dignitie, and kept in Winchester as a prisoner during his life. This Stigandus is noted for a man so couetous and sparing, that when he would take nothing of his owne, and swearing that he had not a penie, yet by a key fastened about his necke, was found great treasure of his vnder the ground.

Faire countenance not to be trusted.

A couetous bishop.

At the same time was preferred to the archbishoprickе of Yorke, Thomas a Norman and canon of Bajon.

Thomas made archbishop of Yorke.

At which time also Lanfrancus abbat of Caadomonecle (a Lombard, and Italian borne) was sent for, & made archbishop of Canterbury, betweene which two archbishops about their consecration first began a contention, for giuing and taking the oth of obedience: but that contention was at that time appeased by the king, and Thomas was contented to subscribe to the archbishop of Canterburies obedience.

Lanfrancus an Italian archbishop of Canterbury.

After this it followed within short space, that the said Lanfrancus and Thomas archbishop of Yorke, who first builded the minster of Yorke, and gaue possessions thereunto, came to Rome with Remigius bishop of Dorcester for their pals, as the maner was; without which no archbishop nor bishop could be confirmed, although their election were neuer so lawfull. This pall must be asked no where but of Pope or his assigns, and that within three moneths: also it must be asked not saintly, but mightily: Dist. 100. cap. prisca. Which, as it was a chargeable thing to other nations (especially such as were far from Rome) so it was no small gaine to the Romish sea, for as they did order it. For although at the beginning the pall was giuen without mony, according to the decree, Dist. 100. for litle, as percase in this time of Lanfranke: yet in processe of yeers it grew to such excesse, that where the bishoprick of Yorke was wont to giue to Rome but ten thousand florens: afterward it arose so, that hee which asked his confirmation, could not obtain it, without twenty thousand. And from thence it exceeded to fiue and twenty thousand, and at length to seuen and twenty thousand florens: which summe, Jacobus archbishop of Yorke was prest to pay, a little before the councell of Mi-fil: insomuch that the said Jacobus, at his departing (which was within foure yeares after) said that his death did not so much greeue him, as to remember his pope subiects, which should be constrained to pay so terrible a fine for the popes pall.

Now by this what right to the pope in whole Germanie, containing in it about fiftie bishoprikes, it may bee easilie conjectured. Lanfrancus thus comming to Rome, with the other two bishops: he for the estimation of his learning, obtained of Alexander two pals, one of honor, the other of loue. Item, he obtained for the other two bishops also their confirmation. At which time, they being there present before Alexander: the controuersie began first to be mooued (or rather reuiued) for the primacie betwixt the two metropolitans, that is, betwixt the archbishop of Canterburie, and the archbishop of Yorke, whether of them should haue preheminence aboue the other. For Canterbury challenged to himselfe the prerogatiue and primacie ouer whole Britain and Ireland: the which contention continued a long season betwixt these two churches, and was often renewed in the daies of diuers kings after this: as in the reigne of Henrie the first, betwixt Thurstinus of Yorke, and Radulphus of Canterburie. And againe in the seuen and twentith yeare of the said king, at his second coronation: for Radulphus would not suffer the first coronation to stand, because it was done by the bishop of Yorke, without his assent. Also in the reigne of Henrie the second, where Alexander pope made a letter decretall betwixt these two metropolitans, for bearing the crosse in the yeare 1159. Also another time, in the reigne of the said king, betwixt Richard of Canterburie, and Roger of Yorke. Againe, about the yeare of our Lord 1170. when Thomas Becket hearing the king to be crowned of Roger bishop of Yorke, complained thereof grieuouslie to pope Alexander the third. Item, another time in the yeare 1176 betwixt Richard, and the said Roger, whether of them should sit on the right hand of cardinall Hugo in his councell at London. Moreouer, in the beginning of reigne of king Richard in the yeare 1190. betwixt Baldoinus of Canterburie, and Godfridus of Yorke, &c.

How to proceed in the storie hereof. After this question was brought (as is said) to the popes presence, he (not disposed to decide the matter) sent them home into England, there to haue their cause determined. Whereupon they speeding themselues from Rome to England in the yeare 1070. and in the sixth yeare, as is said of this William: brought the matter before the king, in the citie of Winchester. Where Lanfranke first alleging for himselfe, brought in, from the time of Austin, to the time of Beda (which was about 140 yeres) how that the bishop of Canterburie had euer the primacie ouer the whole land of Britain and Ireland: how he kept his councels diuers times within the precincts of Yorke: how he did call and cite the bishops of Yorke thereto: wherefore some he did confirme, some he did excommunicate, and some he did remoue: besides also he alleaged diuers priuiledges granted by princes and prelats to the primacie of that see, &c.

To this Thomas archbishop of Yorke replieth againe, and first beginning with the first originall of the Britains church, declareth in order of time, how the Britains, &c.

Lucius the first king of Britain christened.

Eleutherius. Anno. 164.

Donor the head citie of Kent.

This was a. yeare after Christ 164. as some write, and in the raigne of Antonius.

The Britains first professours of this kingdome of Britain, which indured from Brutus and Cadwalader 2076 yeares, vnder an hundred and two kings, at length receiued the christian faith in the yeare 162. in the time of Lucius their king. Eleutherius bishop of Rome sent Faganus and Damianus preachers vnto them, at which time after their conuersion, they assigned and ordained in the realme eight and twentie bishops, with two archbishops. Theanus the archbishop of London, and Theodosius archbishop of Yorke. Vnder whole bishops and archbishops the church of Britain was gouerned after their conuersion almost 300 yeares, till at length the Saxons being then infidels, with Hengistus their king, subduing the Britains by fraudulent murther, inuaded their land, which was about the yeare of our Lord 449. After that the Britains being driuen into Cambria, which we now call Wales; the Saxons ouerrunning the land, diuided themselues into seuen kingdomes. And so being infidels & pagans, continued til the time that Gregorie bishop of Rome sent Austin to preach vnto them: which Austin comming first to Donor, being then the head citie of Kent, called in Latine Dorobernia, and there planting himselfe, conuerted first the king of Kent, called Edilbertus, who had then subdued certaine other kings vnto Humber. By reason whereof Austin was made archbishop of Donor, by the appointment of Gregorius, who sent him certaine pals with his letter from Rome, as before is expressed. Which letter being recited, then Thomas expounding vpon the same, beginneth to declare for himselfe, how the meaning of Gregorie in this letter was, to reduce the new church of Sarons or Englishmen to the order that was in the old time among the Britains: that is, to be vnder two metropolitans, one of London, the other of Yorke: for so the church was ordered in the time of the Britains, as is before declared. Notwithstanding, he giueth to Austin this prerogatiue during his life time, to haue authoritie and iurisdiction not onelie ouer his twelue bishops, but vpon all other bishops and priests in England. And after his decease then those two metropolitans, London and Yorke, to ouersee the whole clergie, as in times past amongst the Britains: whom he ioineth together after the death of Austin, to constitute bishops, and to ouersee the church. And that he so meaneth London to be equall in authoritie with Yorke, it appeareth by foure arguments. First, that he will London to be consecrat by no bishop, but of his owne synod. Secondlie, in that he willeth no distinction of honour to be betwixt London and Yorke, but according only to that as eth one of them is elder in time. Thirdlie, for that he matcheth these two together in common councell, and with one agreement to consent together in doing and disposing such things as they shall consult vpon in the yeare of Christ Iesu: and that in such sort, that one should not dissent nor decord from the other. What meaneth this, but that they should gouerne together, whom he would not to dissent together? Fourthlie, where he writeth, that the bishop of Yorke should not be subiect to the bishop of London; what meaneth this, but that the bishop of London should be equall with the metropolitan of Yorke, or rather superiour vnto him?

Lanfrancus replieth.

And thus he expounded the meaning of Gregorie to be in the foresaid letter. To whom Lanfrancus againe answereth, that he was not the bishop of London, and that the question pertained not to London. Thomas replieth, hauing on his part many fautors, that this priuilege was granted by Gregorie to Austin alone, to haue all other bishops subiect to him: but after his decease, there should be equalitie of honour betwixt London and Yorke, without all distinction of prioritie; saue the onely prioritie of time should make superioritie betweene them. And although Austin translated the see from London to Kent, yet Gregorie, of his mind had beene to giue the same prerogatiue to the successors of Austin (which he gaue to him) would be repelled haue bitterd it in the words of his epistle, writing thus to Austin: That which I giue to thee Austin, I giue also and grant to all thy successors after thee. But in that he maketh here no mention of his successors, it appeareth thereby, that it was not his mind so to do.

Thomas answereth.

Lanfrancus replieth.

To this Lanfrancus argueth againe: If this authoritie had beene giuen to Austin alone, and not to his successors, it had beene but a small gift, proceeding from the apostolike see, to his speciall & familiar friend: especiallie seeing also that Austin in all his life did constitute no bishop of Yorke, neither was there any such bishop to be subiect to him. Againe, we haue priuileges from the apostolike see, which confirme this dignitie to the successors of Austin, in the same see of Donor. Moreouer, all Englishmen thinke it both right and reason, to fetch the direction of well liuing from that place, where first they take the sparkle of right beleeuing. Further, whereas you say, that Gregorie might haue confirmed with plaine words the same thing to the successors of Austin, which he gaue vnto him, all that I grant: yet notwithstanding, this is nothing preiudiciall to the see of Canturburie. For, if you knowe to grise, that which is true in the whole, is also true in the part: and what is true in the more, is also true in the lesse. Now the church of Rome is as the whole, to whom all other churches be as parts thereof: and as Homo mankind is Genus the generall, in a certaine respect to all his Individua, to all particular persons, and yet is euery particular person liech the properties of the generall: so in like maner, the see of Rome in a certaine respect is the generall and the whole to other churches, and yet in euery particular church is contained the whole fulnesse of the whole christian faith. The church of Rome is greater then all churches: that which is wrought in it ought to worke in the lesse churches also: so that the authoritie of euery chiefe head of the church ought to stand also in them that do succeed, vnlesse there be any precise exception made by name. Wherefore, like as the Lord said to all bishops of Rome the same thing which he said to Peter, so Gregorie in like maner said to all the successors of Austin, that which he said to Austin. So thus I conclude: Like wise as the bishop of Canturburie is subiect to Rome, because he hath his faith from thence, so Yorke ought to be in subiection to Canturburie, which sent the first preachers thither. Note, whereas you allege that Gregorie would Austin to be resident at London, that is vtterlie vncertaine. For, how is it to be thought, that such a disciple would do contrarie to the mind of such a master? But grant (as you say) that Austin remoued to London, what is that to the see, which annot bishop of London? Notwithstanding, all this controuersie ceasing betwixt vs, if it shall please you to come to some peacable composition with me (all contention set apart) you shall find me not out of the way, so far as reason and equitie shall extend.

A letter of Lanfrancus sent to pope Alexander.

Thomas answereth.

Lanfrancus replieth.

The dignitie of Canturburie confirmed by priuileges.

Bishops sees translated into England.

well replied of an Italian.

Dorobernia and Canturburie taken both for one.

If this similitude were framed into a syllogisme, neither were the maior true: and yet alike the minor were vtterlie false.

A councell holden at London, and what were the acts thereof.

With these reasons of Lanfranke Thomas gane ouer, condescending that the first of his province should begin at Humber. Whereupon it was then decreed, that Yorke from that time should be subiect to Canturburie in all matters appertaining to the rites and regiment of the catholike church: so that wheresoeuer within England, Canturburie should or would hold his councell, the bishop of Yorke should resort thither with his bishops, and be obedient to his decrees canonicall.

Order taken betweene Lanfrancus bishop of Canturburie, and Thomas bishop of Yorke.

Moreouer, that when the bishop of Canturburie should decease, Yorke should repaire to Donor, there to consecrat with others the bishop that should be elect. And if Yorke should decease, his successor should resort to Canturburie, or else els where the bishop of Canturbury should appoint, there to receiue his consecration, making his profession there, with an oath of canonicall obedience. Thomas being content withall, Lanfrancus the Italian triumpheth with no small ioy, and putteth the matter for thwith in writing, that the memorie thereof might remaine to the posteritie of his successors. But yet that decree did not long stand. For shortlie after the same scar so superficially cured, brast out againe. In so much that in the reigne of king Henrie the first, An. Dom. 1122. Thurstinus archbishop of Yorke could not bee compelled to sweare to the archbishop of Canturburie; and yet notwithstanding by the letters of Calixtus the second was consecrated without any profession made to the said bishop, with much more matter of contention, all which to recite it were too long. But this I thought to commit to history to the intent men might see the lamentable decay of true christianity amongst christian bishops, who inflamed with glorious ambition, so contended for honor, that without mere forcement of law no modestie could take place.

Of such like contentions among prelats of the clergie for superioritie, we reade of diuers in old chronicles, as in the historie intituled Chronicon Hirsfeldense, where is declared a blodie conflict, which twice happned in the church of Gollaria, betweene Pecelon bishop of Wildesheime, and Wederatus bishop of Fulda, and all for the superior place, who should sit next to the emperor; the emperor himselfe being there present, and looking on them, and yet not able to stay them.

Opus scientissimum Lanfranci.

Thus I haue declared the troublous contention betweene Lanfrancus & Thomas metropolitans of Yorke in the daies of Alexander, of which controuersie & of the whole discourse thereof, Lanfrancus writeth to pope Alexander, beginning thus:

Domino totius christianæ religionis summo speculatori Alexandro, Lanckfrancus sanctæ Dorobernensis ecclesiæ antistes, debitam cum omni seruitute obedientiam. In concilio quod Angli per vestram autoritatem conclam est, ubi querelæ Thomæ archiepiscopi Eboracensis ecclesiæ presbyter, & Anglorum doctor compositæ: and so forth in a long processe of words which follow. Among which in the middle of the epistle speaking of Donor and Canturburie, he hath these words. Vbi namque, quæ nunc Cantuarberia nominatur, antiquis temporibus tota prope terræ incolis Dorobernia vocabatur, &c. with many other words in the said epistle, which for breuitie here I ouerpasse.

Hildebrandus seu Gregor. 7. Hildebrand the chiefe of all this Rountrie and plot in practise.

In the storie before of king Egelred was declared about the yeare of our Lord 1016. how the bishoprike of Lindisfarne otherwise named Holy land, in the sound of Tweed, was translated to Durham: so likewise in the daies of this Lanfrancus archbishop of Canturburie, An. 1076. diuers bishops sees were altred and translated from towne to townes to greater cities. As the bishoprike of Selese was remoued to Chichester; that of Cornwall to Exeester; from Welles to Bathe; from Shirebourne to Salisburie; from Dorcester to Lincolne; from Lichfield to Chester, which bishoprike of Chester, Robert being then bishop, remoued from Chester to Couentrie. Likewise after that in the reigne of William Rufus, An. 1095. Herbert bishop of Thetford from thence reduced the see to Norwich, &c.

The abolicion of bishops in ancient time to emperors.

As concerning Water and Canterburie, whether the see was likewise translated from the towne of Douer to the citie of Canterburie in the time of Theodosius: or whether Canturburie by old time had the name of Dorobernia (as the letter of Lanfrancus to pope Alexander aboue mentioned doth pretend) I find it not in histories expresly defined, saue that I read by the words of William being yet duke of Normandie, charging then Harold to make a well of water for the kings vse in the castle of Dorobernia, that the said Dorobernia then was taken for that which we now call Douer: but whether Dorobernia and the citie of Canturburie be both one or diuers, the matter is not great. Notwithstanding this I reade in the epistle of pope Bonifacius to king Ethelbert, as also to Justinus archbishop. Item, in the epistle of pope Honorius, to bishop Honorius. Item, of pope Vitalianus to Theodorus: of pope Sergius to king Ethelred, Alfred and Adulphus, and to the bishops of England. Likewise of pope Gregorie the third, to the bishops of England. Item, of pope Leo to Athelard archbishop of Canturburie. Of Formosius to the bishops of England, and of pope John to Dunstan, that the name of Dorobernia and of Canterburie indifferently are taken for one matter.

Popes made then princes.

Frederike the first theme first holding the popes left stirrop.

At this time (and by the procuring of this Lanfrancus) the ninth yeare of this king, a councell was holden at London, where among the acts thereof, these were the principall things concluded.

First, for the order of sitting, that the archbishop of Yorke should sit on the right hand, and the bishop of London on the left hand: or in the absence of Yorke, London should haue the right, and Winchester the left hand of the archbishop of Canterburie sitting in councell.

2 The second, that bishops should translate their sees from villages into cities, whereupon those sees aboue named were translated.

3 That monks should haue nothing in proper: and if any so had, he dying vnconfessed, should not be buried in the church yard.

4 That no clerke or monke of any other diocese should be admitted to orders, or receiued without letters commendatorie or testimoniall.

5 That none should speake in the councell except bishops and abbats, without leaue of the archmetropolitans.

6 That none should marrie within the seuenth degree, with any either of his owne kindred or of his wiues separted.

7 That none should either buy or sell any office within the church.

8 That no sorcerie nor any diuination should be vsed or permitted in holy church.

9 That no bishop nor abbat, nor any of the clergie should be at the iudgement of any mans death or dismembring, neither should be any fautor of the said iudgments.

Bishops of England abone to driue out monks and to place priests against in their stead.

Moreouer, in the daies of this Lanfrancus, diuers good bishops of the realme began to take part with priests against the monks, in displacing these out of their churches, and to restore the married priests again: in so much that Walkelinus bishop of Winchester had placed aboue forte canons in stead of monks for his part; but this godly enterprise was stopped by Lanfrancke the Italian Lombard. This lustie prelat sat nineteene yeares, but at his latter end he was not so fauoured of William Rufus, and died for sorow. Although this Italian Franke being archbishop had little leisure to write, yet somewhat he thought to doe to set out his famous learning, and wrote a booke against Berengarius, intituling it Opus scientissimum Lanfranci. The old church of Canturburie hee plucked downe and builded vp the new.

Anno 1074

After the death of pope Alexander aboue mentioned, next to him followed Hildebrand surnamed Gregorie the seuenth. This Hildebrand as he was a sorcerer, so was he the first and principall cause of all this perturbation that is now and hath been since his time in the church: by reason that though his example of all this ambition, stoutnesse and pride, entred first into the church of Rome, and hath euer since continued. For before Hildebrand came to Rome working there his feats, setting vp and displacing what bishops hee liked, corrupting them with pernicious councell, and setting them against emperors, vnder pretence of christian ordering matrimony, and vnder the title of liberty speaking peace and resisting authoritie: before this (I say) the church of Rome was in some order, and bishops quietly gouerned vnder christian emperors, and also were defended by the same: as Marcellus, Meltiades, and Siluester were subdued, and vnder obedience to Constantinus, An. 340. Siricius to Theodosius An. 388. Gregorius to Mauritius, An. 600. Pilarius to Iustinian, An. 728. Adrianus and Leo to Carolus Magnus, An. 801. Paschalis and Valentius to Ludouicus Pius, An. 830. Sergius the nine and twentith to Lotharius, An. 840. Benedictus the third and Ioannes the ninth vnto Ludouicus, son of Lotharius, An. 856. But against this obedience and subiection Hildebrand first began to murre, and by his example taught all other bishops to do the like.

In so much that at length they wrought and brought to passe, to be lawfull for a few cartillans and cardinals (contrarie to ancient ordinance and statutes decretall) to chuse what pope they list, without any consent of the emperor at all. And therefore as before it stod in the emperors gift, to giue and to grant bishoprikes, archbishoprikes, benefices and other ecclesiasticall preferments within their owne limits, to whom they list: now the popes through much wrestling, wars, and contention, haue extorted all that into their owne hands, and to their assignes: yea haue plucked in all the riches and power of the whole world, and not content with that, haue blessed and priuiledged so much about the emperor, that (as before) no pope might bee chosen without the confirmation of the emperor: so now no emperor may bee elected without the confirmation of the pope, taking vpon them more then princes, to place or displace emperors at their pleasure for euery light cause: to put downe, or to set vp when and whom they liked, as Fredericus Primus, for hole ding the left stirrup of the popes sadle, was persecuted almost to excommunication. The which cause moueth me to straine more diligence here, in setting out the storie, acts, and doings of this Hildebrand, from whom, as the first patron and founder sprang all this ambition and contention about the liberties and dominion of the Romane church: to the intent, that such as cannot read the Latin historiens, may vnderstand in English, the originall of euils: how, and by what occasion they first began, and how long they haue continued.

And first how this Hildebrand hitherto had behaued himselfe before he was pope, I haue partly declared. For though he was not yet pope in name, yet he was then pope in deed, and ruled the pope and all that belongs as him liked. Item, what wiles and fetches he had attempted euer since his first comming to the court of Rome, to magnifie and maintaine false libertie against true authoritie: what practise he wrought by councels, what factions and conspiracies he made, in stirring vp popes against emperors, striuing for superioritie: and what warres followed thereof. I haue also expressed. Now let vs see further (by the helpe of Christ) the worthie liues of this princely prelate, after hee came to bee pope, as they remaine in histories of diuers and sundrie writers described.

Ex Augustino & alijs.

The tragicall historie of Gregorie the seuenth, otherwise named Hildebrand.

Gregorius the seuenth. Ex Auentino.

THe words of the Latine historie be these: Hactenus pontifices Romani in comitijs curiatis calatis à sacerdotibus, equitatu, plebe, senatu, &c.

In English.

Hitherto the bishops of Rome haue been elected by voices, and suffrages, of all sorts and degrees, as well of the priests and the clergie, as of the nobilitie, people, and senate, all conuenting and assembling together. And this election so I find to stand in force, if so be it were ratified and confirmed by the consent of Roman emperors, who had authority to cal and to assemble al these, as well as bishops, together vnto councels as cale required. Vnder the authority and iurisdiction of these emperors, were contained both in Germany, France, Italie, and throughout the whole dominion of Rome, all patriarchs, bishops, masters of churches and monasteries by the decree of councels, according to the old custom of our ancestors, as is declared in a certaine storie in the life of Carolus Magnus. The holy and ancient fathers like as Christ our Lord with his disciples and apostles both taught and did, honored and esteemed their emperors as the supreme potestate next vnder God in earth, set vp, ordained, elected and crowned of God, aboue all other mortall men, and so counted them, and called them their lords. To them they yeelded tribute and paid their subsidies, also prayed euery day for their life. Such as rebelled against them they take as rebels and resisters against God his ordinance and christian piety. The name of the emperor then was of great maiestie, and receiued as giuen from God. Then these fathers of the church neuer intermedled nor intangled themselues with politike affaires of the common weale: much lesse they occupied martiall armes and matters of chiualrie. Onely in quietie and modestie was all their contention with other christians, who should be purest and most modest among them. And the more humblenes appeared in any, the higher opinion they conceiued of him. The sharpe and two edged sword they take, giuen to the church of Christ to saue, and not to kill; to quicken, and not to destroy; and called it the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, the life and light of men, and reuokith from death to life, making of men, gods; of mortall, immortall. Far were they from that to thrust out any prince or king (though hee were neuer so far out of the way, yea an Arrian) from his kingdome, or to curse him, to release his subiects from their oath and their allegiance, to change and translate kingdomes, to inuent empires, to pollute themselues with christian blod, or to war with their christian brethren for rule and principalitie. This was not their spirit and manner then, but rather they loued and obeyed their princes. Againe, princes loued them also like fathers and fellow princes with them of the soules of men. Now this Gregorius the seuenth, otherwise named Hildebrandus thrusting vpon the Romanes which then rusted about Apulia, Calabria, and Campania, trusting also vpon the power of Mathildas, a stout woman there about Rome; and partly againe, bearing himselfe bold for the discord among the Germanes: first of all others contrarie to the maner of elders) contemning the authoritie of the emperor, inuaded the cathedrall see of Rome, wanting himselfe as hauing both the ecclesiasticall and temporall sword committed to him by Christ, and that fulnesse of power was in his hand to bind and lose what to hee listed. Whereupon thus he presumed to occupie both the regiments, to challenge all the whole dominion both of the east and west church, yea and all power to himselfe alone, abiding none to be equall, much lesse superior vnto him, derogating from others, and arrogating to himselfe their due right and honor, setting at light Cesars, kings and emperors, and who reigned but by his owne godamercie. Bishops and prelats as his seruants he kept in awe, suspending and cursing, and chopping off their heads, stirring vp strife and wars, sowing of discord, making factions, rebelling ofte, defeating fidelity and due allegiance of subiects to their princes. Yea if hee had offended or iniured the emperor himselfe, yet notwithstanding hee ought to be feared, as he himselfe gloorith in a certaine epistle, as one that could not erre, and had receiued of Christ our sauiour & Peter, authority to bind and vnbind at his will & pleasure. Priests then in those daies had wiues openly and lawfully, no law forbidding to the contrary, as appeareth by the deed and writings of their chapter seales and donations, which were giuen to temples and monasteries, wherein their wiues also bee cited with them for witnesse, and were called Presbyteritiæ. Also for bishops, prelats, persons of churches, gouernors of the clergie, masters of monasteries, and religious houses; all these were then in those times in the emperors ordination, to assigne by voice or consent to whom hee would. Now these two things Gregorius this pope could not abide; for the which two causes onely was all his striuing and driuing from his first beginning, to abolish the marriage of priests, and to translate the authoritie imperiall to the clergie. For to this scope one ly tended all his labour, practises and deuices, as appeared before in the councell of Lateran vnder pope Nicolas, and also in the councell of Mantua vnder Alexander, making their marriage heresie, and the other to be simony. And that which before he went about by others, now he practiseth by himselfe, to condemne ministers that were married for Nicolaitans, and to receiue any spirituall regiment of secular persons for simonie; directing forth his letters vpon the same to Henricus the emperor, to dukes, princes, potestats, tetrarchs: namely, to Berchtoldus, to Rodulphus of Slouenia, to Tiberius, Adalbertus, and their wiues. Item, to bishops, archbishops, to priests, and to all the people: in the which letters hee denounceth them to bee no priests, so many as were married, forbidding men to salute them, to talke, to eate, to companie with them, to pay them tithes, or to obey them if they would not be obedient to him. Amongst all others, hee directed speciall letters to Otho bishop of Constance, concerning this matter. But Otho perceiuing the vngodly and vnreasonable pretence of Hildebrand, would neither separate them that were married from their wiues, nor yet forbid them to marrie which were vnmarried, &c.

The copie of the letter of Hildebrand sent to the bishop of Constance against priests mariages.

GRegorie bishop, seruant of seruants of God, to the clergy & laitie, both more and lesse within the diocesse of Constance, saluation and benediction. We haue directed to our brother Otho your bishop, our letters exhortatorie: wherein we inioyned him, according to the necessitie of our dutie, by the authoritie apostolicall, that hee should vtterly abolish out of his church the heresie of simonie, and also should cause with all diligence to be preached the chastitie of priests. But hee neither moued with reuerence of S. Peters precept, nor yet with the regard of his dutie, neglected to doe these things, whereunto we so fatherly haue exhorted him, incurring thereby a double offence, not only of disobedience, but also of rebellion, in that he hath gone and done cleane contrarie to our commandement (yea rather the commandement of blessed S. Peter) so that hee hath permitted his clergie not onely such as had wiues, not to put them away, but also such as had none, to take vnto them. Whereupon, we being truly informed thereof, and greeued therwith, haue directed to him another letter, declaring the motion of our displeasure and indignation. In which letters also wee haue cited him vp to our councell at Rome, there to appeare and giue account of his disobedience, in the audience of the whole synod. And now therefore we thought it best to signifie this to you (our deare children) wherby in this behalfe we might the better prouide for your health and saluation. For if your bishop shal continue so obstinatly to repugne & resist against our commandement, he is not meet to sit ouer you, &c. Wherefore these shall be to command you, and all them that be obedient to God, and to blessed S. Peter, by our apostolicall authoritie, that if this your bishop shall persist in his obstinacie, you that be his subiects hereafter giue ye him no seruice nor obedience. For the which thing doing, we here discharge you before God and your soules. For if your bishop shall seeme contrarie to the decreements and iniunctions apostolicall, wee through the apostolicall authoritie of S. Peter, discharge and absolue you from the band of your allegiance to him. So that if you be sworne to him, so long as hee is a rebell against God and the apostolike seat, we loose you from the peril of your oath, that you shal not need to feare therein any danger, &c.

Otho bishop of Constance cited to appeare for suffering priests with their lawfull wiues.

The pope dispenseth for disobedience.

Otho bishop of Constance thus being cited, whether he did appeare personally himselfe, I doe not read. Thus I read and find, that in the said councell holden at Rome, Hildebrand with other bishops of Rome did then enact among many others, these three things most speciall. First, that no priest hereafter should marrie wiues. Secondly, that all such as were married should be diuorced. Thirdly, that none hereafter should bee admitted to the order of priesthood, but should sweare perpetuall chastitie, &c. This councell of Rome being ended, forthwith the act of Hildebrand concerning the single life of priests was proclaimed and published in all places, and strait commandement giuen to bishops to execute the same.

Three things enacted by Hildebrand. Here commeth in the vow of chastitie.

The copie of his bull sent into Italie and Germanie was this.

GRegorie the pope, otherwise Hildebrand, the seruant of the seruants of God, sendeth the apostles blessing to all them within the kingdomes of Italie and Germany that shew their true obedience to S. Peter. If there be any priests, deacons and subdeacons, that still will remaine in the sinne of fornication, we forbid them the churches entrance, by the omnipotent power of God, and by the authority of S. Peter, till time they amend and repent. But if they persuere in their sin, wee charge that none of you presume to heare their seruice: for their blessing is turned into cursing, and their prayer into sinne, as the Lord doth testifie to vs by his prophets, I will turne your blessing, &c.

The clergie of France resisting so diuorcing from their wiues.

The bishops of France being called vpon daily with the popes letters, were compelled to obey the decree of the councell: but the residue of the clergie manfully and stoutly withstanding the popes decree, & inforcement of their bishops, would not agree, but repined therat & said, that the councell did manifestly resist repugne against the word of God, and that the pope did take from priests that which both God and nature had giuen them; and therefore that person to be an heretike, and author of a wicked doctrine, which ruled and gouerned not by the spirit of God but by satan. The decree and act set forth to rend directly against the word of God and the saying of Christ: Non omnes capiunt verbum hoc: All men haue not the gift and capacitie of the word. Item, to be against the sound doctrine of S. Paul writing these words: As concerning virginitie, I haue no commandement of the Lord, &c. Againe, He that cannot otherwise liue continently, let him marrie. Item, that it was against the canons both of the apostles and of Nicen councell. Moreouer, that it was against the course of nature which hee required, that men being sequestred from their naturall wiues and women, should be coacted to liue as angels: that is, to performe that which nature doth not giue. And therefore the bishop therein did open a pernicious window to vncleanesse and to fornication. In summe, giuing vp their answere, thus they concluded, that they had rather giue vp their benefices, then to forsake their naturall and lawfull wiues against the word of Christ. And finally, if married priests could not please them, they should call downe angels from heauen to serue the churches. But Hildebrand nothing moued neither with honest reason, nor with the authoritie of holy scripture, nor with the determination of Nicen councell, nor any thing else, followeth this matter; calleth vpon the bishops still, with his letters and legats both solicitate their minds, accuseth them of negligence and dastardnesse, threatneth them with excommunication, vnlesse they cause their priests to obey his decree inioyned them. Whereupon a great number of bishops for feare of the popes tyrannie, laboured the matter with their priests, by all meanes possible to bereaue them of their accustomed matrimonie.

Bishop of Mentz. Ex Lambecio Scefnaburgen. in hist. Germanorum.

Amongst other the archbishop of Mentz, perceiuing this act of taking away priests mariage, might breed him no little trouble; talketh with his clergie gentlie, admonisheth them of the popes mind and decree, and giuerth them halfe a yeares respit to deliberate vpon the case, exhorting them diligently to shew themselues obedient to the pope and to him, and to grunt with good will that which at length (will they nill they) needs they must be forced vnto, and therefore of their owne accord to stand content therewith, lest the pope should bee compelled to attempt waies of sharper seueritie. The time of deliberation expired, the archbishop assembleth his clergie at Erpsford, the moneth of October, & there willeth then according to the pontificall decree, either to abiure for euer all matrimonie, or else to renounce their benefices and ecclesiasticall liuings. The clergie against defend themselues against the popes decree with scriptures, with reason, with the acts of generall councels, with examples of ancestors by diuers strong arguments, declaring the popes decree not to be consonant, nor ought to take effect. But the archbishop said he was compelled so of the pope, and could not otherwise doe, but to execute that which was iniopned him.

The priests of Germanie flout against the popes vnlawfull proceedings.

The clergie seeing that no reason, nor prayer, nor disputation would serue, laid their heads together, consulting among themselues what was best to be done: some gaue counsell not to returne againe to the synod, some thought it good to returne and to thrust out the archbishop from his see, and to giue him due punishment of death for his deseruing, that by the example of him, others may be warned hereafter neuer to attempt that thing any more to the pruidice of the church, and the right full libertie of ministers. After that this was signified to the archbishop by certaine spies that were amongst them, that the clergie intended to do, the archbishop to preuent and salue the matter, sendeth to the priests as they were comming out, certaine messengers, bidding them be of good hope, & to returne againe to the metropolitan, and they should haue that should content their minds. So being persuaded, they come againe to the councell. The bishop promiseth he would doe his indeauor what hee could, to reuoke and turne the mind of the bishop of Rome from that sentence, willing them in the meane time to continue as they had done in their cure & ministerie. The next yeare following, Hildebrand the founder of satan sendeth his legat (a certaine bishop called Turiensis) vnto the archbishop of Mentz, and assembled there a councell. In the which councell the archbishop againe proposeth the matter, commanding all the clergie vnder paine of the popes curse, there perpetually either to abrenounce their wiues, or their liuings. The clergie defended their cause againe with great constancie. But when no defension could take place, but all went by tyrannie & mere extortion, it burst in the end to an vproare and tumult, where the legat and the archbishop being in great danger, hardly escaped with their liues, and in the councell brake vp. By this schisme and tumult it followed, that the churches after that in chusing their priests would not send them to the bishops (the enemies and suppressors of matrimonie) to be confirmed and inducted, but did elect them within themselues, and so put them in their office without all leaue or knowledge of the bishops, who then agreed and were determined to admit no priests, but such as should take an oth of perpetuall singlenesse, neuer to marrie after. And thus first came vp the oth and profession of single priesthood. Notwithstanding, if other nations had followed the like constancie and concord of those Germane ministers, the diuelish drift and decree of this Hildebrand, or rather Heldebrand) had been frustrat and auoided. But this greedinesse of liuings in weake priests made them to yeld vp their godly libertie to wicked tyrannie. Yet this remaineth in these Germans to bee noted, what concord can doe in repelling the inordinate requicks of euill bishops if they constantly stand to truth, and hold together. And thus much for banishing of matrimonie.

Examples of concord in priests and ministers.

Now let vs proceed to the contents betweene wicked Hildebrand and the godly emperor. But before we by the way of digression it shall not be much wide from the purpose, to touch a little of the properties of this pope, as we find them described in certaine epistles of Benno a cardinall, writing to other cardinals of Rome: which Benno liued in the same time of Hildebrand, and detecteth the prodigious acts and doings of this monstrous pope.

Ex Benno cardinali.

Firſt, declaring that he was a sorcerer most notable, and a necromancer, an old companion of Siluester, of Laurentius and Theophylactus, called otherwise Benedictus nonus. Amongst others Benno Cardinalis writeth this historie of him: How vpon a certaine time this Gregorius, coming from Albanus to Rome, had forgot behind him his familiar booke of necromancie, which he was wont commonly to carrie alwaies with him. Whereupon remembring himselfe, entring the port of Lateran, he calleth two of his most trustie familiars to fet the booke, charging them at no hand to looke within it. But they being so restrained, were the more desirous to open it, & to perusse it, and so did. After they had read a little the secrets of the fatanicall booke, suddenly there came about them the messengers of satan, the multitude and terror of whom made them almost out of their wits. At length they comming to themselues, the spirits were instant vpon them to know wherefore they were called vp, wherefore they were vexed: quickly (said they) tell vs what ye would vs to doe, or else we will fall vpon you if ye retaine vs longer. Then spake one of the yong men to them, bidding them goe and plucke downe yonder wals, pointing vnto certaine high wals there nigh to Rome, which they did in a moment. The yong men crossing them for feare of the spirits (seeing recouring themselues) at length came to their master. And it followeth moreouer in the epistle of the said Benno to the cardinals.

We haue made mention to you before of diuers colleges of the church of Rome, which refused to communicate with him; as Leo then archpriest of the cardinals, Benno, Vgoboldus, Iohannes the cardinall, Peter chancellor and cardinall, being all instituted before this Hildebrand. These three also being consecrated by him, that is, Natro, Innocentius and Leo, forlooke him, cursing the detestable errors which hee held. In like case Theodinus whom hee constituted archdeacon, and other cardinals more, Iohannes surnamed Primicerius, Petrus Oblationarius, with all that appertained to them, fauing one onely man. And now, when this Hildebrand saw that the bishops also would forsake him, hee called vnto him the lesse men, and made them priuie of his counsell, thinking thereby to separate the bishops, that they should haue no conference with the cardinals. After that he called together those bishops, and being garded with bands of laie men, hee inforced the bishops partly for feare, and partly for his menacing words, to sweare vnto him, that they should neuer disagree vnto that which hee would haue done, that they should neuer defend the kings quarrell, and that they should neuer fauour or obey the pope that should in his stead be instituted. Which thing being done, he sent them by meanes of the prince of Salernites, into Campania, and thus did he separate them from the companie of the cardinals, and from the citie of Rome. And not onely the bishops, but also the priests of the citie and clerks of inferior orders, as also the laie men he bound by their oaths, that at no time nor for any cause, they should condescend vnto the king.

Pope Hildebrand murdereth by made pope.

As soone as pope Alexander was dead, which died somwhat before night, the same day contrarie to the canons, he was chosen pope of the lay men. But the cardinals subscribed not to his election. For the canons prescribe (vnder paine of cursing) that none should be chosen pope before the third day after the buriall of his predecessor. But he (by sinister meanes thus climing to the see) remoued the cardinals of the said see, from being of the councell. But with what persons hee consulted night and day, Rome well heard and saw. And hee now putting the cardinals from his councell, his life, faith and doctrine, no man could accuse or beare witnesse of: whereas in the canons is commanded, that in euery place whersoeuer the pope is, should be with him three cardinals being priests, and two deacons, because of his ecclesiasticall testimonie and stile of veritie: of which canonicall decree looke gentle reader before. He violently wrested the sacred scriptures to couer his falshood, which kind of idolatrie how great it is, manifestly throughout all the scripture it appeareth. Contrarie to the minds and counsell of the cardinals, and besides the determinate order of pronouncing iudgement by the canons, he rashly did excommunicate the emperor, being in no synod solemnly accused before. The sentence of which excommunication, after rehearsall of these presents, shall also bee manifested (Christ willing) willing) to the which excommunication, ſaith Benno, none of the cardinals would ſubſcribe. As ſoone as he aroſe out of his ſeat papal, to excommunicate the emperor, the ſame ſeate (being made but a little before with big timber) ſuddenly by the appointment of God was rent and ſhiuered in pieces: ſo that all men might plainely vnderſtand, what and how great and terrible ſchiſms that lubber had ſowen againſt the church of Chriſt, againſt the ſeate of S. Peter, and how cruelly he had diſperſed the chaire of Chriſt, in deſiling the lawes of the church, ruling by might and auſteritie in that his ſo perillous and preſumptuous excommunication.

The emperor wrongfully excommunicated.

The pope chuſeth himſelfe a new ſeate to excommunicate the emperor.

The pope diuideth the vnitie of the church.

In the deſcription of the ſame excommunication hee inſerteth thoſe things wherein he himſelfe erred, when hee abſolued the emperor being vniuſtly excommunicat, and the biſhops alſo communicating with him, and to the vttermoſt thus cutting and mangling the vnitie of the church & thoſe that communicated with the, did as much as in him lay to make two churches.

Alſo the ſame bold merchant commanded that the cardinals ſhould falt, to the intent that God would reueale whoſe opinion was better (either of the church of Rome, or of Berengarius) touching the controuerſie of the Lords body in the ſacrament. And hereby he proued himſelfe to be a manifeſt infidell, for that in the Nicen councell it is written, he that doubteth is an infidell.

Of this miracle we read in no approued hiſtorie.

Further, he ſought after a ſigne to eſtabliſh his faith concerning the article of the Lords bodie, as did Gregorie to confirme the womans faith, when the conſecrated bread was tranſubſtantiated into the forme of a fleſhly finger. He alſo ſent two cardinals (Attones and Cunones) vnto Anaſtaſe, that with the archprieſt of the ſame church they ſhould begin a faſt of three daies ſpace, and that euery of them (euery day during thoſe three daies) ſhuld ſay ouer the pſalter, & ſing maſſes, that Chriſt would ſhew vnto them ſome ſuch like ſigne of his bodie, as he did to the foreſaid Gregorie; which thing they could not ſee.

The emperor was wont oftentimes to go to S. Maries church in the mount Auentine to pray. Hildebrand when hee had by his eſpials ſearched out and knew all the doings of the emperor, cauſed the place where the emperor was accuſtomed (either ſtanding or proſtrate on his face to pray) to be marked, and for money he hired a naughtiepacke (like himſelfe) to gather and lay togither a heape of great ſtones diredtly ouer the place in the vaut of the church, where the emperor would ſtand, that in throwing the ſame downe vpon his head, he ſhould ſlay the emperour. About which purpoſe as the hireling haſted, and was buſie, remouing to the place a ſtone of great bigneſſe and weight, it broke the planke vpheron it lay, and the hireling ſtanding thereupon, both togither fell downe from the roofe to the pauement of the church, and with the ſame ſtone was daſht all in pieces. And after the Romans had vnderſtanding of the handling of this matter, they faſtened a rope to one of the feet of this hireling, and cauſed him to bee drawne through the ſtreets of the citie three daies together in example to others. The emperor notwithſtanding, according to his wonted clemencie, cauſed him to be buried.

The pope hireth one to slay the emperor.

Iohannes biſhop of Portua (being one of the ſecret counſell of Hildebrand) came vp into the pulpit of S. Peter, and amongſt other things in the hearing both of the clergy and people, ſaid: Hildebrand and wee haue committed ſuch a faſt and ſo horrible, for the which we are all worthie to be burned aliue (meaning of the ſacrament of the bodie of Chriſt) which ſacrament, Hildebrand when he thereof inquired a diuine anſwere againſt the emperor and would not ſpeake, threw into the fire & burned it, contrarie to the perſuaſion of the cardinals that were preſent, and would haue reſiſted the ſame.

Hildebrand caſteth the ſacrament of the lords body in the fire, becauſe it would giue him an anſwere.

In the ſecond holy day in the Eaſter weeke, when the clergie and the people were aſſembled at S. Peters church to heare maſſe, after the goſpell hee went vp into the pulpit: hee was in his pontificall attire, and in the preſence of diuers biſhops and cardinals; a great company both of the ſenate and the people of Rome being gathered togither, openly preached (among many other words of diuination) that the king whoſe name was Henrie, ſhould die (without all peraduenture) before the feaſt of S. Peter next inſuing: or elſe at leaſt wiſe that he ſhould be ſo deiected from his kingdome, that hee ſhould not bee able any more to gather togither aboue the number of ſix knights.

The pope a falſe prophet.

This he preached to the biſhops and cardinals, and all that were preſent, crying out of the pulpit in theſe words: Neuer accept me for pope any more, but pluckе me from the altar if this propheſie be not fulfilled by the day appointed. About the ſame time he went about by helpe of priuie murtherers to kill the emperor, but God preſerued him. And many there were euen at that time which thought pope Hildebrand to be guilty, & to be the deuiſer of the treaſon, becauſe that then he (before the deed put in execution) preſumed of the death of the king, being by him falſly prophecied of before; which words of his wounded many mens hearts. And it came to paſſe that Hildebrand by his words was openly condemned in the congregation, which (as is ſaid) gaue iudgement of himſelfe to be no pope, neither that he would be counted for pope any longer; but thought to bee both a belier and a traitor, vnleſſe that before the feaſt of S. Peter next comming the emperor ſhould die, or elſe ſhould be deprined of all kingly honor, in ſo much as he ſhould not be able to make aboue ſix knights on his part. And thus by the appointment of God it came to paſſe, that by his owne mouth hee was condemned for an heretike.

Thus ſaith the Lord: the prophet which of arrogancie will propheſie in my name thoſe things I haue not commanded him, or elſe will propheſie in the name of other gods, let him bee ſlaine. And if thou ſhalt ſay with thy ſelfe, How ſhall I know what thing it is that the Lord hath not commanded to be ſpoken? This token ſhalt thou haue to know it by: Whatſoeuer thing the prophet in the name of God ſhall propheſie, and the ſame come not to paſſe, that maieſt thou be ſure the Lord hath not ſpoken, but the prophet hath imagined through the hautines of his own mind, & therfore thou ſhalt not be afraid of him.

The emperor preſerued by the power of God from the pope.

When the time was expired that Hildebrand in his diuination had ſet, & that neither the king was dead, neither the power of the empire empaired: and fearing leſt by the words of his owne mouth he ſhould be reprehended & condemned, ſubtilly hee turned his tale, ſaying, and perſuading the ignorant people that he ment not of the body of the king but of his ſoule: as though the ſoule of the king had loſt all, hauing ſix of his knights or ſouldiers, or elſe had been dead during that ſpace: and thus by theſe ſleights he beguiled the ignorant people. Againſt ſuch peophers S. Gregory vpon Eze. hiel ſaith: Between true prophets and falſe this difference there is, that true prophets, if they ſpeake any thing vpon their owne mind, they be ſoone rebuked: but the falſe prophets, both they tell lies, and not hauing the ſpirit of truth, they perſeuere in their falſhie.

A ſubtill ſhift of Hildebrand to ſaue his ſaying prophecie.

Three perſons depoſed: they were conuict, put to recanting and Hildebrand againſt all law.

Ouer and beſide, the ſaid Hildebrand iudged to death three men before they were conuict, or elſe conſtrued their crime, without the ſentence of any ſecular iudge, and cauſed them to be hanged vpon a paire of gallowes, ouer againſt the church of S. Peter in a place called Palatiolum, without any delay or aduiſement, contrarie to the lawes which command that euery publike offender ſhould haue thirtie daies ſpace before hee bee put to execution. Which thing euen amongſt the pagans is in vre and obſerued, as reacheth the authoritie of S. Ambroſe, and the martyrdome of holy Marcellianus and Marcus.

The emperor caused by Hildebrand to accuſe himſelfe.

The great patience of the godly emperor.

Centius taken by the pope, and put into a barrell of nettle.

The pope taketh Centius, Centius reuenged by the pope contrary to promiſe and faith.

He caſt Centius the ſonne of Stephan the alderman into priſon, being before his truſtie friend; and in a veſſell being thicke ſet with ſharpe nailes, he tormented him to the point of death, who after that he was eſcaped, apprehended the ſaid Hildebrand. Of this apprehenſion before he was ſet at liberte, he openly forgaue all the conſpirators. Which thing afterwards, contrarie to his fidelity, he brake and reuenged, & cauſed Centius to whom he had forgiuen all offences, to be taken, & hanged him & nine of his mē vpon the gallowes before S. Peters porch.

There was at the apprehenſion of pope Hildebrand, a certaine widowes ſonne, to whom (and others more for their penance) hee inioyned a yeares baniſhment. Which time being expleat or run out, the widow in token of more ample ſatisfaction, thinking thereby to haue appeaſed the minde of Hildebrand, put a halter about his ſons necke, and drawing his ſonne by the rope vnto the foot of Hildebrand, ſaid: My lord pope at your hands will I receiue againe my ſon, which one whole yere hath indured baniſhment and other penance by your holineſſe inioyned. Then the ſaid Hildebrand for that inſtant, becauſe of thoſe which were with him in companie (diſſembling his wrath) deliuered hir his ſonne very churliſhly, ſaying: Get thee hence woman I bid thee, and let me be in reſt. After this he ſent his officers and apprehended the widowes ſon, and gaue commandement to the iuſtices to put him to death: who all together making anſwere, ſaid, that they could no more condemne or meddle with him, for that he had for his crime committed appealed once to the pope, and abidden the baniſhment, and done the penance by him inioyned. Hereupon this glorious Hildebrand diſpleaſed with the iudges, cauſed the foot of the widowes ſon to be cut off: making neither repentance, nor the lawes and ordinances to bee of any eſtimation with him: and thus his foot being cut off, he died within three daies after with the paine therof. Many other wicked deeds did this Hildebrand, vpon whom the blood of the church crieth vengeance, ſhed by the ſword (that is) the miſerable trecherie of his tongue: for which things (and that iuſtly) the church refuſed to communicate with him. Hac Benno.

An other epiſtle of Benno to the cardinals.

An other ſtile of Benno.

TO the reuerend fathers of the church of Rome, and to his beloued in Chriſt, and to his brethren that ſtall for euer be beloued, Benno the cardinall of the church of Rome wiſheth faithfull ſeruice, health and communion with the ſeruaūts of the catholike church. Of the which communion, diſcipline, and power he lately braggeth, that by the preſumption of his authority ſhall iuſtly bind or loſe any maner of perſon. And he doth vniuſtly bind what ſoeuer he be, that curſeth any man (being willing to make ſatiſfaction and bewailing his boldneſſe, being alſo vnconuict, and not confeſſing the crime) but rather curſing that partie in vaine, her curſeth and condemneth himſelfe, turning his weapon vpon his owne perſon to his deſtruction. O ſtrange and new found trecherie proceeding from the ſanctuarie, nay rather from him which as high prieſt ſeemeth to rule the church, and to be a iudge ouer the iudges!

Hilde-

A diuelliſh practiſe of Hildebrand in ſtirring the biſhops againſt the emperor.

Hildebrand was earneſtly in hand with the emperor, that he ſhould depriue thoſe biſhops, which came in by ſimonie. The emperor, thinking as a zealous prince, that this commiſſion had proceeded from the throne of God) without delay obeyed the ſame, and forthwith without any conſideration, or iuſt conſideration of order, depriued certaine biſhops, and thought that by this his obedience to Hildebrand he offered an acceptable ſacrifice to God, not knowing the craftie handling of him. But Hildebrand then againe placed thoſe, whom the emperor for ſimony at his commandement had before depoſed, and thoſe whom by that meanes he made to beare a hatefull heart to the emperor, he reconciled againe vnto himſelfe in great familiaritie, and by many and great other taken of them, for their fidelitie towards him, he promoted aboue all the reſt. And thus by theſe pranks, the imperiall ſeate of the king being ſhortly after impaired, and deſtitute almoſt of friends, hee craftily purchaſing the friendſhip and fauor of the greateſt princes, the better to bring his matters to paſſe: ſuddenly againe, without any law, accuſation, without any canonicall vocation, without all iudiciall order, excommunicated the emperor (ſo obedient alwaies vnto him) and ſet the princes of the empire all againſt him. And notwithſtanding (as the apoſtle ſaith) that no man ought to circumuent his brother in his buſineſſe, as much as in him lay he rather mottified and killed him, then reprehended or corrected him. Thus the emperor being many waies circumuented: as, excommunicated beſides the canonicall order, and by the conſent and counſell of Hildebrand, ſpoiled of the greateſt part of his imperiall honor, and ouercharged with great wars and ſlaughters of his owne ſubiects, in vaine deſired hee and ſued for to haue the canon read and heard, cauſing him by force and violence at Canuſium, in the preſence of Hildebrand, to accuſe himſelfe by his owne confeſſion.

Say you now (I pray you) all ſuch as loue iuſtice, and loue not to leane either vpon the left hand, or elſe the right hand, in the fauor of any perſon; ſay your minds, whether that ſuch a confeſſion being forced vpon neuer ſo poore a man (much leſſe vpon an emperor) ought at ſuch a time to be preiudicial or not? Or whether he which extorted the ſame confeſſion, is guilte of the canon? Or elſe he, which being ſo peruerſtie iudge, ſuffered the iniurie of a moſt peruerſe iudge? Which alſo moſt patiently & publikely ſuffered this violence with lamentable affliction vpon his bare feet, clothed in thin garments, in the ſharpe winter, which neuer was vſed, and was three daies togither at Canuſium, made a ſpectacle both of angels and men, and a ludibrious mocking ſtocke to that proud Hildebrand. Neuer truſt me, if that foureteen cardinals, the archdeacon himſelfe, and he that is called Primicerius, being all wiſe and religious men, beſides many other of the clerks of Lateran, to the iudgement and priuiledge of whoſe holy ſeate the whole world is obedient (weighing and conſidering his intolerable apoſtaſie) departed not from participating, and refuſed from communicating with him.

This glorious Hildebrand, and his affinitie by their new authoritie, breaking the decrees of the Chalcedon councell, not onely in words, but alſo in publike writings haue agreed, that it is tollerable both to baptiſe and communicat being out of the church of God: and how blind theſe men were, and alſo what heretiks they be, their owne writings doe declare. What a miſchiefe is this? (ſaith Benno) they preſume to iudge of the church, which ſwarue themſelues in all errors, who alſo eſteeme the veritie but as a lie; and leſt their poyſoned falſhood both in words and writings ſhould appeare, they haue (like ſubtill poyſoners, the ſooner to deceiue) mixed honie therewithall. A lie, ſaith ſaint Auguſtine, is euery thing pronounced with the intent of deceiuing of others.

Pope Hildebrand a worker of ſorcerie and conturing.

The councell of Rome againſt the councell of Wormes.

Henricus 4. emperor.

The councell of Rome againſt the councell of Wormes. Henricus the emperor excommunicated by Hildebrand.

If were too long and tedious here to recite all the deteſtable doings, and diabolicall practiſes, of conturings, charmes, and filthie ſorceries, exercited betweene him and Laurentius, and Theophylact, otherwiſe named pope Benedict the ninth, wherof a long narration followeth in the foreſaid epiſtle of Benno to the cardinals to be ſeene, to whom the reader may repaire, who ſo hath either leiſure to read or mind to vnderſtand more of the abominable parts and diuelliſh acts of this Hildebrand.

Thus hauing ſufficiently alleaged the words and teſtimonies of Benno and Auentinus, concerning the acts and facts of this pope; now let vs proceede (in the order as followeth in his ſtorie) to ſet forth the miſerable veration which the vertuous and godly emperor ſuſteined by that vngodly perſon.

About what time Hildebrand was made pope, Henricus the fourth emperor was vncumbred and much vexed with ciuill diſſenſion in Germanie, by reaſon of certaine grieuances of the Saxons againſt him and his father Henricus the third. Wherupon the matter growing to ſedition, fines were taken, and great wars enſued, betwixt Otho duke of Saxonie, and Henricus the emperor. This buſie time ſeemed to Hildebrand very opportune to worke his feats, whoſe ſtudie and drift was euer from the beginning to aduance the dominion of the Romiſh ſeat aboue all other biſhops, and alſo to preſſe downe the authoritie of the temporall rulers, vnder the ſpirituall men of the church. And although he went about the ſame long before, by ſubtill traines and acts ſet forth concerning ſimonie: yet now he thought more effectuouſlie to accompliſh his purpoſed intent, after y he was eralted thither, where he would be. And therefore now bearing himſelfe the bolder, by the authoritie of ſaint Peters throne, firſt he began to put ſine the act ſet out by his predeceſſor, as touching ſimonie, curſing and excommunicating, whoſoeuer they were, that receiued any ſpirituall liuing or promotion at laie mens handes, as all ſuch as were the giuers thereof. For this he called then ſimonie, that vnder that colour he might deſeate the temporall poſſeſſors of their right, and ſo bring the whole clergie at length to the lure of Rome. And forſomuch as the emperor was the head, thinking firſt to begin with him, he ſendeth for him by letters and legats to appeare in the councell of Lateran at Rome. But the emperor buſied in his wars againſt the Saxons, had no leiſure to attend to councels. Notwithſtanding Gregorius the pope proceeded in his councell, rending there the cauſe and reaſon before the biſhops, why he had excommunicate diuers of the clergie, as Herman biſhop of Bamberge, counſellor to the emperor, and other prieſts more for ſimony. And there moreouer in the ſaid councell, he theatnedy to excommunicate likewiſe the emperor himſelfe, and to depoſe him from his regall kingdome, vnleſſe he would abrenounce the hereſie of ſimonie, and doe penance. The councell being ended, Guibertus archbiſhop of Rauenna perſuaded with one Centius (a Romane, the captaines ſonne, whom the pope had excommunicated) to take the emperors part againſt the pope: who watching his time in the temple of ſaint Marie, vpon Chriſtmaſſe day in the morning, taketh the pope and putteth him faſt in a ſtrong tower. The next day the people of Rome hearing this, harneſſe themſelues with all expedition to helpe the biſhop, whom when they loſed out of priſon, they beſieged the houſe of Centius, and pluckt it downe to the ground; his familie hauing their noſes cut off, were caſt out of the citie; Centius himſelfe eſcaping fled to the emperor. Guibert the archbiſhop pretending god will to the pope, departed from Rome, who likewiſe had wrought with Hugo Candidus cardinall, and with Theobaldus archbiſhop of Pillain, alſo with diuers other biſhops about Italie, to ſo ſaue the pope and take the emperors part. Gregorie the pope, called Hildebrand, hearing the conſpiracie, layeth the ſentence of excommunication vpon them all, and depriueth them of their dignitie. The emperor being moued (not without cauſe) with the arrogant preſumption of the proud prelat, called together a councell at Wormes. In which councell all the biſhops not onely of Saxonie, but of all the whole empire of Germaines, agreed and conclude vpon the depoſition of Hildebrand, and that no obedience hereafter ſhould be giuen to him. This being determined in the councell, Roulandus a prieſt of Parmen was ſent to Rome with the ſentence, who in the name of the councell ſhould command Gregorie to yeld vp his ſeate, and alſo charge the cardinals to reſort to the emperor for a new election of another pope. The tenor of the ſentence ſent by Roulandus was this.

Hildebrand the pope.

The ſentence of the councell of Wormes againſt Hildebrand.

FOrſomuch as thy firſt ingreſſe and comming in hath beene ſo ſpotted with ſo manie periuries, and alſo the church of God brought in no little danger through thine abuſe and newfanglenes: moreouer, becauſe thou haſt defamed thine owne life and conuerſation, with ſo much and great diſhoneſtie, that we ſee no little perill or ſlander to riſe therof: therefore the obedience which yet we neuer promiſed thee, hereafter we vtterlie renounce, and neuer intend to giue thee. And as thou haſt neither taken vs yet for biſhops (as thou haſt openly reported of vs) ſo neither will we hereafter take thee to be apoſtolike.

Vale.

Gregorie the pope tickled with this ſentence, firſt condemneth it in his councell of Lateran with excommunication; Secondarily, depriueth Sigifridus archbiſhop of Mentz of his dignities, and eccleſiaſticall liuings, with all other biſhops, abbats and prieſts, as many as tooke the emperors part. Thirdly, accuſeth Henricus the emperor himſelfe, depriueth him of his kingdome and regall poſſeſſion, and releaſeth all his ſubiects of their oth of allegiance giuen vnto him, after this ſorte and maner.

The tenor of the ſentence excommunicatorie againſt Henricus the emperor, by Hildebrand.

OBleſſed S. Peter prince of the apoſtles, bow downe thine eares I beſeech thee, and heare me thy ſeruant, whom thou haſt brought vp euen from mine infancie, and haſt deliuered me vntill this day from the hands of the wicked, which hate and perſecute me, becauſe of my faith in thee. Thou art my witneſſe, & alſo the bleſſed mother of Ieſu Chriſt, & thy brother S. Paul, fellow partner of thy martyrdome, how that I entred this function (not willingly) but inforced againſt my will: not that I take it ſo as a robberie, lawfullie to aſcend into this ſeate: but becauſe that I had rather paſſe ouer my life, like a pilgrime or priuate person, then for any fame or glorie to climbe vp to it. I doe acknowledge (and that worthilie) all this to come of thy grace, and not of my merits, that this charge ouer christian people, and this power of binding and loosing is committed to me. Wherfore, trusting vpon this assurance for the dignitie and tuition of holy church in the name of God omnipotent, the father, the sonne, and the Holy ghost, I doe here depose Henrie the sonne of Henrie once the emperor, from his imperiall seat, and princely gouernment, who hath so boldly and presumptuously laid hands vpon thy church. And furthermore, all such as before haue sworne to be his subiects, I releasse them of their oth, whereby all subiects are bound to the allegiance of their princes. For it is meet and conuenient that he should be void of dignitie, which seeketh to diminish the maiestie of thy church. Moreouer, for that he hath contemned my monitions, tending to his health and wealth of his people; and hath separate himselfe from the fellowship of the church (which he, through his seditions, studieth to destroy) therfore I bind him by vertue of excommunication, trusting and knowing most certainely, that thou art Peter (in the rocke of whom as in the true foundation Christ) our king hath built his church.

Peter inheriteth Gods power in dissolue the sinnes of heauen.

The emperor thus assaulted with the popes censure, seeth aboue his letters throwe all nations, to purge himselfe, declaring how wrongfully, and against all right he was condemned. The princes of Almaine partly fearing the cracke of the popes thunderclap, partly against reioycing that occasion was ministred to rebell against the emperor, assembled a commencement, where they did consult and to conclude, to elect another emperor, and to fall from Henrie, vnlesse the pope would come to Germany, and hee there content to submit himselfe and obtaine his pardon.

The Saxons & other the popes part against the emperor.

Wherein is to be considered the lamentable affections of the Germans in those daies, so to forsake such a baliant emperor, and so much to reputte a vile bishop. But this was the rudenesse of the world then, for lacke of better knowledge. The emperor seeing the chiefe princes readie to forsake him, promiseth them with an oth, that if the pope would repaire to Germany, he would aske forgiuenesse.

Upon this the bishop of Trists was sent vp in commission to Rome, to intreate the pope to come into Germanie. The bishop (at the instance of the legat and of the princes) was content. He entred into Germanie, thinking to come to Augusta. After he was come to Verrellos (the bishop of that citie being the chancellor of Italie, and desirous to disturbe peace for the old grudge he had to the emperor) fallile perchaunch with the pope, that he was certaine the emperor was comming with a mightie great armie against him, counselling him therefore to prouide betimes for his owne safegard in some stronger place. Wherby the popes mind being altered, he retired backe to Canusium or Canosius, a citie being subiect to Matilda, a countesse of Italie, where he thould not need to feare the emperor.

Peace disturbed through wicked counsel.

Henricus vnderstanding the false feare of the pope, and of his retire to Canusium, incontinent (comming out of Spires with his wife and his yong sonne, in the deepe and sharpe of winter) resorteth to Canosius. All his peeres and nobles had left him for feare of the popes curse, neither did any accompanie him. Wherefore the emperor, being not a little troubled (laying apart his regall ornaments) came barefoted with his wife and child to the gate of Canosius, where he from morning to night (all the day falling) most humblie desireth absolution, crauing to be let in, to the speech of the bishop. But no ingresse might be giuen him once within the gates. Thus he continuing three daies together in his petition and sute; at length answere came, that the popes maiestie had yet no leasure to talke with him. The emperor nothing moued therwith, that he was noe let into the citie, patient and with an humble mind abideth without the walls, with no little grieuance and painefull labor, for it was a sharpe winter, and all frosen with cold. Notwithstanding, yet through his importunate sute, at length it was granted through the intreating of Matilda (popes paramor), and of Arelaus earle of Sabandia, and the abbat of Clumaine, that he should be admitted to the popes speech. On the fourth day being let in, for a token of his true repentance, her yeldeth to the popes hands his crowne, with all other ornaments imperiall: and confessed himselfe vnworthie of the empire, if euer he doe against the pope hereafter, as he hath done before, desiring for that time to be absolued and forgiuen. The pope answereth he will neither forgiue him, nor release the bond of his excommunication, but vpon conditions. First, to promise, that he shall be content to stand to his arbitrement in the counsell, and to take such penance as he shall inioyne him also that he shall be prest and readie to appeare, in what place or time the pope shal appoint him. Moreouer, that he being content to take the pope iudge of his cause, shall answere in the said councell to all obiections and accusations laid against him, and that he shall neuer seeke any reuengement herein. Item, that he (though he be quit and cleared therin) shall stand to the popes mind and pleasure, whether to haue his kingdome restored, or to lose it.

Finally, that before the triall of his cause, he shall neither vse his kingly ornaments, scepters, or crowne, nor vsurpe the authorite to gouerne, nor to exact any oth of allegiance vpon his subiects, &c. These things being promised to the bishop by an oth, and put in writting, the emperor is onely released of excommunication. The tenor of the writting is this.

Heere the head of the image appeareth in his colours.

The forme and tenor of the oth, which
Henricus made to the pope.

I Henricus king, after peace and agreement made to the mind and sentence of our lord Gregorius the seuenth, promise to keepe keepe all couenants and bonds betwixt vs, and to prouide that the pope go safely wheresoeuer he will without any danger either to him or to his retinue; especially in all such places as bee subiect to our empire. Nor that I shall at any time lay or hinder him, but that hee may doe that belongeth to his function, where and whersoeuer his pleasure shall be. And these things I bind my selfe with an oth to keepe. Actum Canos. 5. calend. Februarij indic. 15.

Thus the matter being decided betwixt them after the popes owne prescribement, the emperor taketh his iourny to Papia. The pope with his cardinals did dance and triumph with no little pride that they had so quailed the emperor, and brought him on his knees to aske them forgiuenesse. Yet notwithstanding, mistrusting themselues, and misdoubting time, what might befall them hereafter, if fortune should turne, and God giue the emperor to inioy a more quiet kingdome: therefore to preuent such dangers betime, they study and consult privily with themselues how to displace Henry cleane from his kingdome. And how that deuice might safely be conueied, they conclude and determine to deriue the empire into Rodulphus, a man of great nobility amongst the cheefest states of Germanie, and also to incite and stir vp all other princes & subiects (being yet free and discharged from their oths) against Henry, and so by force of armes to expell the emperour out of his kingdome. To bring this purpose the better to passe, legats were sent down from the pope, Sigehardus patriarch of Aquila, and Altimanus bishop of Padway, which should perswade through all France, that Henry the emperor was rightfully excommunicated, and that they should giue to the bishop of Rome their consents in chusing Rodulphus to be emperor. This being done, there was sent to the said Rodulphus duke of Sueuia, a crowne from the pope with this verse:

The crafty conspiracy of the cardinals against the emperor.

Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodulpho.

The verse.

The rocke gaue the crowne to Peter,
Peter giueth it to Rodulph.

The glosse vpon the verse of Hildebrand.

Here by the way of digression (to make a little glosse vpon this barbarous verse) two notable lies are to be noted. One, where he lieth vpon Christ, the other where he lieth vpon Saint Peter. First, that Christ gaue any temporall diademe to Peter, it is a most manifest lie, and against the scriptures, when as he would not take it, being giuen to himself, and saith, his kingdome is not of this world. Againe, where he saith that Peter giueth it to Rodulph: here he plaieth the poet; for neither had Peter any such thing to giue; and if he had, yet hee would not haue giuen it to Rodulph from the right heire: neither is it true that Peter did giue it, because Hildebrand gaue it. For it is no good argument; Hildebrand did giue it; Ergo, Peter did giue it: except pe will say, Hildebrand stirred vp great wars and bloudshed in Germany; Ergo, Peter stirred vp great wars in Germany. So Peter neither could, nor would, nor did giue it to Rodulphus, but only Hildebrand the pope: who after he had so done, he gaue in commandement to the archbishop of Mentz and of Cullen, to elect this Rodulphus for emperor, and to anoint him king, and also to defend him with all force and strength they might.

The pope prouideth a double lier.

While this conspiracy was in hand, Henricus the emperor was absent, and the popes ambassadors with him also. In the meane space Rodulphus was elected emperor, vnknowing to Henry. Vpon this commeth the bishop of Straulsborough vnto the emperor, certifying him what was done. He suspecting and seeing the stomacke and doings of the Saxons so bent against him, muttereth his men with expedition, and marcheth forward to defend his right; but first sendeth to Rome (trusting vpon the league betwixt him and his pope) and requireth the bishop to proceed with his sentence against Rodulphus, for the rebellious inuasion of his empire. But the bishop minding nothing lesse, sendeth word againe, not to be right to condemne any person (his cause being not heard:) thus vnder the pretence of the law, colouring his vnlatefull treachery. Henricus thus disappointed and forsaken on euery side, with his men about him, attempteth battell against Rodulphus. In which battel, a maruellous great slaughter was on both sides, but the victory on neither part certaine; so that both the captaines yet challenged the empire. After the battell and great murther on both sides, they sent to Rome both, to know of the popes determination, to whether of them two he iudged the right title of the empire to appertain. The bishop commanded them both to breake vp their armes, and depart the field, promising that he shortly would call a councel where this matter should be disputed; in the meane time they should cease from war. But before the messengers returned againe (their armies being refreshed) they had another conflict togither, but no victory got on either part. Thus both the captaines being wearied in warres, the Romish beast the bishop (which was the cause thereof, perceiuing whither these cruell wars would tend, to the great calamity not onely of the Germans, but also of other nations (trusting to finde another way to helpe Rodulphus and his adherents) sendeth downe a commission by Otho archbishop of

The pope traitorous to the emperor.

Great wars stirred vp by the pope.

Treuers, Bernardus beacon, and Bernardus abbat of Saltsilia: to whom he gaue in charge that they should call together a councell or sitting in Almany, and there to be defined to whether part the empire should pertaine, by most right and publike consideration; promising that what they should therein determine, he (talking vpon the matter, through the authorite of God omnipotent, and of saint Peter, and saint Paul) would ratifie the same. Moreouer, for that no let nor impeachment should happen to the legats by the way, hee giueth with them letters to the princes and nations of Germany; wherof the contents bee declared briefely in Platina, if any list to reade them.

But the emperor would not so permit the legat to haue any councell within Germany, except they would first bepine Rodulphus of his kingdome. The legats considering that to be against the drift and intention of the pope, returned againe from whence they came. The pope hearing this, and seeing his purpose was so disappointed by the emperor, braweth out another excommunication against him, and againe bereaueth him of his kingdome: reading about his letters excommunicatory throughout all places, thinking thereby to further the part of Rodulphus the better. Platina hath in his booke the whole effect of the writing, which tendeth after this sort.

The copie of the second excommunication of Hildebrand against the emperor.

BLessed S. Peter, prince of the apostles, and thou Paul also the teacher of the Gentiles, giue care vnto me I beseech you a little, and gently heare me, for you are the disciples and louers of truth. The things that I shall say are true. This matter I take in hand for truth sake, that my brethren (whose saluation I seeke) may see the more obsequiously obey me, & better vnderstand, how that I trusting vpon your defence next to Christ & his mother, the immaculate virgin) resist the wicked, and am ready to helpe the faithfull. I did not enter this seat of mine owne accord, but much against my will, and with teares, for that I accounted my selfe vnworthy to occupy so high a throne. And this I say, not that I haue chosen you, but you haue chosen me, and haue laid this great burthen vpon our shoulders. And now, whereas by this your assignement, I haue ascended vp this hill, crying to the people, and shewing them their faults, and to the children of the church their iniquities, the members of Satan haue risen vp against mee, and haue laid hands togither to seeke my bloud. For the kings of the earth haue risen vp against mee, and the princes of this world, with whom also haue conspired certaine of the clergy subiects against the Lord, and against vs his anoynted, saying: Let vs breake asunder their bonds, and cast off from vs their yoke. This haue they done against me, to bring me either to death, or to banishment. In the number of whom is Henricus, whom they call king, the sonne of Henry the emperor, which hath lift vp so proudly his hornes & bcde against the church of God, making conspiracie with diuers other bishops, both Italian, French, and Germans. Against the pride of whom, hitherto your authority hath resisted, who rather being broken then amended, comming to mee in Cisalpina, made humble sute to me for pardon and obsolution. I thinking nothing else but true repentance in him, receiued him against fauor, and did restore him to the communion only, from which he was excommunicate but to his kingdome (from which in the synod of Rome hee was worthily expelled) I did not restore him, nor to the rents and fruits thereof (that he might returne to the faith againe) that I granted not to him. And that I did for this purpose, that if he should deferre to fall to agreement with certaine of his neighbours, whom he had alwaies vexed, and to restore againe the goods both of the church, and otherwhiles then he might be compelled by the censures of the church and force of armes thereunto. Whereby diuers and sundry bishops and princes of Germany (such as he had long troubled) being helped by this opportunity, elected Rodulphus their duke to be king in the place of Henricus, whom they for his transgressions had removed and displaced from his empire. But Rodulphus first in this matter vsing a princely modestie and integrity, sent vp his messengers to me, declaring how he was constrained (wild he, nild he) to take that regall gouernment vpon him, albeit he was not so desirous thereof, but that he would rather shew himselfe obedient to vs, then to the other that offered him the kingdome; and what seuer our arbitrement should be therein, he would be vnder obedience, both of vs, and of vs. And for more assurance of his obedience, he hath sent his owne children hither for pledges. Vpon this Henricus began to snuffe, and first increated with vs, to restraine and inhibit Rodulphus through the paine of our curse, from the vsurpation of his kingdome. I answered againe, I would send her of them had more right and title thereunto, and so send our legats thither vpon the same, to know the whole state of the matter, and thereupon I would decide betwixt them, whether of them had the truer part. But Henricus would not suffer our legats to come to vs to take vp the matter, and slew diuers both secular men, and of the clergy, spoiling and prophaning churches, and so by this meanes hath indangered himselfe in the bonds of excommunication. I therefore trusting in the iudgement ment and mercy of God, and in the supportation of the blessed virgin, also vpō your authority, do lay the sentence of curse vpon the said Henricus, and all his adherents: and here againe I take his regall gouernment from him, charging and forbidding all christian men that haue bin sworne vnto him, (whom I discharge here of their oth) that hereafter they obey him in nothing, but to take Rodulphus to their king, who is elected by many princes of the prouince. For so right it is and conuenient, that as Henry for his pride and stubbornnes, is deprived of his dignity and possessiōs: so Rodulphus being gratefull to all men, for his vertue and deuotion be exalted to the imperiall throne and dominition.

The meane to bring vnderoos to stirre vp rebellion with them.

Therefore, O you blessed princes of the apostles, grant to this, and confirme with your authority that I haue said, so that all men may vnderstand, if you haue power to bind and loose in heauen, you haue also power in earth to giue & take away empires, kingdomes, principalities, and whatsoeuer herein earth belongeth to mortall men. For if you haue power to iudge in such matters as appertaine to God: what then should we think you haue of these inferior and prophane things? And if it be in your power to iudge the angels, ruling our proud princes, what then shall it beseeme you to do vpon their seruants? Therefore let the kings vnderstand by this example, and all other princes of the world, what you bee able to doe in heauen, and what your are with God, that thereby they may feare to contemne the commandement of holy church. And now do you exercise this iudgement quickly vpon Henricus, whereby all men may see this fount of iniquity to fall from his kingdome, not by any chance, but by your prouision and only worke. Notwithstanding this I would crave of you, that he being brought to repentance through your intercessiō, yet in the day of iudgment, may finde fauor and grace with the Lord. Actum Romæ, nonis Martij, indictione 3.

Nota argumentum.

Furthermore Hildebrand not yet content with this, interdicted & deposed also Cuibertus archbishop of Rauenna, for taking the emperors part, commanding all priests to giue no manner obedience to him, and sendeth thither to Rauenna another archbishop with full authority.

After and vpon this, Henricus and Rodulphus to try the matter by the sword, coped together in battell, not without bloudshed, where Henricus by the fauor of God against the iudgement of Hildebrand had victorie. Rodulphus there greatly wounded in the conflict, was had out of the army, and caried to Wyperbolis, where hee commanded the bishops and chiefe doctors of his conspiracy to be brought before him. When they came, he lifted vp his right hand, in which he had taken his deadly wound, and said: This is the hand which gaue the oth and fauthment vnto Henricus my prince, and which through your instigation, so oft hath fought against him in vaine: now go and performe your first oth and allegiance to your king, for I must to my fathers, and so died. Thus the pope gaue battell, but God gaue the victory.

Rodulphus at his death acknowledgeth. The pope gaue the war, God gaue victory.

Henricus (after his enemy being thus subdued, and warres being ceased in Germany) forgat not the old iniuries receiued of Hildebrand, by whom he was twice excommunicated, and expelled from his kingdome, and there dares making humble suit (yea and that in sharpe winter) could find no fauor with him. Besides that, he incited moreouer and aided his enemy against him. Wherefore calleth together a councell of assemblie of diuers bishops of Italy, Lombardy and Germany at Ticina, 1084. where he purged himselfe, and accused the bishop Hildebrand of diuers crimes, to be an vsurper, periured, a necromancer and sorcerer, a fauter of discord: complaining moreouer of wrongs and iniuries done by the bishop and church of Rome, in that the church of Rome preferred the bishop before him, when that his father being emperor before him, had inuested and set in diuers and sundry bishops there by his assignement, without all others election. And now this bishop contrary to his oth and promise made, thrust in himselfe, without the will and knowledge of him, being their king and magistrat. For in the time of his father Henricus the third, this Hildebrand with other, bound themselues with a corporall oth, that so long as the emperor and his sonne now being king, should liue, they should neither themselues presume nor suffer any other to aspire to the papall seat, without the assent and approbation of the foresaid emperors; which now this Hildebrand, contrary to his corporall oth had done. Wherefore the foresaid councell with one agreement condemned this Gregory, that he should be deposed. The tenor of which condemnation is thus expressed in Abbate Vrspergensi.

Abbas Vrspergensis.

The sentence of the councell of Brixia, against Hildebrand.

BEcause it is not vnknowne, this bishop not to be elected of God, but to haue intruded himselfe by fraud and mony, who hath subuerted all ecclesiasticall order, who hath disturbed the gouernment of the christian empire, menacing death of body and soule against our catholike & peaceable king, who hath set vp and maintained a periured king, sowing discord where concord was, causing debate amongst friends, slanders, and offences amongst brethren, diuorcements and separation amongst the maried (for he tooke away the mariage of priests, as Henricus Mutius witnesseth) and finally disquieting the peaceable state of all quiet life: Therefore we here in the name and authority of God congregat togither, with the legats and hands of 19. bishops, the day of Pentecost at Mentz, doe proceed in canonicall iudgement, against Hildebrand, a man most wicked, preaching sacrilege and burning, maintaining periury and murthers, calling in question the catholike faith of the body and bloud of the Lord, a follower of diuination and dreames, a manifest necromancer, a forcerer, and infected with a pythonicall spirit, and therefore departed from the true faith, we iudge him to be deposed and expelled. And vnlesse he hearing this, shall yeeld and depart the seat, to be pertually condemned. Enacted 7. Calend. Iulij, feria. 5. indictione 3.

Note the true pope iudged and deposed of the councell.

This being enacted and sent to Rome: they elected Guibertus archbishop of Rauenna in the place of Hildebrand, to gouerne the church of Rome, named Clemens the third. But when Hildebrand neither would giue ouer his hold, nor giue place to Clement, the emperor gathering an army to send to Italy, came to Rome to depose Gregory, & to place Clement. But Hildebrand sending to Matilda the countesse before mentioned, required (in remission of all her sins) to withstand Henry the emperor: and so she did. Notwithstanding Henricus preuailing, came to Rome, where he besieg. d the city all the Lent, and after Easter got it, the Romans being compelled to open the gates vnto him: so he comming to the temple of S. Peter, there placeth Clement in his papacy. Hildebrand straight fleeth into Adrians tower with his adherents, where he being beset round about, at length sendeth for Robert Guiscardus his friend a Norman. In the mean time, while Robertus collecteth his power, the abbat of Cluniake, conferring with Gregory, exhorteth him to crown Henricus emperor in Lateran. Which if he would doe, the other promiseth to bring about, that Henry should depart with his army into Germany, whereunto the people of Rome also did likewise moue him. To whom Gregory answereth, that he was content so to doe (but vpon condition, that the emperor would submit himselfe to a the pope, to amend his fault, and to promise obedience. The emperor not agreeing to those conditions, went to Senas, taking Clement new stalled pope with him.

After the returne of the emperor, the foresaid Robert Guiscardus approching with his soldiors, hurt in at one of the gates, and spoiled the city. And not long after deliuered Hildebrand out of his enemies hands, and carried him away to Campania, where he not long continuing after, died in exile.

Antonius writeth, that Hildebrand, as hee did lie a dying, called to him one of his chiefe cardinals, beseeching to him his fault and misorder of his spirituall ministery, in stirring vp discord, war, and dissention: whereupon he desired the cardinall to go to the emperor, and desire him of forgiuenesse, absoluing from the danger of excommunication both him and all his partakers both quicke and dead.

Hildebrand the first author and patron of all mischiefe that followed after in popes.

¶ Thus hast thou (gentle reader) the full history of pope Gregory the fourth, called Hildebrand: which I haue laid out more at large, and desire thee to marke, because that from this pope (if thou marke well) springeth all the occasion of mischiefe, of pride, pompe, stoutnesse, presumption and tyranny, which since that time hath raigned in his successors hitherto, in the cathedrall church of the Romish clergy. For here came first the fabrication of the temporall regiment, vnder the spirituall title of dictum Petri and emperors, which before were their ministers, now are made their vnderlings. Also here came in the suppression of priests mariage, as is sufficiently declared. Here came in moreouer, the authority of both the swords spirituall and secular into spirituall mens hands. So that christian magistrates could do nothing in election, in giuing bishoprickes or benefices, in calling councels, in hearing and correcting the excesses of the clergy, but only the pope must do all. Yea moreouer, no bishop nor pastor in his owne parish could excommunicat or execute any discipline amongst his flocke, but only the pope challenged that prerogatiue to himselfe. Finally, here came in the first example to persecute emperors and kings with rebellion and excommunication, as the clergy themselues hereafter do testifie and witnes in proceeding against Paschalis. Thus the sic notes being well obserued, let vs (by the grace of Christ) now repaire againe to our country history of England.
